Thunder Horse has been more than a decade in the making, according to Cindy A. Yeilding, the company's chief geologist in Houston. Back in the early 1990s, Ms. Yeilding and other BP scientists used better technology, including the new three-dimensional seismic mapping, and more powerful computers to focus on big fields, which are referred to as "elephants" in the industry.

"We went on an elephant hunt," she said. "To test a new play, we needed to find a huge accumulation of hydrocarbons and we needed a rig that could drill in 5,000 or 6,000 feet of water. It was a combination of geology and technology."

From 1992 to 1997, the company acquired dozens of new leases from the government, spurred by a new royalty relief program that provided extra incentives to encourage deepwater exploration.

On the first day of 1999, the company finally began drilling a well in the Mississippi Canyon's Block 778, a lease in the northeast region of the Gulf, about 125 miles from New Orleans. The drilling team, led by Ms. Yeilding, was confident it had found the giant field it was looking for but was nervous at the prospect of drilling through salt in deep waters.

"We were petrified," Ms. Yeilding recalled. "We were so afraid of salt, we wanted to go around it."

But the efforts paid off. On July 4 that year, the BP well reached its final depth of 29,000 feet, after having gone through 6,000 feet of water and 2,500 feet of salt. There, BP made the biggest discovery in the Gulf of Mexico. The field, holding one billion barrels of reserves, became known as Thunder Horse.

The wider hunt has been on ever since. On the Neptune's deck, the repetitive beat of the air guns can barely be heard. But below the sea, the vibrations travel deep inside the earth's crust. Then they bounce back and are picked up by streamers of densely packed electronic sensors, stretching four miles behind the ship.

Inside, working in cool temperature-controlled rooms, dozens of engineers control the ship's position, collect the seismic data and begin forming a picture of the earth's geological layers.

"The easy oil is running out because it has already been found," said Ezio Plenizio, an Italian geophysicist aboard the Neptune, which belongs to the oil services company Schlumberger. "But 20 years ago, when I started in the business, people were already saying that oil is going to run out soon."

All Slander All The Time (WSJ)

By John Ellis

The Wall Street Journal, November 8, 2006

Glad it's over? You're not the only one. Voters in six states with closely contested U.S. Senate races were recently asked by the Gallup Organization their opinion of the political advertising they'd seen this year. The vast majority, in every state surveyed, described it as either "somewhat negative," "very negative" or "extremely negative." Roughly a third of those surveyed in each state said "extremely negative."

According to Advertising Age magazine, the total amount spent this year on political advertising will reach $2 billion, a hefty increase over 2004. If one conservatively estimates that at least half of all political advertising can be fairly described as "negative," then 2006 will be the first year that negative political advertising expenditures reached the $1 billion mark. That's a dollar amount greater than all of the television, radio and print advertising buys done by Anheuser-Busch (estimated by Ad Age to be $919 million) in 2005.

Imagine, if you will, what your taste for Miller beer would be if Anheuser-Busch spent half of its annual advertising budget describing all of the various Miller brands in the most unsavory terms. Or, what your taste for a Budweiser would be if the lads at Miller unleashed a $500 million negative ad campaign against "the King of Beers." Imagine both at the same time and you get some idea of what domestic politics is like for most Americans.

Look through the list of the major advertisers in the U.S. and what strikes you is that all of them spend vast sums of money building and strengthening brands. The nation's leading advertiser, Procter & Gamble, spends over $4.5 billion annually doing just that. P&G spends not one dime on negative advertising because they understand that it is ultimately self-destructive.

What makes our politics so sensationally awful is not just the amount of money spent denigrating the category and the profession, but the equally stunning amount of energy that is expended by party apparatchiks to amplify the negative in news-media coverage of politics. And the news media are only to happy to comply. The truth is they can't get enough of it.

The net effect of this constant and unrelenting assault on politicians and the political process is voter resignation and ultimately a kind of doomed acceptance. It must be true. They must all be hypocrites, fools, thieves and scoundrels. They're talking about themselves, after all. It's $1 billion of self-portraiture.

A general rule of politics is: It's not the action, it's the reaction. The reaction to the onslaught is aversion; qualified, capable people avoid politics and the political process at all costs, thus diminishing the talent pool. The New York Republican Party was unable to recruit a qualified candidate for state comptroller, even though the race was there for the taking, because they literally couldn't find a qualified candidate to run. Nor could the Republican Party find a qualified candidate for the U.S. Senate in Connecticut. No sensible person would do it. Part of corporate advertising contains a subtextual message; come work for us, we're in an exciting business. We're growing and it will only get better. The subtextual message of political advertising is: You'd be crazy to get involved. It's bad and it's only going to get worse.

One would think that the major parties would grasp the concept that they are destroying the very profession they purport to love, and act accordingly. In the midst of all these negative messages, one would expect to find a broad, thematic campaign that aspired to something bigger than "he voted for toxic waste dumps and against your unborn child." When the Labour Party in Britain finally got tired of losing elections to Maggie Thatcher's Tories, they hired the best advertising minds in that nation to relaunch the Labour Party brand. The results were impressive. Tony Blair rose to power and rules to this day.

But in America, the major parties don't ever think in broad, national terms. They're all tactics and no strategy. They don't advertise themselves at all. Instead, they spend the hundreds of millions of dollars they raise microtargeting supposedly single-issue voters and bombarding them with negative messages about the opposite party's alleged disdain for those concerns. Put more simply, they send you junk mail you don't open, and leave robo-calls on your answering machine that you immediately erase.

Ultimately, the reaction to this ceaseless negative barrage, if it continues unchecked, will be the rejection of both major political parties. As more and more people are repulsed by the political process, their number will at some point reach a critical mass. Americans share two overriding beliefs: Tomorrow will be a better day and the idea of America is fundamentally important. That critical mass will eventually embrace a party of hope and mission. A new political party that speaks to those beliefs will emerge. The alternative, after all, is a new record every two years -- $2 billion of negative advertising, then $4 billion, then $8 billion. All slander all the time eventually collapses of its own foul weight.

Let's Stop Stereotyping Evangelicals (WP)

By Joseph Loconte And Michael Cromartie

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

It was in 1976 -- the "year of the evangelical," according to Newsweek -- that conservative Christians burst upon the political landscape. Critics have been warning about the theocratic takeover of America ever since. Thus the plaintive cry of a Cabinet member in the Carter administration: "I am beginning to fear that we could have an Ayatollah Khomeini in this country, but that he will not have a beard . . . he will have a television program."

This election season produced similar lamentations -- Howard Dean's warning about Christian "extremism," Kevin Phillips's catalogue of fears in "American Theocracy" and brooding documentaries such as "Jesus Camp," to name a few. This theme is a gross caricature of the 100 million or more people who could be called evangelicals. But the real problem is that it denies the profoundly democratic ideals of Protestant Christianity, while ignoring evangelicalism's deepening social conscience.

Evangelicals led the grass-roots campaigns for religious liberty, the abolition of slavery and women's suffrage. Even the Moral Majority in its most belligerent form amounted to nothing more terrifying than churchgoers flocking peacefully to the polls on Election Day. The only people who want a biblical theocracy in America are completely outside the evangelical mainstream, their influence negligible.

So as Jerry Falwell and other ministers were jumping into politics, leaders such as Charles Colson -- former Nixon aide turned born-again Christian -- were charting another path. In 1976 Colson launched Prison Fellowship, a ministry to inmates, to address the soaring crime problem. Today it ranks as the largest prison ministry in the world, active in most U.S. prisons and in 112 countries. "Crime and violence frustrate every political answer," he has said, "because there can be no solution apart from character and creed." No organization has done more to bring redemption and hope to inmates and their families.

Evangelical megachurches, virtually unheard of 30 years ago, are now vital sources of social welfare in urban America. African American congregations such as the Potter's House in Dallas, founded by Bishop T.D. Jakes, can engage a volunteer army of 28,000 believers in ministries ranging from literacy to drug rehabilitation. Rick Warren, author of "The Purpose-Driven Life," has organized a vast network of churches to confront the issue of AIDS. "Because of their longevity and trust in the community," Warren has said, "churches can actually do a better job long-term than either governments or" nongovernmental organizations in tackling the pandemic.

Whether or not that's true, these evangelicals -- Bible-believing and socially conservative -- are redefining social justice. They're mindful of the material conditions that breed poverty and despair, but they emphasize spiritual rebirth. Though willing to partner with government agencies, they prefer to work at the grass roots, one family at a time.

Meanwhile, churches and faith-based organizations are growing enormously in their international outreach. Groups such as World Vision are often the first responders to natural disasters. The Association of Evangelical Relief and Development Organizations, founded in 1978, now boasts 47 member groups in dozens of countries. As anyone familiar with these organizations knows, they help people regardless of creed, race or sexual orientation -- another democratic (and evangelical) ideal.

It is surely no thirst for theocracy but rather a love for their neighbor that sends American evangelicals into harm's way: into refugee camps in Sudan; into AIDS clinics in Somalia, South Africa and Uganda; into brothels to help women forced into sexual slavery; and into prisons and courts to advocate for the victims of political and religious repression.

Indeed, probably no other religious community in the United States is more connected to the poverty and suffering of people in Africa, the Middle East and Southeast Asia. Walter Russell Mead of the Council on Foreign Relations argues that evangelicals offer moral ballast to American foreign policy. "[E]vangelicals who began by opposing Sudanese violence and slave raids against Christians in southern Sudan," he wrote recently in Foreign Affairs, "have gone on to broaden the coalition working to protect Muslims in Darfur."

Of course it's true that a handful of Christian figures reinforce the worst stereotypes of the movement. Their loopy and triumphalist claims are seized upon by lazy journalists and the direct-mail operatives of political opponents.

Yet it is dishonest to disparage the massive civic and democratic contribution of evangelicals by invoking the excesses of a tiny few. As we recall from the Gospels, even Jesus had a few disciples who, after encountering some critics, wanted to call down fire from heaven to dispose of them. Jesus disabused them of that impulse. The overwhelming majority of evangelicals have dispensed with it as well. Maybe it's time more of their critics did the same.

The Task For Mr. Spitzer (NYT)

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

New Yorkers could be forgiven for thinking that Eliot Spitzer has already been governor for some time now, given the way every poll has predicted his victory since last summer. Now that voters have finally confirmed his election, change can't come too soon for a powerful and proud state that has allowed its government to become a national embarrassment.

Mr. Spitzer has repeatedly promised to do in Albany what he did on Wall Street as attorney general. That means cleaning up cronyism and the culture of secrecy. But his plans for reform are by no means limited to the way the political game is played. He promises Medicaid reform, debt reform and court reform — each one involving entrenched interests that benefit from the status quo. At the same time, he vows to make New York a national leader in the areas where leadership has failed in Washington, like education, civil rights, the environment and housing.

Mr. Spitzer will hardly be doing it all in his first hundred days. But we do expect to see immediate action on his central promise to make state government more responsive to the people and to clean up the way special-interest money distorts policy in the state.

That won't be easy. Mr. Spitzer sees himself as a 21st-century politician who wears his party affiliation loosely. He enjoys comparing his proposed methods for reforming Albany to the famous "bull in the china closet" system used by another former governor, Teddy Roosevelt. "Where there is resistance I will stand up to it — Democrat or Republican, it won't matter," he told Newsweek recently.

Albany regulars, on the other hand, seem to feel that they can grind the new governor down the same way they did his recent predecessors. The legislative leaders, who have no statewide constituency, put their chief loyalty in their party, which they regard as a sort of combination clan, business and street gang. Their ability to hold out for what they want by simply refusing to do anything at all until their needs are satisfied is legendary.

The public has little idea of how Mr. Spitzer is going to make things better in Albany, but the general desire for reform may be the most important thing he has going for him. New York does not want a governor who has so raised hopes to cave in to Albany's secretive, undemocratic ways. But it will take enormous skill and resources for Mr. Spitzer to keep appealing directly to the public in order to force the old guard into accepting change. Watching to see whether the next governor succeeds will be quite a spectacle — but a serious one that will determine the future of New York State.

At The U.N., Discord Over Confronting Iran's Nuclear Ambitions (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 7 — A meeting of six nations working on a resolution to curb Iran's nuclear ambitions broke up Tuesday evening with the ambassadors reporting widening disagreements and lessening prospects of a swift accord.

"The mood is not right for serious discussions," said Wang Guangya, the ambassador of China, emerging from the meeting of the five permanent members of the Security Council and Germany, whose envoys had gathered at the French Mission.

"Clearly, I think in a number of difficult areas that the differences cannot be bridged," he said. "So I believe there ought to be more reflections in the capitals, and also I believe that we need to talk to each other."

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, left the session hurriedly without making his customary comment. "Gotta go, gotta go," he said, as he brushed by reporters and entered his limousine.

Asked how the session had gone, Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, had a flippant response: "Nothing spectacular. Another day at the office."

Earlier in the day, Mr. Bolton charged that Russia had pulled back from an agreement made in July by the foreign ministers of the six nations to impose sanctions on Iran if it did not meet an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend its uranium enrichment. That meeting was held in St. Petersburg, Russia.

"I don't know how we're going to work it out because the Russian version is very different than what we think the foreign ministers agreed to," Mr. Bolton said.

Told of Mr. Bolton's comments, Mr. Churkin chided the American. "You know, after our last meeting our colleagues asked me not to criticize their draft," he said. "I said I would not, on the condition that they would not be criticizing our approach."

Contesting Mr. Bolton's point, Mr. Churkin said, "We believe that our attitude, approach and our proposals are fully in conformity with the understanding by the ministers."

Siding with the Russian, Mr. Wang said, "The readout that we are hearing from the ambassadors here is not the same that we agreed to."

Mr. Churkin also disputed an American attempt to insert into the text a description of Iran's action as a threat to international peace and security, a phrase used in Security Council resolutions to justify harsher action.

"We don't see it that way," Mr. Churkin said. "We don't believe we're at that stage."

The ambassadors were working from a draft resolution drawn up two weeks ago by Britain, France and Germany, with amendments suggested by Russia and the United States.

The resolution would prohibit any technical or financial assistance that could benefit Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, freeze the assets of any Iranians involved in nuclear activities and bar them from international travel.

In general, the Russian changes seek to limit punitive actions against the Iranians and stress the need for further negotiation with Tehran, and the proposals from Washington broaden the measure's sweep and toughen the punishment.

"The problem is that we think that our tool kit is full of tools," Mr. Churkin said, "and for some reason, for some people, there is only demand and sanctions — the hammer and sickle.

"In our view it's much more than that. So we are trying to use the entire diplomatic tool kit in order to address the situation."

U.S. Hits Russia On Erosion Of Nuclear Sanctions (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 8, 2006

The United States accused Russia yesterday of undermining the U.N. Security Council's effort to impose nuclear-related sanctions on Iran and of backing away from an agreement with the other permanent council members earlier this year.

Ending months of publicly expressed confidence that Moscow would support Washington's campaign to punish Tehran as long as all other diplomatic options had been exhausted, John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, cast doubt on prospects for a U.N. resolution in the near future.

"I don't know how we are going to work it out, because the Russian version [of the resolution] is very different than what we think the foreign ministers agreed to," Mr. Bolton told reporters in New York.

"We don't think the Russian text is consistent with what foreign ministers had agreed previously," he said, referring to a July meeting in Paris where Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov and their colleagues decided to push for sanctions if Iran did not suspend uranium enrichment.

Britain, France and Germany circulated a draft resolution last week and formally introduced it in the council yesterday. Germany is not a permanent council member but has been involved in the Iran issue since the beginning.

The draft demands that all countries prevent the financing, sale and supply of equipment or technology contributing to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs. It also would ban travel and freeze the assets of individuals and entities involved in the programs.

But Russia, backed by China, suggested numerous changes on Friday that would delete some sanctions and weaken the rest.

Earlier last week, Mr. Lavrov said the European draft was too harsh. He later said he would agree to some penalties if they had a defined time frame and a mechanism for lifting them once they had achieved their goal.

Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, accused Mr. Bolton yesterday of breaking a private agreement among the permanent Security Council members not to criticize one another publicly.

"We think our tool kit is full of tools," he said. "For some reason, for some people, there is only demands and sanctions, only hammer and sickle."

Mr. Churkin objected to a U.S.-proposed amendment to the European draft that would label Iran's nuclear program a "threat to international peace and security."

"We have taken out of that draft all things that we believe aren't timely and not proper for this particular resolution," he said.

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack played down the disagreement, saying that negotiations will be long and have their "ups and downs."

"We are going to get there," he said. "The Russians have their own views on how hard to press the Iranians and how fast to do that. We understand that. We think it is important, however, for the credibility of the Security Council and the entire international community that we now go to a sanctions resolution."

Iran's Target Practice (WSJ)

Iran continues to claim it has a "right" to its uranium-enrichment program. But one clue that the ruling mullahs have something other than peaceful nuclear energy in mind is the huge investment they're making in ballistic-missile technology, which is far from the most efficient means of delivering a non-nuclear explosive payload. Just last week, Iran test-fired dozens of Shahab-2 and Shahab-3 missiles, which have ranges up to about 2,000 kilometers.

We thought readers might be interested in seeing the large swath of Middle Eastern, South Asian and Eastern European real estate already within range of these Iranian missiles, so we offer the map nearby. Among the potential targets are India, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Israel and Turkey. The missiles can also hit southern Russia, which seems less concerned about Iran's nuclear ambitions than about blocking any serious U.N. response. And of course the missiles pose a direct threat to the many U.S. bases and troop deployments in the region, especially in Iraq.

This threat is being talked up by the Iranians themselves. Iranian Revolutionary Guards Commander Yahya Rahim Safavi told Iran's Al-Alam TV on Sunday that he did not anticipate any U.S. interference in his country's nuclear program because "they know that Iran has missiles with the range of 2000 km which will put their interests in danger." In the same interview, he also boasted of having thousands of operatives trained for suicide operations and said Iran might be willing to give its missiles to "friendly" countries. "We have military weapons which we have not shown off, but we will do in the next maneuvers," Mr. Safavi said.

We're surprised that more Western Europeans, who will soon be within range of Iranian missiles, don't seem worried about this threat. But let's hope at least President Bush and the next U.S. Congress can make stopping Iran's bomb and missile programs a bipartisan project.

Karen's Rules On Diplomacy: Talk To The Media -- If You Dare (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

Karen Hughes, the State Department's undersecretary for public diplomacy and public affairs, sent a long memo to chief diplomats, top deputies and public affairs officers worldwide Friday, spelling out "Karen's Rules" for working with the media.

The rules offer a window into how State's chief communicator communicates with her minions across the world. Hint: The memo was given to The Washington Post by a recipient who points out that if all were well, nobody would have leaked it.

In her previous role as a Bush adviser, Hughes was known for keeping ironclad control over message, whether on the campaign trail or in the White House. Does this simply reflect disciplined political strategy, or is there something psychological in play?

In this newest memo, which appears below, Hughes encourages diplomats to engage with the media, but it is apparent that the message enforcer does not share control easily. As a service to public diplomacy (partly, anyway), we consulted with a couple of organizational psychologists about what Karen's Rules suggest about Hughes.

Tulsa-based psychologist Robert Hogan offered several observations, including:

"I think it is smart for her to give folks permission in advance to make a mistake, to take some risks in order to be proactive. I wonder if anyone will believe it. . . .

"It is a good example of micromanagement, although done in a pretty nice way. Good leadership involves recruiting talented people and letting them do their job. Here she tries to provide rules for every imaginable case. She presents a thicket of rules, and if all the guidelines are followed, a person won't be able to say much of anything.

"It is also a mixed message: Go out there and communicate freely and vigorously, but be very careful what you say.

"The combination of micromanagement and mixed message will lead to learned helplessness on the part of the recipient. They will feel obliged to do something but unable to decide what. . . .

"The only thing a recipient can do is spout the preexisting words of senior officials. There is no possibility to exercise initiative -- which is another way of saying this is an exercise in micromanagement."

Marlin S. Potash, a New York-based psychologist who specializes in organizational behavior, focused on "a tone that came across as somewhat condescending or first-grade-teacher-like." She added, "I think it's meant to communicate that this is a terribly important thing that's meant to be attended to, but the impression the recipient gets is 'You question my dedication, my experience and my ability to handle this situation.' "

And now the memo:SUBJECT: ALDAC [All Diplomatic and Consular Posts] Speaking on the Record

1. Last year, I sent out a message detailing some guidelines for speaking on the record and engaging with media. With the launch of our regional hub effort, it is especially timely to reissue this message so that my policy on this is crystal clear. I also want to reiterate up front that media outreach, especially television interviews, should be a top priority in mission activities and when developing the schedules for visiting USG [U.S. government] officials.

2. I want you to know that my office and I are here to support you as you go out and do media. I know that doing any media, especially television, is a challenging endeavor. But it is a challenge we must address in order to effectively advocate our policies to foreign audiences. I also believe it is critical for Chiefs of Mission to get out on the media and to support their staff who do appear on television. When you do media, the stakes are high, but it's important. No one is perfect and there is always the chance that any of us will occasionally make mistakes -- that doesn't mean we should stop appearing on television or participating in press conferences. We need people out there giving our side of the story. The real risk is not that we occasionally misspeak, it's that we miss opportunities to present our views, and leave the field to our critics and detractors.

3. During my recent trips and meetings with many of you, I have heard concerns about problems with getting clearance to speak on the record to reporters. I promised I would send out a message clarifying my policy on this issue, and providing what I hope is clear guidance for you all in dealing with the press. In this message, I want to share "Karen's Rules" in the hope that you all will have a better idea of what I expect, and how you can react.

4. Rule #1: Think Advocacy. I want all of you to think of yourselves as advocates for America's story each day. I encourage you to have regular sessions with your senior team to think about the public diplomacy themes of each event or initiative. As a communicator, I know that it is important to get out in front of an issue or at best have a strong response to a negative story. One of my goals during my tenure at the State Department is to change our culture from one in which risk is avoided with respect to the press to one where speaking out and engaging with the media is encouraged and rewarded. I want you out speaking to the press, on television interviews preparing and executing a media strategy, and providing our points on issues. As President Bush and Secretary Rice have stated, public diplomacy is the job of every ambassador and every Foreign Service Officer. We want you out there on television, in the news, and on the radio a couple of times a week and certainly on major news stations in your country and region.

5. Rule #2: Use What's Out There. You are always on sure ground if you use what the President, Secretary Rice, Sean McCormack or Senior USG spokesmen have already said on a particular subject. I always read recent statements by key officials on important subjects before I do press events. My Echo Chamber messages are meant to provide you clear talking points in a conversational format on the "hot" issues of the day. You never need clearance to background a journalist though you should certainly pay careful attention to how your comments may be used.

6. Rule #3: Think local. Because your key audience is your local -- or regional -- audience you do not need clearance to speak to any local media, print or television. And, you do not need clearance to speak to media in your country, even if it is US based or from a US publication, if you are quoting a senior official who has spoken on the record on a particular subject. The rule of thumb to keep in mind is "don't make policy or pre-empt the Secretary or a senior Washington policy-maker."

7. Rule #4: Use Common Sense to respond to natural disasters or tragedies. You do not need to get Department clearance to express condolences in the event of a loss, or express sympathy and support in response to a natural disaster. Obviously in the latter case do not commit USG resources for support or relief without approval from the Department; but do not wait for Department authorization to offer a statement of sympathy unless the individual or incident is controversial. Your regional hubs can help you in these instances as well.

8. Rule #5: Don't Make Policy. This is a sensitive area about which you need to be careful. Do not get out in front of USG policymakers on an issue, even if you are speaking to local press. When in doubt on a policy shift, seek urgent guidance from your regional hub, PA [public affairs] or your regional public diplomacy office. Use your judgment and err on the side of caution.

9. Rule #6: No Surprises. You should always give PA a heads-up in the event that you speak to U.S.-based media. This ensures that those who should know are in the loop on what is happening.

10. Rule #7: Enlist the help of the hubs (for those who have regional media presence) or my office if you don't get a quick response for clearance or help. The hub network is an extension of my staff, and we are here to support you in your efforts to get the USG position on the record and out in the media. Both Sean McCormack and I are committed to making sure you have what you need to advocate a US position on the key issues at your post.

11. I know this is a departure from how you all have operated over the years. But forceful advocacy of US interests and positions is critical to our effort to marginalize the extremists and share a positive vision of hope for all countries and people. I encourage you to take advantage of opportunities to speak out, and look forward to our aggressive promotion of US policy.

Fence Could Wear On U.S., Mexico Issues (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana
USA Today, November 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0091925

MEXICO CITY — The nearly 700 miles of fencing President Bush authorized for the U.S.-Mexican border two weeks ago could overshadow other issues when Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderón makes his first visit to the White House on Thursday.

Unlike recently elected leftist leaders in Latin America, Calderón, 44, is a pro-business, U.S.-friendly candidate who narrowly won July's presidential election against a leftist leader.

Yet, the additional fencing Bush approved threatens to create a political barrier even before Calderón officially takes office Dec. 1.

On a recent trip to Canada, Mexico's president-elect compared the fence to the Berlin Wall, the former barrier between communist east and democratic west Berlin.

"The most important thing for him is to … end the mono-thematic tone (between the two nations)," says Luis Rubio, president of the Center of Research for Development, a think tank in Mexico City. He says the U.S.-Mexican relationship, dominated by drug trafficking in the 1980s, now is being driven by differences over U.S. immigration policy.

The U.S. border fence, meant to enhance security and deter illegal immigration, is one step in a comprehensive immigration reform plan that Bush hopes can later include a "guest worker" program and amnesty plan for some undocumented immigrants. Half of the estimated 12 million undocumented migrants living in the USA are believed to be Mexican.

On Tuesday, Evaristo Perez, the mayor of Ciudad Acuna on the Texas border, led about 400 people on a 55-mile march to protest the fences. The march also hoped to capture the attention of Hispanics voting in Tuesday's U.S. midterm elections, Perez said.

Calderón said Monday that the U.S.-Mexican relationship is the "most complex and most important" in terms of Mexican foreign policy.

He did not say whether he would reiterate Mexico's objection to the law authorizing a major extension of the fence, which Mexican officials say will cause more deaths by making it even harder for would-be immigrants to cross the border. "The only thing (the wall) will do is create more death," says legislator Jose Edmundo Ramirez Martinez, an opposition Institutional Revolutionary Party member and secretary of the immigration committee in Mexico's Congress.

Immigration was not among the issues on the original agenda for Thursday's meeting. White House spokesman Tony Snow said last month that the discussion would focus on competitiveness, free trade, economic growth and security in North America.

Calderón may have wanted to avoid immigration altogether given the failure of outgoing president and fellow National Action Party member Vicente Fox to get what he called the "whole enchilada." He had hoped to convince the Bush administration to push through the guest-worker plan and a path to citizenship for many undocumented Mexican workers.

Bush's move to authorize the fence underscored the Fox administration's failure to help Mexicans working illegally in the USA and appears to have forced his successor to make it a priority. "If the U.S. had not passed a law authorizing 700 miles of fencing, he could almost ignore immigration entirely. It was such a failure for Fox," says David Shirkof the Transborder Institute at the University of San Diego.

Shirk says Calderón's No. 1 task should be to address the economic inequality in Mexico underscored by the country's July presidential race. Leftist candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador, who attracted the nation's poor, lost by half a percentage point and challenged the legitimacy of the election.

"The way (Calderón) rose to power requires his single-minded focus be on economic development if he is to legitimate his presidency," Shirk says.

Calderón has floated a plan to put the country on the list of the world's fastest growing economies. "Mexico 2030" aims to help reduce extreme poverty by boosting annual per-capita income over the next 25 years. Calderón hopes that improving conditions at home will reduce the number of Mexicans seeking opportunities in the USA.

Calderón's top foreign adviser, Arturo Sarukhan, said the president-elect plans to meet in Washington with officials at the Inter-American Development Bank and the World Bank. Under discussion: programs to create infrastructure and capitalize on the $19 billion Sarukhan says Mexican immigrants in the USA send home each year.

Ramirez Martinez, the lawmaker, says it is imperative that the president-elect discusses the wall with U.S. officials. "We want him to go to the meeting with an agenda to talk about a migration policy — not just economics, commerce and free trade, but a new discussion about a migration policy."

State Department Official Picked To Run U.N. Food Program (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Nov. 7 -- Josette Sheeran, a senior U.S. State Department official and former managing editor of the Washington Times, was chosen Tuesday to head the United Nations' Rome-based World Food Program for a five-year term.

Sheeran, the U.S. undersecretary of state for economics, business and agricultural affairs, will replace American James T. Morris, who plans to step down around the end of the year. She will take charge of the United Nations' largest humanitarian institution, which feeds about 90 million people in about 80 of the world's poorest countries.

Sheeran is the latest Bush administration nominee to secure a senior position in the world's most prominent international agencies. Others include World Bank President Paul D. Wolfowitz, who had been deputy secretary of defense, and former Agriculture Department secretary Ann M. Veneman, now the executive director of UNICEF, the U.N. Children's Fund.

Sheeran said she "couldn't be more honored" to lead the 44-year-old relief agency. She said she would focus on meeting U.N. targets to end hunger, which accounts for 25,000 daily deaths, by the year 2015.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan and Jacques Diouf, the head of the Food and Agriculture Organization, named Sheeran after consulting with Annan's successor, South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki Moon, who takes the helm of the United Nations on Jan. 1. In a joint statement, they said Sheeran has "a 20-year proven track record as a management leader."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, welcomed the appointment, saying he looked forward to Sheeran's leadership of the World Food Program. "She's obviously an extraordinarily well-qualified candidate," Bolton said.

The State Department mounted an intensive campaign, including a slick election brochure, to ensure continuing U.S. leadership in the organization. The U.N. food agency, which receives nearly half of its $2 billion budget from the United States, is traditionally run by an American.

But the United Nations opened the race this year to outsiders and placed an ad in Britain's Economist magazine urging qualified potential candidates to put their names forward. Sheeran overcame challenges from Switzerland's top aid official, Walter Fust; a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, Robert Fowler; and American Tony Banbury, the head of the World Food Program in Asia and formerly a national security aide in the administrations of President Bill Clinton and President Bush.

The Bush administration was sensitive to the possibility that Sheeran's former membership in the Rev. Sun Myung Moon's Unification Church would emerge as an issue in the race. A U.S. official pressed The Washington Post not to mention Sheeran's past links to the church, saying it was inappropriate to describe her religious affiliation.

Sheeran said of her candidacy, "I don't know why personal faith has any relation or bearing," adding: "It is a matter of record that I have no association with the Unification Church."

U.S. Pick Gets U.N. Agency Position (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, November 8, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — American diplomat Josette Sheeran has been chosen to head the U.N. World Food Program, which assists millions of hungry people around the world. The selection of the former conservative newspaper editor to a post traditionally held by an American reveals the influence of the United States on the U.N.'s top jobs.

With a new secretary-general scheduled to start a five-year term in January, non-American applicants were reassured that the competition this year would be based on merit and experience. For the first time, the United Nations placed an ad in Economist magazine to attract nongovernmental candidates.

A panel in Rome, where the food program is based, screened more than 60 applicants, and flew several of them to New York for more extensive interviews. A short list of candidates emerged: Walter Fust, the Swiss development minister; Robert Fowler, a former Canadian ambassador to the U.N.; Tony Banbury, the WFP's director in Asia with ties to the Clinton administration; and Sheeran, the U.S. undersecretary of State for economic, business and agricultural affairs.

Diplomatic sources said they had heard that Fust and Banbury were at the top of the list. But Sheeran, not Banbury, was the official State Department candidate, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan to remind him of that, said a U.S. diplomat who asked not to be identified.

Rice's message was that the U.S. government should have a say in the selection of the WFP director proportionate to its contribution to the program. The U.S. provides more than 40% of its budget, and for 14 years an American has run the program, which helps feed about 90 million people.

"Kofi and [his deputy] Mark Malloch Brown didn't know what to do," the diplomat said. "But it's a fact that the U.S. pays the bills, and so the U.S. has a say."

Annan also consulted incoming Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, because Sheeran's five-year contract will fall under his watch. Ban had no objections and did not try to influence the selection.

Swiss Ambassador Peter Maurer, who closely followed the selection process, said he had no complaints about it and noted that although Fust is highly qualified, Switzerland is not a major contributor to the WFP.

Sheeran, 52, had strong backing from the Bush administration from the outset. Before her current State Department job handling development and trade issues, she was deputy U.S. trade representative. She previously served as managing director of Starpoint Solutions, a technology firm, and as president and chief executive of Empower America, a think tank founded by Republican Jack Kemp, a former congressman.

She said Tuesday that she was pleased to be selected to head the food program.

"It's a tremendous honor. It's a fantastic organization that saves lives everyday," she said.

Sheeran, who will take over Jan. 1, will oversee a worldwide staff of 10,500 who deliver food staples to people in 80 countries.

Josette Sheeran, a U.S. undersecretary of state and a former editor at the Washington Times, has been selected as the next head of the U.N. World Food Program, which provides assistance to millions of people around the world.

Ms. Sheeran, who is undersecretary of state for economics, business and agricultural affairs, will succeed American James T. Morris for a five-year term as head of the world's largest humanitarian agency.

Founded in 1962, WFP provides food aid to an average of 90 million poor people, including 58 million children, in at least 80 of the world's poorest countries. The U.S. provides more than 40% of the agency's budget.

Ms. Sheeran, 52 years old, is a former managing editor at the Washington Times. She also served in the office of the U.S. Trade Representative and was one of 13 members of an independent panel that just finished a report on streamlining U.N. development, humanitarian and environment operations.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Jacques Diouf, director-general of the Food and Agriculture Organization, announced their appointment. It was supported by the WFP's executive board in Rome, said U.N. spokesman Stephane Dujarric, and by Ban Ki-moon, who takes over as secretary-general on Jan. 1.

In her current State Department job, Ms. Sheeran is responsible for economic issues including development, trade, agriculture, finance, energy, telecommunications and transportation. Prior to that, she served as the deputy U.S. trade representative.

Israel Declares End To Gaza Mission, But Firing Continues (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

BEIT HANUN, Gaza, Nov. 7 — “My heart is bouncing,” Hiam Yazgi, 24, said Tuesday, and for good reason: Palestinian militants had just fired four homemade rockets, and the Israelis were rattling down retaliatory shells dangerously close to her toppled house here.

One resident of Gaza seemed unfazed, and maybe because she has known only fighting in her short life: Ms. Yazgi’s daughter, who was born in the middle of the street just three days ago, halfway through a major Israeli military operation to stop the ongoing rocket fire from Gaza.

As the older children flinched at every shell, the baby, Fairouz, lay sleeping in a turquoise blanket.

“This is our fate,” Ms. Yazgi said.

In theory, today should have been quiet, at last. Israeli tanks and soldiers withdrew from Beit Hanun early on Tuesday, saying their six-day operation to stop the firing of rockets into Israel was over and had been successful. They said they killed dozens of armed militants, recovered “large amounts” of weaponry and showed the Palestinians the price of such attacks.

But Palestinians and the United Nations said the price was too high. In the first glimpse of Beit Hanun since the operation began — the largest in Gaza since July — it was apparent that large swaths of the northern Gaza neighborhood from where most of the rockets were fired had been devastated.

At least 30 houses were destroyed, or nearly so, with 100 more damaged, a United Nations team that surveyed the damage reported. The stench of sewage wafted over streets churned up and sopping after Israeli bulldozers crunched through water mains. Scores of trees and lampposts were uprooted. At least 52 Palestinians were dead; the Israelis insisted that most were fighters, while Palestinians emphasized the civilians who were killed.

A leader of the United Nations survey team, John Ging, said he was “gravely concerned” by the extent of the damage.

"The scale of destruction that is now evident to anybody who wishes to go to Beit Hanun underscores the impossibility of conducting large-scale military operations in intensely built-up areas without creating this result," said Mr. Ging, operations director for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees.

As Palestinian leaders worked to form a new national unity government that could ease the hardships here, the violence continued elsewhere in Gaza. In scattered incidents around the strip, the Israeli military said it had hit as many as 10 Palestinian fighters. [A news service] reported that at least eight people were killed.

Among them were two people, including a woman, Nahla Shanti, killed after Israeli tank fire hit the house of Jamila Shanti, a Palestinian legislator from the militant faction Hamas.

The military said it had responded to two rocket-propelled grenades fired from the house. Ms. Shanti was reported to have been in the house at the time but was not wounded. The dead woman was her sister-in-law.

"The Israelis leave one area and enter another," [a news service] quoted the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, as saying. "We have spoken to the American administration and to the Europeans that such a situation cannot help restore security and stability."

In all, the day seemed an illustration of the situation here at this stalemated moment in which there seems no plan to go forward on either the Palestinian or Israeli side, with deep internal divides on both.

The Israeli operation was intended to stop the rocket fire, and although it was reduced, it did not stop. In midafternoon, just hours after the Israeli troops left, four of the crude Qassam rockets sputtered up into the sky out of the destruction of Beit Hanun, leaving behind jagged trails of black smoke.

The rockets hit deeper into Israel than they have in months, landing in the city of Ashkelon, about six miles north of Gaza, but there were no injuries, the Israeli military reported. A fifth rocket landed harmlessly in the Negev desert.

The rounds fell as Yousef Seweil, 47, greeted mourners for his son, Ayman, 18, killed by Israelis on Friday in front of the Nasir mosque here — now leveled except for the minaret. Ayman, his father said, was killed along with two women after the Israelis opened fire on a crowd during a standoff between Israelis and fighters in the mosque.

Palestinians say it was a peaceful demonstration. Israelis counter that the women were acting as human shields to allow the fighters to escape and that there was fire from the crowd.

Mr. Seweil was unable to bury his son until Tuesday, he said, because the soldiers in tanks outside his house would not let him go to the hospital to retrieve the body. Mr. Seweil — who had another son, a fighter for the militant group Islamic Jihad, killed two years ago — said he was not sure whether he supported the firing of the rockets if the cost was so much destruction.

But he said he was furious with Israel.

"They kill," he said. "They do whatever they want. They demolish houses. They arrest people. This time, they had no mercy."

In a week when a Palestinian newspaper issued a rare public questioning of the wisdom of firing the rockets, many on the streets said they strongly supported it, no matter the price, simply because it scared the Israelis.

"We fire rockets to respond to what Israel is doing to our people," said Ibrahim Seweil, Yousef Seweil's brother, a policeman who said he was arrested during the operation and whose son was arrested, and let go, four times. "We are not sheep they can just slaughter."

Israel says the rocket attacks are unprovoked, particularly because the government emptied all settlements and military outposts from Gaza last year.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. Abbas, who is based in the West Bank, remained in Gaza for a second night in a row to try to form a national unity government that would put technocrats approved by both his Fatah party and Hamas, which controls the government, into cabinet posts.

The new government would seek to end the Palestinians' international isolation and win a restoration of Western aid, which was cut off after Hamas came to power this spring.

But the efforts had not yet produced a solution. Mr. Abbas reportedly rejected Hamas's proposed candidate to succeed Ismail Haniya, the current Hamas prime minister, and Hamas met for internal talks.

Israel Withdraws Most Forces From Gaza Strip (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 7 -- Israeli forces that had been engaged in operations in the northern Gaza Strip largely withdrew before dawn Tuesday, ending a military campaign that killed more than 60 Palestinians, more than half of them from the armed groups at war with the Jewish state.

DOJ_NMG_0091929

Some Israeli soldiers remain in northern Gaza, the main launch site for crude rockets that Palestinian guerrillas frequently fire into Israel, and armed Palestinians and Israeli forces clashed several times in the hours after the pullout, leaving at least seven Palestinians dead.

The six-day Israeli push into Beit Hanoun, an agricultural town of roughly 28,000 people, was designed to stop the rocket fire into Israel. The rockets, known as Qassams, pack little explosive force and rarely kill Israelis.

Although the rocket fire has been declining in recent months, it is still a daily menace to tens of thousands of Israelis who live near the Gaza border. The number of rockets that landed in and around the city of Sderot spiked during the operation, lightly injuring several Israelis.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz said military operations, usually airstrikes and artillery fire, would continue until the rocket attacks end. The Israeli military reported that five rockets landed in southern Israel -- four in the city of Ashkelon north of Gaza -- after it declared the operation over.

In a statement announcing the troop withdrawal, the Israeli military said it had seized "large amounts of weaponry" during the operation, which it dubbed Autumn Clouds. The war materiel seized included Qassam launchers, rocket-propelled grenades and launchers, mines, assault rifles and ammunition.

Israeli forces did not recover any sophisticated antitank weapons, or the Katyusha rockets that military officials have warned are being smuggled into Gaza through tunnels by the military wing of Hamas, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades. Hamas controls the Palestinian ministries.

The Israeli military said "dozens" of Palestinians were taken to Israel for questioning.

Palestinian health officials said 62 Palestinians, more than a third of them civilians, were killed in the Israeli operation.

The four largest armed groups said 37 of their gunmen were killed, the majority from Hamas's military wing. More than 250 other Palestinians were wounded, health officials said. Palestinian leaders described the operation as a massacre.

A 21-year-old Israeli soldier was killed on the first day of fighting. Several other soldiers were wounded, including two by a female suicide bomber.

A small number of Israeli tanks remained around the edge of Beit Hanoun, and Palestinian witnesses said a column of tanks and bulldozers moved into a coastal strip west of the city of Beit Lahiya, where forces operated in June and July against rocket launch sites.

After most tanks left the strip, Israeli military officials said, soldiers fired at two armed Palestinians near Beit Lahiya. The two men, identified as members of the radical Islamic Jihad movement, were killed.

Soon after, near the Jabalya refugee camp, Palestinian gunmen fired rocket-propelled grenades at Israeli forces, military officials said. The troops responded with tank fire, military officials said.

Palestinian witnesses said a shell hit the home of Jamila al-Shanti, a Hamas legislator who helped organize a women's demonstration last week at a mosque in Beit Hanoun that allowed dozens of gunmen to slip through an Israeli military cordon. Palestinian witnesses said Shanti's sister-in-law and two men belonging to Hamas's military wing were killed inside the house.

Israeli military officials said troops fired later at an armed Palestinian near Beit Lahiya. Palestinian health officials said the man, Nadar Abu al-Amreen, was killed, although it could not be immediately determined if he was affiliated with one of the armed groups.

An Israeli airstrike Tuesday afternoon on a car in northern Gaza killed one member of al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, an armed wing of the Fatah movement of Mahmoud Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority. Three others in the car were wounded.

Nicaraguans' Votes Are In, And Ortega Is Back (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 7 — As election officials finished the final vote tallies on Tuesday and his leading opponent conceded defeat, Daniel Ortega, the onetime cold-war nemesis of the United States, was assured of winning the presidency here and fulfilling his 16-year struggle to regain power.

With 91 percent of the vote counted from Sunday's balloting, Mr. Ortega led five other candidates with 38 percent of the vote, while the second-place candidate, Eduardo Montealegre, a conservative, trailed with 29 percent, election officials said Tuesday night. The third-place candidate, José Rizo, received 26 percent.

"With his triumph, he has taken on an enormous responsibility," Mr. Montealegre, a 51-year-old Harvard-trained banker, said as he stepped aside moments after the results were announced. "He has to govern democratically."

Later in the evening, Mr. Ortega and Mr. Montealegre appeared together at the Sandinista headquarters, where they pledged to put aside past differences. Mr. Ortega promised to keep the country open to foreign investment and to seek consensus with his political opponents to battle poverty.

"Here we cannot talk about winners or losers," he said. "Here simply we have a process where really everyone will work together for the good of Nicaragua."

About 300 of Mr. Ortega's supporters rallied outside the headquarters, waving their party's black and red flags and chanting "The people united will never be defeated." Across the city, fireworks and car horns went off in celebration.

Mr. Ortega, who is 60, maintains that both he and the country have changed since the 1980s, when he was a hard-line Marxist president accepting Soviet aid and fighting a United States-backed insurgency. The cold war is over, and Nicaragua's economy now depends heavily on exports to the United States and free markets.

While Mr. Ortega still rails against "savage capitalism" and the failure of free trade to alleviate poverty, he has become a more pragmatic leftist over the past decade and a half. Gone is the fiery Marxist oratory, replaced with talk of reconciliation, peace and God. He has traded his anti-American campaign songs for John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance."

He has also become openly religious, regularly attending church and often asking people at his rallies to pray. He even pushed through a bill to ban abortion recently, in part to attract Catholic support.

Still, no one is sure how much of the change in Mr. Ortega's political outlook is real. Many business leaders and political analysts say the future of this impoverished country may hinge not just on whether Mr. Ortega's style has evolved, but whether Nicaragua's democracy is strong enough to keep a leftist president with an authoritarian past in check.

"If he hasn't changed, he will have to change, because it's not the same Nicaragua in 2006 as the Nicaragua in which he came to power at the head of a revolutionary movement," said Carlos Tunnerman, a political analyst.

The United States has made it clear that it does not like the prospect of its cold war foe returning to power, especially in light of Mr. Ortega's close relationship with President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela. Still, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the United States would respect the decision of the Nicaraguan people and see what policies the next government follows before making decisions about future relations. Bush administration officials had threatened before the vote to suspend aid if Mr. Ortega won.

Former President Jimmy Carter monitored the polling here and said the election was clean and fair. He said Mr. Ortega had given him assurances Monday night that he would respect property rights, civil liberties, free enterprise and the free trade agreement with the United States.

Business leaders said they were confident Mr. Ortega would not roll back the free-market reforms in the Nicaraguan government since 1990, when he agreed to hold an election to end the civil war and lost to Violeta Chamorro.

Since then, the government has sold off more than 360 state-owned enterprises, liberalized its markets, privatized the banks and entered a free trade agreement with the United States and its neighbors.

Erwin J. Kruger, president of the Superior Council of the Private Sector, the nation's largest business group, said Mr. Ortega and his party, the Sandinista National Liberation Front, had given assurances they would not dismantle the free-market economy.

"We don't know how he's going to be tomorrow, or next month, or next year, but we are going to give it a chance," Mr. Kruger said. "We paid a high price for our freedom and neither side wants to lose that."

Most political strategists said Mr. Ortega won because the conservative anti-Sandinista vote split in two.

After former President Arnoldo Alemán was convicted on corruption charges, Mr. Montealegre and other conservatives broke away from the governing Constitutionalist Liberal Party and formed the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance. As a result, Mr. Montealegre and Mr. Rizo, who carried the banner for the old ruling party, divided the voters who had consistently opposed Mr. Ortega and the Sandinistas in past elections, defeating him three times.

Mr. Ortega's ability to enact radical challenges is severely hampered by the National Assembly, which remains divided between four parties. To rule, he must reach agreements with the two conservative parties. What is more, the president's power has been curbed by constitutional changes pushed through in recent years, giving the assembly more say over cabinet positions.

Even members of Mr. Ortega's party said he had not won a popular mandate to make radical changes, like the expropriation of private businesses or the redistribution of land, as he did in the late 1980s.

"The important point is not what he wants to do, the important thing is what is feasible to do," said Alejandro Martínez Cuenca, an economist and member of the Sandinista party. "Nicaragua has changed tremendously. The mandate he has received does not give him the opportunity to do his will."

Ortega Wins Back Presidency Of Nicaragua (WP)

By N.C. Aizenman

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Nov. 7 -- Former Marxist revolutionary Daniel Ortega won back Nicaragua's presidency, according to updated results released Tuesday.

With 91 percent of precincts reporting, the Cold War icon continued his lead with 38 percent of the ballots cast in Sunday's vote, assuring a first-round victory. Under Nicaraguan election law, a candidate can win a first-round with 35 percent of ballots and a five-point lead.

Ortega's closest contender, Eduardo Montealegre of the Nicaraguan Liberal Alliance, conceded the election late Tuesday after garnering 29 percent of the vote.

Jos? Rizo of the Constitutionalist Liberal Party had 26 percent, Edmundo Jarquin of the Sandinista Renovation Movement had 6 percent, and Eden Pastora, a Sandinista commander who turned against his former comrades and led an anti-Sandinista rebel force in the 1980s, had less than 1 percent.

Ortega was more solemn than jubilant as he accepted Montealegre's congratulations at a joint appearance Tuesday night.

"We can't talk of winners or of losers," he said. "This is simply a process in which we all need to work together for the good of Nicaragua."

The results indicated that Ortega's Sandinista National Liberation Front will hold the largest number of seats in the National Assembly, but will not have a majority, forcing the party to form alliances with three other political factions to pass legislation, according to analysts.

In the waning weeks of the campaign, Bush administration officials issued veiled threats that the United States might impose punitive measures such as a trade embargo if Ortega was elected.

At his daily briefing Tuesday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack spoke in more measured tones.

"We, in the United States, have made a commitment to the Nicaraguan people," he said. He added that certain portions of U.S. aid agreements to Nicaragua were negotiated "with some areas of Nicaragua which I think are actually under the . . . political leadership of Mr. Ortega's party. So they have an interest in continuing that relationship."

But McCormack cautioned that the results were not yet final. "We'll see what government this election produces. We'll see what the platform of that government is," he concluded.

Former Marxist Elected President In Nicaragua (CHIT)

By Oscar Avila

Chicago Tribune, November 8, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua -- Daniel Ortega completed a remarkable comeback Tuesday when the former Marxist revolutionary leader came out on top in a bitter presidential election that U.S. officials fear will give them a new left-wing antagonist in Latin America.

Nearly two decades after the U.S.-financed contra rebels helped drive Ortega from office, the Sandinista leader's victory poses a new challenge in the region for the Bush administration, which must decide whether to treat Ortega as an enemy or accept his assurances that he has moderated his views.

The U.S. State Department said Tuesday that the Bush administration would wait to see the shape of a new Nicaraguan government. But several U.S. officials warned that aid and immigrant remittances to the hemisphere's second-poorest nation would be in jeopardy if Ortega became president and aligned himself with leftist President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela.

In his fourth attempt to return to power, Ortega won a comfortable victory over four rivals, including Eduardo Montealegre, a Harvard-educated banker and former government minister who enjoyed U.S. backing.

The Supreme Electoral Council said Tuesday evening that with 91.5 percent of the votes counted, Ortega had 38.1 percent, followed by Montealegre with 29 percent and former Vice President Jose Rizo of the ruling right-wing party with 26.2 percent. Two other candidates trailed far behind.

Roberto Rivas, president of the Supreme Electoral Council, told a national television audience that he expected the margin to increase when the final votes are counted. He urged the losing parties not to question the results.

"Our candidates should have a reasonable attitude and accept the will of the people," Rivas said.

To win, Ortega needed only 35 percent of the vote and a margin of 5 percentage points over his nearest rival under new election rules he helped enact through his influence in congress. He benefited from a split on the right between Rizo and Montealegre, who had enough combined votes to defeat him.

Most observers said he was certain to lose in a December runoff if his opponents united around one candidate against him.

Two respected independent watchdogs, the Institute for Development and Democracy and the civic group Ethics and Transparency, already declared Ortega the winner.

After a full day of counting, Montealegre appeared Tuesday evening and said he called Ortega to congratulate him. "With this triumph, he acquires an enormous responsibility," Montealegre said.

He urged Ortega and the other political parties to reconcile. "We invite them to work to build this diverse alliance to elevate Nicaragua toward its maximum social and economic development."

During the campaign, Montealegre and Ortega's other opponents warned voters that voting for Ortega would return them to the dark days of the 1980s civil war and a crippled economy.

But during the campaign, Ortega reinvented himself as the candidate of reconciliation, welcoming a former contra leader as his running mate and sounding more like an evangelist when he urged massive crowds to vote for love and peace.

He reassured business leaders that he had shed his socialist ideas and would honor the Central American Free Trade Agreement with the U.S.

Since the first results came in early Monday, Sandinista loyalists in the capital have rejoiced by launching fireworks and waving the party's black-and-red flags in slums and around upscale shopping centers. National and international observers praised Sunday's election and its aftermath as remarkably peaceful and orderly.

Representatives from an estimated 16,000 national and international observers noted voting glitches, such as the delay of results from rural areas, polling sites that opened late or closed early, and observers being denied entry.

But the consensus of the observers, which included the Carter Center, European Union and the Organization of American States, was that the glitches would not affect the outcome.

As Ortega surged to a lead in pre-election opinion surveys, U.S. officials reacted with dismay. The commerce secretary warned Nicaraguan voters that foreign aid was in jeopardy if Ortega won. Even Oliver North, the former Reagan administration official at the center of the Iran-contra scandal, traveled here to try to stave off an Ortega victory.

Some U.S. officials and lawmakers had expressed fears that Ortega will reject the nascent Central American Free Trade Agreement, work with states linked to terrorism and align with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who has pursued an ardently anti-American foreign policy.

Cuban and Venezuelan officials greeted news of an Ortega victory as a step forward for their vision to integrate nations in the region that oppose U.S. policy and influence there.

"Latin America is ceasing to be … a backyard of U.S. imperialism. Yankee, go home!" Chavez said in Venezuela.

Earlier Tuesday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack toned down some of the anti-Ortega rhetoric some U.S. officials used in recent days, noting that the Sandinistas played a role in ratifying CAFTA and working with the U.S. on issues such as debt relief. He reserved further comment until the final election results.

"We'll see what government this election produces. We'll see what the platform of that government is. But we have very clearly demonstrated our commitment to the Nicaraguan people," he said.

Former President Jimmy Carter, who headed the Carter Center's observation team and criticized U.S. threats related to the election, said he hopes Ortega's domestic and international opponents give him the time to restore the bridges burned during the campaign.

"He has an opportunity here to heal this country and to heal the disparity between Nicaragua and the United States," Carter said. "It will be up to him to make that happen."

Manuel Orozco, an analyst with the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington think tank, added that Washington's hostility could push Ortega into Venezuela's arms.

"If the U.S. wants to make Nicaragua out to be an evil country, it will turn into one," Orozco said. "We have made so many mistakes in creating enemies. Nicaragua is a prime candidate."

Orozco agreed with Carter that the burden also rests on Ortega, the self-described candidate of reconciliation. "The next few weeks will test the sincerity of that rhetoric," he said.

Ortega Appears Set For Nicaragua's Presidency (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, November 8, 2006

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA

Sixteen years after falling from power, Daniel Ortega, the former Marxist revolutionary who battled US-backed rebel forces in Nicaragua throughout the 1980s, appeared to emerge victorious in Sunday's presidential election, according to preliminary results and quick counts by two of the country's respected observer groups.

With official results in from more than 60 percent of polling stations, Mr. Ortega has 38.6 percent of the vote. He needs to win at least 35 percent and hold a lead of 5 points to avoid a December runoff election. Eduardo Montealegre, a Harvard-educated conservative backed by Washington, trails him by 8 percentage points.

The win would deal a blow to the US, which has been keeping a close eye on their old cold war foe. US politicians warned that US aid and investment would wane in this Central American country - one of the hemisphere's poorest - if Ortega, an ally of Venezuela's president Hugo Chávez, retook the helm of Nicaragua.

It would be a remarkable win for Ortega, who had lost three consecutive bids for the presidency and has, over the years, made just as many enemies in Nicaragua as in Washington. The two leading conservative candidates splintered the vote - boosting Ortega's chances to acquire enough support to avoid a runoff, which most analysts say he would lose.

But Ortega has also drawn many voters who say that 16 years of conservative, Washington-backed administrations here have left them poorer than they were. Many say they have put the war behind them and believe Ortega when he says he has evolved into the only candidate who can bring the nation together.

"The split between the conservatives is fundamental to the outcome," says Wilmar Cuarezma, who studies Nicaragua's governability at the nonprofit Institute for Nicaraguan Studies in Managua. "But most important is people feel that the conservatives abandoned the poor, that poverty has increased. Public services have gotten too expensive and are not accessible to most of the people anymore."

This sentiment mirrors a leftward trend in the region, where voters in Brazil, Bolivia, Peru, and elsewhere have demonstrated their fatigue with conservative policies.

Campaign ads by Ortega's opponents depicted him in army fatigues, a reminder of the war that wreaked havoc on Nicaragua throughout the '80s. But Ortega fashioned an image makeover, touting reconciliation and solidarity. On the campaign trail, he often said the war was buried forever. He spoke often of God, said the country needed a spiritual revolution, and even adopted John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance" as his theme song.

Apparently, the new Ortega resonated with voters. Ilario López, a retired city worker, voted for conservative candidates throughout the '90s because he says he felt they would improve the country's economy. But he has been disappointed. "I am willing to give him [Ortega] another chance," says Mr. López. "If we don't have work, we don't have money, and we all suffer. He is not a guerrilla; he is our only hope to live in peace."

Sunday night and Monday, Ortega supporters took to the streets, setting off celebratory fireworks and waving black-and-red flags of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN), from the backs of pickup trucks.

Analysts say that Ortega would have a difficult run in a second round, since the vote between the two conservative candidates was split. Indeed many of those voting for Mr. Montealegre or José Rizo, the other conservative, who is currently in third place with 22.93 percent, say they felt more strongly about Ortega losing than their own candidate of choice winning.

"I wouldn't mind if this went into a second round, because it would mean Ortega wouldn't win," says Manuel Cabrera, an accountant in Managua who cast his ballot for runner-up Montealegre. "The US has helped us a lot, and we are going to continue needing their economic assistance. I'm afraid an Ortega victory will ruin those relationships. He will care more about Venezuela and Cuba, and not our friends who have helped us." Crying foul

The race saw a huge voter turnout, at over 70 percent. But Montealegre said the celebrations were premature. "No one has won here," he said as initial results trickled in. "The Nicaraguan people, in a runoff, will determine the next president."

The US Embassy released a statement saying it was too soon to "make an overall judgment on the fairness and transparency of the process," it read. "We are receiving reports of some anomalies in the electoral process."

Some here say the election was unfair at the outset because Ortega helped to lower the threshold for victory from 45 to 35 percent, with a five-point difference between the two leading candidates. He pushed through electoral-law changes with former president Arnoldo Alemán, who is now serving a 20-year sentence for embezzlement. "That can only happen in a country run by two gangsters," says Otto Reich, who was a senior official in the Reagan administration when it backed the Contra rebels against Ortega. "Ortega was willing to throw his country to the wolves" in order to win the presidency.

The US was not shy about voicing its dissatisfaction with an Ortega win, saying that aid and investment were likely to wane if he were in power. Some here now wonder whether US threats to block remittances or rethink free-trade agreements backfired.

"For Washington, it's clear that a lot of bravado and warnings did not really pay off," says Michael Shifter, vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue in Washington. If Ortega does emerge victorious, he says that "there is a lot of uncertainty about what direction he'll take. He is clearly an ally of Chávez, but what does that mean being the president of Nicaragua?"

Mr. Chávez sent fertilizer and cheap fuel to Nicaragua ahead of the election in what many claimed was a bid to bring voters into Ortega's fold, especially since Nicaragua has suffered an energy crisis in part because of the high cost of oil.

Ortega has promised to work with business leaders and has backed a trade deal with the US. He stopped short of claiming victory Monday night but said that, whoever wins, he's ready to work with other parties to "eradicate poverty and reassure the private sector and international investors."

Panama To Join Security Council (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0091934

The Los Angeles Times, November 8, 2006

It wins the two-year seat that Guatemala and Venezuela had sought.

UNITED NATIONS — Panama won a two-year term on the Security Council on Tuesday, making the powerful body's composition for 2007 much less contrarian than the U.S. had feared should Venezuela have won the Latin American seat.

But the new council still will include voices that could challenge the United States, such as South Africa, a leader of developing nations.

Panama emerged last week as the compromise candidate to fill the regional seat, ending a protracted standoff between U.S.-backed Guatemala and Venezuela, a vocal critic of Washington's policies. Panama received 164 votes in the 48th round of voting in the General Assembly, to applause and cheers in the vaulted chamber.

Venezuela had portrayed itself as a challenger to U.S. dominance at the United Nations and a champion of developing nations. But it lost backing after its leader, Hugo Chavez, called President Bush "the devil" and decried the world body as "useless" in a speech here in September.

However, active U.S. lobbying on behalf of Guatemala cost that country some support, diplomats say. Neither Latin American nation could garner the two-thirds majority among the 192 U.N. members needed to be elected, leading them to withdraw in favor of Panama.

Venezuela's ambassador to the U.N., Francisco Javier Arias Cardenas, said that the United States' support for Guatemala turned out to be a "fatal embrace" and that Washington should learn not to intervene in regional affairs. But he said that Panama was a good choice and served as "bridge between Central and South America."

Guatemalan Ambassador Jorge Skinner-Klee said that his country carried out its campaign with dignity and regretted being embroiled in a proxy battle. Guatemala will seek a seat in 2012, he said.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton welcomed Panama to the council. The "risk of disruption" posed by Venezuela had been eliminated, he said, and therefore Bush administration objectives achieved.

The U.S. and other countries had feared that Venezuela would use the Security Council as a stage to vocally oppose developed countries and to block action on its allies, North Korea and Iran.

Panama, though a small country, is seen as a unifier of the disparate parts of the region, and its ambassador at the world body, Ricardo Alberto Arias, has been active in the reform of the U.N. human rights commission.

Panama will take the seat Jan. 1, as one of five new nonpermanent members of the Security Council. The others, in addition to South Africa, are Belgium, Indonesia and Italy. The five countries that will serve one more year in the 10 rotating council seats are Congo, Ghana, Peru, Qatar and Slovakia.

The council has five permanent members: the U.S., Britain, China, France and Russia. They have veto power and compete for the support of rotating members during disagreements.

With Venezuela sidelined, the new council should function smoothly, analysts said Tuesday.

"It is a pretty lively crew. They are not rubber stamps," said Edward Luck, director of the Center on International Organization at Columbia University. "South Africa will have their differences with the United States. It is important to have states with a strong voice and real regional security role, which South Africa does."

Indonesia, which has the world's largest Muslim population, will be an additional voice for Islamic interests, along with the Persian Gulf nation of Qatar.

Italy has been striving for a greater role in the U.N. system and is sharing with France the command of peacekeeping forces in Lebanon. "Italy is clearly trying to show it could be a political player," Luck said.

WTO Entry No Cure-All For Vietnam Hanoi's 'Nonmarket' Status Will Give Trading Partners A Leg Up In Negotiations By JAMES HOOKWAY (WSJ)

Vietnam was formally invited to join the World Trade Organization after more than a decade of entry talks in which it steadily reduced its tariffs and pledged to open its banking sector.

But the Communist-run country still faces obstacles to expanding its trade: The world's major trading nations, for now, continue to consider it a "nonmarket economy." That means Hanoi is vulnerable to claims that it subsidizes its exports and dumps them on the world's markets, analysts say.

Vietnam, the fastest-growing Asian economy after China in recent years, has already concluded bilateral trade deals with major trading partners such as the European Union, Japan and Australia. Since the U.S. normalized trading relations with its former adversary in 2001, trade between the two has quadrupled to almost $8 billion a year.

Congress is expected to vote on whether to grant Vietnam "permanent normal trading relations" by year's end.

With 84 million people, Vietnam has been the second-largest economy, after Russia, that wasn't a member of the global trade group. The country is an increasingly attractive destination for foreign investment. Intel Corp., for instance, has begun work on a $300 million semiconductor factory in southern Vietnam and is considering increasing that investment, Vietnamese officials say. The Asian Development Bank expects Vietnam's economy to grow 7.8% this year.

As the WTO's 150th member, Vietnam will likely attract more foreign investment, analysts say. In particular, the country will benefit from the removal of quotas that limit its textile exports to Europe and the U.S.

But with WTO membership, which is expected around year's end, Hanoi will have to give up subsidies and tax breaks for domestic companies, as well as open up its markets to foreign competition.

Until Vietnam takes these steps -- something that could take years -- it will be regarded as a nonmarket economy, enabling rivals to accuse it of using state subsidies to give domestic companies an unfair advantage.

In the past few years, the U.S. has imposed antidumping tariffs on Vietnam's catfish and shrimp exports; in October, the EU decided to impose antidumping duties on Vietnamese shoe imports. Although joining the WTO won't necessarily remove those tariffs, Vietnam will have the option of challenging their legality within the WTO.

Vietnam suffers from other homegrown impediments to its continued strong economic growth. The quality of its infrastructure lags behind that of regional competitors such as China and Thailand. Corruption also is endemic, affecting nearly every aspect of life in the country.

Vietnam's human-rights record grates with some of its trading partners, too. On Friday, a court in Ho Chi Minh City will try seven people, including three Americans of Vietnamese descent, for an alleged attempt to take over state radio stations to call for a popular revolt against the country's Communist leaders. Penalties for conviction could range from 12 years in prison to execution by firing squad. Yesterday, the Bush administration urged Vietnam to give the three U.S. citizens a fair trial.

Sen. Mel Martinez (R., Fla.) has raised the case of one of the defendants in an attempt to block the latest trade bill on Vietnam, which President Bush hopes to sign before visiting the country during a summit of Asia and Pacific leaders in mid-November.

Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung told a visiting American business delegation in Hanoi yesterday that during Mr. Bush's visit, he would like Vietnam to be granted the status of a country with "permanent normal trade relations" with the U.S.

Certain issues continue to worry foreign investors. They are keeping a close watch on a government investigation into Dutch bank ABN Amro Holding NV. Vietnamese authorities allege ABN Amro employees illegally traded with officials from a state-owned bank, resulting in a loss of $5.4 million for the state bank. Two ABN Amro employees have been detained in jail pending charges, while two others are under house arrest.

ABN Amro officials have said the bank did nothing wrong and it stands by the trades, which took place over the course of three years and have already been settled. Other foreign banks have voiced concern about how Vietnamese authorities appear to be criminalizing normal trading practices, raising questions about whether Vietnam is ready to join the international trading community.

In a directive last week, Mr. Dung urged police to complete their investigation. He also indicated no one would be convicted if ABN Amro repays the state bank's foreign-exchange losses.

Vietnam Schedules Terror Trial Of Three U.S. Citizens For Friday (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

Three U.S. citizens, including a Florida woman whose case has thwarted passage of a major trade deal between Vietnam and the United States, will be tried on charges of terrorism in Ho Chi Minh City People's Court on Friday, a Vietnamese judge announced yesterday.

The trial, expected to last a day, will take place just a week before President Bush is to due to arrive in Hanoi for an Asian economic summit. Bush hopes to win congressional approval for the trade bill before departure, but Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.) has prevented the bill from coming to the floor of the Senate until the woman's case is resolved.

Thong Nguyen "Cuc" Foshee, 58, of Orlando, was arrested 13 months ago and held without charges until last week, after news reports of Martinez's action appeared. The two other U.S. citizens are Le Van "Phu" Binh and Huynh Bich "Linda" Lien. They will be tried with four Vietnamese nationals charged with similar crimes.

Bui Hoang Danh, the court's chief judge, said in a statement that the terrorism charges could result in sentences of at least 12 years, or even death.

Nhan Dan, the Communist Party newspaper, said the defendants were accused of bringing 14 radio transmitters and five generators into Vietnam, planning to seize control of the official Voice of Vietnam radio, and calling for an uprising against the government. The government accuses the seven defendants of working on behalf of the Government of Free Vietnam, a virulently anti-government group based in California that Vietnam considers a terrorist organization.

Elizabeth McCausland, Foshee's daughter, said her mother is associated with the group. McCausland said she did not know the extent of her mother's involvement or whether she is a member. She said her mother helped teach members about public speaking and democracy.

McCausland said yesterday that the local lawyer handling the case for her mother has still not been able to see Foshee or review the charges. "I don't know how it works there," she said, but she expected the lawyer to get access to his client and court documents before the trial.

"I'm hoping for a positive phone call on Friday," she said.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said yesterday that the Bush administration was monitoring the trial closely. "We have, for some time, asked that the judicial process move forward in one direction or another," with the defendants either charged or released, he said. "We want to make sure that these people, now that they have been charged, proceed through the judicial process in a way that is transparent, that fully respects their rights and that is done in a relatively speedy manner."

In A Calm Corner Of Darfur, Villagers Rebuild Ties (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

ARTALA, Sudan — Omar Abdul Aziz Gader cupped his hand over his eyes and scanned a landscape of scorched fields and mud huts reduced to rings of ash.

As a displaced person from Darfur, Mr. Gader found his options were not great. He could have stayed in the packed, increasingly unruly camp where he had been living for the past two years, or he could have ventured back to Artala, his native village, which was burned to the ground by nomadic raiders.

He decided to go home in September after learning that his corner of southwestern Darfur was actually rather peaceful, a place where nomads and farmers had begun to take halting steps toward reconciliation.

Much of Darfur, a vast swath of territory in western Sudan, is still a battlefield, with vicious fighting between the Sudanese government and rebel forces, and masses of people fleeing their villages each day.

But there are other parts, lesser known, where people are heading the other way, going home.

It is a journey that is also difficult, with homecomings that may prove to be short-lived. But aid workers estimate that there are several thousand returnees like Mr. Gader — and many more on their way.

Mr. Gader says he is looking ahead, building a new hut and planting onions, though at times the past seizes him.

“When I look at my old house,” he said, “I don’t feel fear. I feel shame.”

A vast majority of those who are returning are farmers, the primary victims of the bloodshed in Darfur. In this part of the world, lifestyle and ethnicity are closely connected, with most farmers belonging to non-Arab tribes, while most nomads consider themselves full-blooded Arabs.

The conflict has pitted these two groups against each other, though it wasn’t always like that.

Not so long ago, in the village of Wastani, near Artala, nomadic women and women from farms would meet in the fields halfway between their homes and share little glasses of tea.

The nomads, who herded camels and cows, would bring meat, and the farmers would bring grain, and they would trade with one another in a fragile tapestry of interdependence between two peoples surviving off the same slice of dry, unforgiving land.

“Sometimes I would sit for two days with them and steal jokes,” said Hawa Abdullah, a villager.

But then war came. Nomadic gunmen on horses — some of whom the farmers recognized, some they did not — raided Wastani in 2003, burning huts and shooting people in the chest. It was a nightmare that recurred countless times across Darfur, an area the size of France.

But now, for the first time since then, Wastani’s farmers are moving back, and the nomads are trying to make amends.

Ms. Abdullah said that shortly after she returned, an old Arab friend came to her house with a bundle of food in her arms and tears in her eyes.

"She said she was sorry, and was crying even more than I was," Ms. Abdullah said.

It is easy to oversimplify Darfur. The broad outlines of the conflict are that non-Arab tribes felt excluded from Sudan's Arab-led central government, and formed rebel groups to attack government forces. The government responded by arming Arab militias, who did not confront the rebels directly, but instead brutalized civilians who belonged to the same tribal groups as the rebels.

The conflict had been simmering for years, but major fighting erupted in 2003. Since then more than 200,000 people have been killed, and 2.5 million have fled their homes to seek shelter in camps. Despite a peace treaty signed this spring with one of the rebel groups, the killing continues, especially in northern Darfur, and many diplomats and aid experts have forecast a humanitarian disaster.

The American government and European allies have tried to press Sudan to allow United Nations peacekeepers to replace the relatively small force of African Union peacekeepers here, but the Sudanese government has refused, saying the situation in Darfur was not as dire as it has often been portrayed.

Some aspects of life appear to be getting better. A United Nations study released in October found that malnutrition and child mortality had decreased since 2004, and that people who were farming were better off than those squeezed into camps without any land.

Camp dwellers are watching all this cautiously. They have schools, water towers and medical clinics — the very things missing from Darfur's villages, and which planted the seeds of resentment in the first place. But many camps have morphed into giant villages, with thousands of huts packed together in long rows like streets.

Suleiman Ibrahim, an elder in Mukjar, a camp near Artala with 10,000 displaced people, said that he had heard about people returning home, some just 30 miles away, but that he still worried about armed bandits. "It's not safe out there," he said.

But many camps are not so safe either, with unchecked violence and rising tension between supporters of different rebel factions.

Mr. Gader, 32, spoke in hushed tones of camp politics and how some of the displaced people had called him a traitor for even thinking of going home, because they said it bolstered the government's claim that things were not so bad. Mr. Gader, who lived in a huge camp in southern Darfur called Kalma, with an estimated population of 100,000, said he, his wife and his two children had to leave in the middle of the night.

"We basically escaped," he said.

Aid workers and camp dwellers say camp elders have a vested financial interest in keeping as many people as possible in the camp, because the elders can make money by siphoning food aid and selling it in local markets. But the returnees are learning that home is a complicated place, too.

Artala, like Wastani, is a mixed community of farmers and nomads, and there is an unspoken rule not to talk about the conflict.

Wastani used to have a vibrant market every Sunday, when thousands of farmers flocked in from the fields, and nomads rode in from miles around to trade crops, livestock, tea, sugar, gossip and sometimes even the hands of their daughters.

During the years of conflict, the market emptied. James Wole, a team leader for CARE International, the large aid organization that was one of the first to go into Darfur, said the nomads eventually realized that they were hurting their own businesses, which is one reason they were eager for their old farming friends to come home.

"The truth is these people are very interdependent, in many practical ways," Mr. Wole said. Mohammed Ibrahim Dibba, the commander of an African Union peacekeeping base in Mukjar, said: "I hear these reports on the radio about genocide, but I don't see that coming, at least not here. The people are coming together — gradually."

Security remains a touchy issue. Farmers here said nobody had been killed in months, but many grumbled that the same bandits who raided their villages are now the policemen in town. Several farmers identified Adam Medani Hamad, a nomad who roams the area around Wastani with his two wives and dozens of cattle, as a janjaweed, a bandit. He denied that, and said he was a member of the local defense force. He even has a laminated yellow card to prove it.

"We didn't just welcome the farmers home, we brought them home," Mr. Hamad said, referring to the escorts that nomads provided for some of the returning farmers. In a nearby village, aid workers said a policeman had been killed trying to protect farmers from bandits.

CARE is trying to build on this momentum by helping farmers and nomads form joint committees to oversee agricultural and water issues.

But many farmers are still suspicious. Mr. Gader said his new hut would be made from straw, not mud. "You never know when we might be leaving again," he said.

And Ms. Abdullah said the food her Arab friend brought her in a fit of tears was very good. But it has been more than six months. And she has not seen the woman again.

Turkey And Europe: Why Strained Friendship Is Fraying (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

ISTANBUL, Nov. 7 — The already reluctant partnership between Turkey and the European Union looks increasingly as if it may be headed for a messy breakup, prompting many in Europe and the United States to ask an uncomfortable question: will the large, secular Muslim country then look east instead of west?

It is a question with potentially great consequences.

"If the E.U. turns its back on Turkey, it is the West that will be the big loser," warns Mehmet Dulger of the ruling Justice and Development Party and the chairman of the foreign affairs committee in Parliament. "The West would risk losing a vital bridge with the Islamic world at a time when having this bridge is more important than ever."

The mutual suspicion is reaching a crisis point. On Wednesday, the European Commission is to release a report critical of the progress Turkey has made toward conforming to European standards and toward qualifying for membership.

A more important deadline looms next month at a European summit meeting, where leaders could decide to suspend talks with Turkey on a number of problems, while continuing in other areas. This is something the group never did as it was expanding to its current 25 members.

Political analysts in Turkey say such a rebuff would intensify an anti-European backlash and play into the hands of nationalists and Islamists, some of whom are already asking whether the country should reject Europe before it rejects Turkey.

"Until recently, Turkey has been able to pursue pro-Western policies because public opinion believed this was in the national interest," said Soner Cagaptay, director of the Turkish research program at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "But with the E.U. constantly raising the bar for Turkey, Turks are questioning this accepted wisdom."

From Europe there are equal measures of exasperation.

"Patience with Turkey is running out," says Joost Lagendijk, a member of the Dutch Green Party and co-chairman of a committee dealing with Turkish issues in the European Parliament. It is not only the question of Turkey's reforming to meet European standards, but a wariness of admitting a poor, overwhelmingly Muslim country of 70 million with only 3 percent of its land geographically a part of Europe.

Those positions may harden with the European Commission report on Wednesday, which is expected to rebuke Turkey for the sluggish pace of political reforms. A draft of the report cited Turkey's refusal to meet a deadline this year to open its ports to the Greek-speaking part of Cyprus, an issue on which Turkey refuses to move. It also complains about the treatment of minorities, and a law limiting free speech that has made "insulting Turkishness" a crime.

The enlargement commissioner of the European Union, Olli Rehn of Finland, welcomed signals this week from Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan that he would consider reforming Turkey's code on free speech. But European officials say Turkish intransigence over Cyprus, a member of the union, leaves them with few alternatives other than to consider a partial suspension of entry talks.

But even a partial collapse of talks would have far-reaching consequences. Bordered by Iran, Iraq and Syria, secular Turkey is a powerful symbol of how democracy, capitalism and Islam can co-exist. At a time when Europe is struggling to integrate its 12 million Muslims, rejecting Turkey would give fodder to those Muslims who argue that the West will never accept them.

Faced with a barrage of criticism, some analysts say a dejected Turkey would look to the Middle East, Central Asia and North Africa as alternatives to Europe and the United States. A June poll by the Pew Research Center found that Turkish support for the United States had plummeted to 12 percent, from 23 percent last year. Support for the European Union plunged to 35 percent, half what it was two years ago.

Mr. Cagaptay argues that the Justice and Development Party, which has religious roots, has already been reorienting the country toward the Middle East and criticizing the United States. As an example he points to the American-led attack on Iraqi insurgents in Falluja, an attack that was labeled genocide by senior Turkish officials.

At the same time, he says, the European Union's continual snubbing of Turkey has played into the hands of Muslim conservatives, and all the while Prime Minister Erdogan "is preaching Muslim solidarity and consciousness," Mr. Cagaptay said.

At the beginning of the conflict in Lebanon in the summer, Mr. Erdogan criticized Israel for trying to "wipe out the Palestinians" in Lebanon. In the spring he invited top Palestinian officials to the capital, Ankara. A recent demonstration in Istanbul against Israel, which has maintained strong relations with Turkey, drew around 100,000 people; before the Erdogan era, Mr. Cagaptay said, a few hundred might have attended.

The appeal of the East was evident on a recent day at Cemberlitas Hamam, a monumental 16th-century Turkish bath, where a dozen men lay on a giant slab of steaming marble as they were pummeled by pot-bellied masseurs in an Ottoman tradition rooted in the Orient.

Kadir Uzun, 21, a Turkish engineer who lives in Germany, said the European Union's hardening stance was prompting Turks to question whether the Arab world would be more welcoming. "Many Turks feel like we are just wasting our time with the E.U., which will never accept a Muslim country," he said. "We are too Western to look toward Iran, but we are also too Eastern for the E.U."

Many Turkish analysts, officials and executives argue that looking to the East is not an option. For one thing, Turkey is viewed with deep suspicion there.

"We do not want to become overextended in the Middle East," says Sinan Ulgen, a former Turkish diplomat in Tripoli. "At the same time, the countries that were ruled by the Ottoman empire — Egypt, Jordan, Syria — are reluctant about Turkey having a leading role in the region."

Also, secularism is established in its Constitution, and Turkey is inextricably tied to the West, economically and strategically, by, among other things, a trade agreement with the European Union and membership in NATO. To these analysts and executives, it is less imperative to join Europe than it is to anchor Turkey to a membership process that assures political and economic reform.

But there are obvious signs that Islam is strengthening its grip on daily life. Members of Mr. Erdogan's party have set up zones where liquor is banned in accordance with Islam, though drinking has long been accepted in Turkish society. Secularists have looked with alarm at proposals for women-only parks in Istanbul and the introduction of government-recommended textbooks with Islamic themes, including a character in a Hans Christian Andersen story who wears a head scarf.

Rather than choosing between the Middle East or the West, a wounded Turkey could turn to the emerging economic giants of Russia, India and China in search of allies. Russia has expressed keen interest in using Turkey as a distribution point for energy supplies to the Middle East and the southern Mediterranean.

But Egemen Bagis, a senior adviser to Mr. Erdogan, counters that Turkey will stay moored to Europe, with or without the European Union.

"If the talks with the E.U. fail," he said, "we can be a prosperous, Western-looking democracy outside the E.U. Norway has done this, and so why can't we? We are undertaking reforms not for the E.U., but for the Turkish people."

Turkey And The European Union (NYT)

The New York Times, November 8, 2006

Turkey's negotiations to join the European Union — begun with high hopes — have become a sour affair. The latest blow will fall today, when the European Commission releases a report criticizing Turkey for slowing the pace of domestic reforms and refusing to normalize relations with Cyprus.

There is no mystery to either side's waning enthusiasm. Europeans, confronting the rise of violent Islamic radicalism, are wary about letting a huge Muslim country into the club. In Turkey, nationalists in and out of the military and Islamic fundamentalists are pressuring Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan to slow reforms. Their hand, in turn, has been strengthened by the anti-Turkey rhetoric spouting from some European politicians.

But none of that alters the fact that Turkey's basic trajectory remains westward, and that the European Union accession talks provide the strongest incentive to keep it on course.

On Sunday, Mr. Erdogan made an important conciliatory gesture, saying he was prepared to alter the infamous Article 301 of the Turkish penal code, which makes it illegal to insult Turkishness. Turkish nationalists have used the measure to harass pro-Western intellectuals — knowing that it will lessen Turkey's chances of joining the E.U. We urge Mr. Erdogan to scrap Article 301 as fast as he can.

That still leaves the vexed issue of Cyprus, which has become even harder to untangle now that the part of the island run by Greek Cypriots has been admitted to the European Union, leaving the Turkish enclave out in the cold. Turkey has valid grievances over that decision.

But the hard fact — as German Chancellor Angela Merkel warned this week — is that there can be no "business as usual" so long as Turkey keeps its ports closed to ships and planes coming from Cyprus. These are tough issues, but not intractable. They are certainly not a reason to abandon a process that is still very much in everyone's interest.

Appeals court to hear Bush appeal in domestic spying case

Appeals court to hear Bush appeal in domestic spying case

By DAVID KRAVETS

AP Legal Affairs Writer

SAN FRANCISCO_A federal appeals court agreed Tuesday to review a lower court's refusal to dismiss a lawsuit challenging President Bush's domestic eavesdropping program.

The government is appealing U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker's decision to keep the suit alive, despite assertions from the Bush administration that the case could expose government secrets and put the nation at risk. Walker ruled that warrantless eavesdropping has been so widely reported that there appears to be no danger of spilling secrets.

Tuesday's decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, based in San Francisco, means the appeals court will decide whether Walker was correct to allow the case to proceed to trial.

The lawsuit, brought by the Electronic Frontier Foundation, challenges President Bush's assertion that he can use his wartime powers to eavesdrop on Americans without a warrant. It accuses AT&T Inc. of illegally making communications on its networks available to the National Security Agency without warrants.

In its two-line order, the appeals court did not indicate when it would rule.

The president confirmed in December that the NSA has been conducting warrantless surveillance of calls and e-mails thought to involve al-Qaida terrorists if at least one of the parties to the communication is outside the United States.

The administration contends the program is legal and necessary, but has been mum on whether purely domestic calls and electronic communications are being monitored, as the lawsuit alleges.

About two dozen cases with similar allegations against other telecommunication companies have been consolidated in Walker's court. A hearing on how to proceed with those is scheduled before Walker later this month.

The case is Hepting v. United States, 06-8-0109.

CIA seeks more secrecy for key terrorism cases; The CIA is seeking special restrictions on lawyer-detainee relationships for high-value terrorism suspects who were recently dispatched to Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

BY CAROL ROSENBERG

Even as 14 top al Qaeda suspects are in U.S. military custody, the CIA is still trying to impose secrecy around the high-value detainees now held at the Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, detention center, including alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed.

The arena for the effort is the U.S. District Court of Judge Reggie Walton in Washington, D.C., where the government is seeking a still-undefined restriction on the attorney-client relationship in the case of Guantánamo captive Majid Khan, one of the 14.

The CIA argues that details of the man's three years of detention and interrogation at so-called black sites -- out of reach of the International Red Cross -- are national security secrets.

Khan's attorney, Gita Gutierrez, argues that the Bush administration's intent is not to safeguard national security but to cover up three years of extrajudicial detention of her client -- to ``conceal illegal or embarrassing executive conduct.''

LINKED TO PLOTS

Khan, 26, was captured in his native Pakistan in 2003. The White House says he is linked to a series of unsuccessful plots to blow up gas stations in the United States, poison U.S. water supplies and assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

It is not known where he was held or how he was interrogated to establish these links. He has not been charged with a crime.

At least some of the 14 men whom President Bush ordered handed over to the military this summer were reportedly submitted to harsh, classified interrogation techniques, including simulated drownings -- known as water-boarding -- to break their will.

Court documents filed by the government suggest that the 14 newest arrivals at Guantánamo, among them alleged Osama bin Laden deputies, would never be integrated into the general population of 437 or so captives for fear they would talk about their secret confinement to other captives, who could, in turn, pass on the details to their lawyers.

SECRET INFORMATION

In seeking to redefine attorney-client contacts, Justice Department lawyers offered a seven-page affidavit from CIA officer Marilyn Dorn, who describes herself as ''the information review officer for the National Clandestine Service.'' Her office, she says, decides what secret CIA documents can be provided to civilian U.S. courts without jeopardizing ``CIA interests, personnel or facilities.''

Because Khan was held for three years in a ''top secret'' program, she says ``he may have come into possession of information, including locations of detention, conditions of detention and alternative interrogation techniques.''

Attorney disclosure in court records of those details, she argues, could compromise clandestine relationships between the United States and its foreign allies.

SECURITY PROCESS

All civilian lawyers at the Guantánamo naval base already go through a rigorous security screening before they are allowed to visit; they then must turn over their notes to the military before they can leave the base. They can only disclose their contents by permission of a classification review team set up by the federal courts.

Now the CIA seeks a more restrictive review and disclosure process whose "particulars . . . are still being worked out," said Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist.

She could not say whether the government will again propose to eavesdrop on attorney-client meetings, authority a court refused to grant three years ago.

NO CIVILIAN COURTS

The Khan case also illustrates the ongoing Bush administration effort to curb civilian court intrusion at Guantánamo, a process that has evolved fitfully around 2 ½ years of court rulings on detainee rights:

First, it says, Khan, a Maryland high school graduate, cannot sue for his freedom in U.S. District Court because Congress has stripped Guantánamo captives of standard habeas corpus recourse.

If he does see a civilian lawyer, it adds, the contents of what he says should be subject to top-secret-style protections more severe than current secrecy reviews.

"As each day passes, the likelihood increases that petitioner Khan will suffer from memory loss and other psychological injuries that will impede his capacity to assist in his representation," Khan's lawyer argues.

Counters Blomquist: ``Khan's and other cases may involve unique, potentially highly classified information not involved in prior Guantánamo cases."

Gutierrez is already acquainted with the Bush administration's tough interrogation policies through an earlier Guantánamo client -- a Saudi named Mohammed al Qahtani whom the Pentagon subjected to such severe interrogation techniques at the naval base that FBI agents protested to headquarters.

Supreme Court Will Hear Arguments On 'Partial-Birth' Abortion Ban

BY JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN - Staff Reporter of the Sun

November 8, 2006The U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments in two cases today on the legality of the federal ban on "partial-birth" abortions.

The court is asked to decide whether a 2003 law outlawing the procedure is unconstitutional because it lacks an exception for the pregnant woman's health. This is not a new question for the court, which six years ago struck down, 5–4, a Nebraska law that also lacked a health exception.

But the Supreme Court's roster has changed dramatically since the court decided Stenberg v. Carhart, the Nebraska case. Justice O'Connor, who sided with the majority in the case, retired this year.

Her replacement, Justice Alito, could cast the deciding vote to uphold the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act. Alternatively, Justice Kennedy may switch from his position as a dissenter in Stenberg to vote against the law if he finds the question worth deciding to be how much deference the Supreme Court owes Congress.

In some ways, it is surprising that legal observers could be most interested in Justice Kennedy's response to today's arguments, which are scheduled to last two hours.

Justice Kennedy wrote a mournful dissent in Stenberg, chiding the majority for considering the "partial birth" abortion procedure from the vantage of the "abortionist" instead of from "the perspective of a society shocked when confronted with a new method of ending human life."

The "partial birth" abortion debate returns to the Supreme Court this time laden with constitutional questions that were absent from Stenberg. One of the questions is how much deference the court must give to Congress's finding that a health exception is unnecessary because the procedure is never required to protect a pregnant woman.

In Stenberg, the Supreme Court did not arrive at that conclusion. The court could question whether Congress chose to substitute its own constitutional judgment when it should have deferred to the court's findings in Stenberg.

In cases in other areas, Justice Kennedy has carefully protected the court's role as the arbiter of the Constitution.

In an effort to cast doubt on the integrity of Congress's findings, 52 members of Congress who oppose the federal ban submitted an amicus brief saying that Congress's investigation of medical data was results-driven.

"The decision to omit a health exception was not based on any intervening change in medical fact, but founded upon a desire to challenge the prevailing constitutional standard that Stenberg affirmed," the brief reads.

Whether "partial birth" abortions are ever called for to preserve the health of the pregnant woman is debated by both sides. So is the precise definition of "partial birth" abortions and the frequency with which they are performed.

Whether the court is inclined to take offense at Congress's efforts to write over Stenberg is uncertain. There is nothing necessarily illegitimate with Congress asking the court to take a second look at a issue, one observer, law professor Eugene Volokh at the University of California at Los Angeles, said.

Also, the Supreme Court may be inclined to give more deference to a law of Congress than the laws of state legislatures, Mr. Volokh said.

The deciding factor, legal observers say, could be more mundane: a court takes its precedent seriously and is hesitant to overturn itself.

With that in mind, attorneys for Planned Parenthood Federation of America submitted a brief to the court, urging the justices to stand by Stenberg "regardless of whether a majority of this court agreed" with that decision.

The two cases are Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood and Gonzales v. Carhart. Both federal appeals courts to have heard one of the cases ruled the federal ban was unconstitutional.

Cancer center fined for Medicare charges; PALM SPRINGS: The whistle-blower alleged the Los Angeles firm overcharged the program.

By KIMBERLY PIERCEALL
The Press-Enterprise

An outpatient cancer center at Desert Regional Medical Center in Palm Springs will pay $900,000 to settle "whistle-blower" allegations it overcharged Medicare, according to the U.S. Department of Justice and lawyers with the case.

Los Angeles-based Comprehensive Cancer Centers Inc. paid $450,000 on Oct. 25 and is expected to pay the remainder by Dec. 8. The company had contracted with Desert Regional Medical Center and has admitted no wrongdoing.

According to the Justice Department, the company overcharged Medicare by $450,000 between 1997 and 2003 when it would "upcode" services, turning a simple exam into a full-blown physical by changing the computer code.

David Marshall, the company's lawyer, described it as a "mistake", not a malicious attempt to bilk Medicare.

"They are decent people and they're trying to work with a very complicated subject and they made a mistake," he said, referring to the employees that enter in the codes.

"Seventy-five thousand dollars annually over a six-year period doesn't sound like a comprehensive plan to in any way defraud the government."

As part of the settlement, the original lawsuit has been dismissed.

Tenet Healthcare Corp., owner of Desert Regional Medical Center and JFK Memorial Hospital in Indio, reached a $900 million settlement with Medicare in July on charges it overcharged the insurance program.

As a part of that settlement, Tenet agreed to pay Medicare $452,417 in connection with accusations it allowed the Comprehensive Cancer Center at Desert Regional to overcharge Medicare.

The case was filed in July 2003 by Kay Green after the former Desert Regional Medical Center hospital administrator had discovered the excessive charges through an internal e-mail and alerted her supervisors, according to her lawyer, Nanci Nishimura. She said the hospital fired Green in mid-2003 after working at the hospital since 1986, although Nishimura could not confirm Green's dismissal was retaliatory.

"It was with tremendous trepidation and fear and stress to do this," Nishimura said of Green's lawsuit.

Green will receive $189,000 of the settlement for her role in the case.

TERRORISM NEWS:

AP, November 9, 2006

(AP) - AMMAN, Jordan-Three Hamas militants went on trial Wednesday for conspiring to attack Israeli businessmen, Jordanian intelligence officers and various other locations in Jordan.

Ayman Naji Daraghmeh, 34, Ahmed Abu Rabee, 27, and Ahmed Abu Thiyab, appeared in court but did not submit pleas because they have not appointed lawyers. The trial adjourned to Nov. 15 to allow the defendants time to obtain counsel.

The defendants were also charged with illegal possession of weapons and ammunition.

In April, Jordanian authorities arrested 20 alleged Hamas militants on suspicion of monitoring Jordanian intelligence officers and foreigner tourists to plan for possible attacks. Authorities released all but the three, apparently for lack of evidence.

Al-Daraghmeh gave authorities the location of several weapons caches, the indictment sheet said.

The three, Jordanians of Palestinian origin, confessed in May on Jordanian state TV to conspiring to carry out terrorist attacks and to acquiring weapons and ammunition for Hamas. Al-Daraghmeh said he received he received orders from a high level Hamas leader living in Syria.

Hamas denied the accusations, claiming Jordan was attempting to undermine the Palestinian government, which it leads.

The militants were also charged with monitoring and photographing the Israeli embassy, the residences of the ambassador and other staff, as well as the offices of Jordanian businesses that have dealings with Israeli companies.

If convicted the three men could face the death penalty.

Four To Change Pleas In Northwest Ecoterrorism Case (AP)

By Jeff Barnard

AP, November 9, 2006

GRANTS PASS, Ore. (AP) — Four people awaiting trial on charges they were part of an ecoterrorism cell that caused $20 million in damages from firebombings around the Northwest are due in federal court on Thursday to change their pleas.

Attorneys for the defendants and the prosecution refused to comment on terms of the plea agreements that will be put before Judge Ann Aiken in U.S. District Court in Eugene.

A total of 13 people were indicted out of Eugene as part of an investigation known as Operation Backfire. Six have pleaded guilty, agreeing to testify against the others, and three are fugitives. A 14th person, Prescott, Ariz., bookstore owner William C. Rodgers, described as the leader of the cell, committed suicide in jail just before he was to be sent to Oregon to face charges.

Related cases are being prosecuted out of Washington and California.

The Oregon defendants were charged with arsons from 1996 to 2001 that were claimed by the Earth Liberation Front and the Animal Liberation Front in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado.

Authorities said a Eugene-based group calling itself The Family set firebombs around the Northwest to stop logging, wild horse roundups, genetic engineering of plants, sport utility vehicle sales and the expansion of a Vail, Colo., ski resort into endangered lynx habitat.

For years, investigators came up with little more than the remains of five-gallon plastic buckets that had been filled with diesel and ignited with homemade timing devices.

The firebombings stopped after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Then a special taskforce adopted a cold case approach and convinced an informant to go to members of The Family with a hidden recording device.

PATRIOT ACT:

Democratic Victory May Kill Surveillance Bills (GOVEXEC)

By Andrew Noyes, National Journal's Technology Daily

Government Executive, November 9, 2006

The new Democratic-led House could bode well for the civil-liberties crowd. The most pressing issue for the 110th Congress will be quashing efforts they say would allow the continuation of an eavesdropping program authorized by President Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the Washington office for the American Civil Liberties Union, said the shift in leadership may mean "a very profound change" in how lawmakers address the electronic wiretapping initiative of the National Security Agency.

Before recessing for the mid-term election, the House passed a bill, H.R. 5825, to overhaul rules for wiretaps without warrants. The Senate companion measure, S. 2453, did not get a floor vote.

Bush pushed hard in the run-up to the election for Congress to codify the program, Fredrickson said. "I think that is dead."

The House now can move ahead with "what it should have been doing right from the beginning," she said, which is figuring out the broadness of the program's scope, how many Americans have been spied on and what has been done with the information.

Lawmakers first must return for a short, post-election session, which she said could be "rife with danger." "It provides the greatest opportunity for late-night maneuvers," she said, adding that the ACLU will be vigilant in "scrubbing" any bills that pass.

Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, said her group will look to the new Congress to "be more skeptical of the president's claims that it's necessary to sacrifice civil liberties for national security."

Before House Intelligence or Judiciary committees take action on NSA spying or similar proposals that arise, she said she hopes they will "engage in the kind of vigorous oversight, investigation and fact-finding that really has been absent in the last four years."

There will probably not be "dramatic rollbacks of national-security-related legislation," like the controversial sections of the USA PATRIOT Act that were reinstated by the 109th Congress, Harris said. One provision involves a special subpoena power that lets the FBI scour library and Internet provider files without search warrants.

George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley said he looks to the new House to exercise meaningful "oversight after a long and dangerous hiatus." Given the "largely comatose" status of the current Congress, a "great deal of improper or potentially criminal conduct" could have been ignored, he said.

The question of whether Democrats will fight hard on issues like torture and criminal rights for detainees also was on the minds of civil-liberties advocates. Fredrickson said the party will be "pretty cautious" with an eye toward winning the 2008 presidential election, and Turley agreed.

The party may be calculating "how they can avoid doing anything that's controversial," Fredrickson said, which would be "a real shame" because voters asked for change. "They don't want just a passive Democratic Party," she said.

Lisa Graves, deputy director for the Center for National Security Studies, said missteps that have been taken by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, a partnership between the FBI and local law enforcement agencies aimed at tackling terrorism, also must be examined. In particular, she cited reports revealed through Freedom of Information Act requests that the task force has spied on Americans who oppose the Iraq war and other administration policies.

One proposal offered this year would halt funding for the NSA's warrantless wiretapping and "help restore the rule of law," Graves said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Rights Panel Weighs FBI Tactics In Hamoodi Search (COLTRIB)

By MATTHEW LeBLANC

Columbia (MO) Tribune, November 9, 2006

The Columbia Human Rights Commission will consider asking the city council to approve a resolution in support of an Iraqi-American man whose southwest Columbia home was raided by the FBI.

Hamoodi

Federal agents in September searched the Woodberry Court home of Shakir Hamoodi. The FBI has since repeatedly declined to give a reason for the search involving the 54-year-old grocery store owner who also has been an outspoken critic of the Iraq war.

At a meeting last night, supporters of Hamoodi urged commission members to accept a draft resolution that calls for the government to speed up its investigation and publicly release its findings. The measure also asks the FBI to apologize to Hamoodi and his family for searching the home.

Steve Jacobs, a peace activist who spoke last night at the meeting, said the resolution does not claim Hamoodi did nothing wrong. He said the measure was designed to show support for Hamoodi and the local Muslim community.

"We feel like one of our own is being unnecessarily targeted for harassment," Jacobs said. "We think these sort of symbolic actions would go far to show the FBI that we support" Hamoodi.

After hearing a speech by Jacobs that portrayed Hamoodi as a business owner and charity worker caught in a web of investigative excess, commission members expressed some reservations about whether forwarding the resolution to the city council would be appropriate.

In the end, the human rights panel agreed to consider the measure - but only with the consent of Hamoodi, who was not present.

Glenn Glasgow, who represents the Fifth Ward on the commission, said commissioners typically receive complaints from those who believe their rights have been violated. After that, he said, an investigation is conducted.

Hamoodi has not contacted the commission.

"Even in the absence of a complaint, all we really have are a lot of conclusions about what happened to Shakir, but nothing from him," Glasgow said.

Commission Chairwoman Marie Glaze said the panel would contact Hamoodi and then review the resolution. A report would later be sent to the city council.

"We're going to do this as quickly as we can," Glaze said.

Hamoodi said yesterday he was "surprised" at the show of support, but did not say whether he would agree to the resolution.

It is also unclear whether the city council would agree to accept the resolution. In the past, the panel has been reluctant to vote on issues that do not directly involve things related to city policy.

City Counselor Fred Boeckmann cautioned that "the commission does not have jurisdiction over the FBI" and questioned the usefulness of a resolution.

"It seems like the right thing to do in our society," Hamoodi supporter Jeff Stack said yesterday.

Jeff Lanza, a spokesman for the FBI office in Kansas City, declined to offer more information on the Hamoodi case.

F.B.I. Evacuates Part Fort Hood Housing Development (NBC6CTX)

NBC 6 Central Texas, November 9, 2006

Part of a housing development on Fort Hood remained evacuated through Wednesday night.

An F.B.I. spokesperson said a soldier returned from Iraq and noticed items missing from his luggage.

Replacing those items was a jar filled with an unfamiliar substance. The soldier called Fort Hood authorities.

Initial testing by the F.B.I. and Fort Hood showed it might have dangerous materials, but upon further testing, it was found not to be hazardous.

Fort Hood is still investigating its origins. Residents from the Kuma Village were housed off post for the night, but are allowed to return home Thursday.

Agency Considers A-Plants' Vulnerability (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

WASHINGTON, Nov 8 — With construction of many new nuclear reactors under discussion, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is grappling with the question of whether they should be designed to withstand a Sept. 11-style airplane attack.

The commission has told its staff to study the vulnerabilities of the four new reactor designs, two of which it has already approved. But it has decided not to make the nuclear power industry meet security requirements any tougher than those for existing plants, which were designed before suicide airliner attacks, and even before the development of such airplanes.

Planes are not on the list of weapons that reactors must be prepared to survive. One of the five commissioners, Gregory B. Jaczko, has called for the panel to require design changes to reduce vulnerability, but the other four seem unpersuaded.

Speaking about protection against aircraft attacks, Mr. Jaczko said in an interview, "We've left it in the hands of Transportation Security Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration and the reactor vendors, who are building these plants, to do what they think is right in this area, and to me that's clearly not the answer."

"We should be requiring they design these plants to withstand such attacks," he said.

One of one of the four new reactor designs, called the European Pressurized Reactor, is advertised as being less vulnerable to planes.

The commission has required that operators of reactors that are already producing electricity plan what steps they would take in case of airplane attacks to mitigate the effect and minimize releases of radiation. Mr. Jaczko said that improving the new designs before concrete was poured could sharply reduce the number of "mitigating actions" the operators would have to take a plane.attack.

But another member of the commission, Edward McGaffigan Jr., said, "We think we've done enough."

In analyzing security, nuclear engineers talk about multiple components that an attacker would have to reach and disable, which they call "target sets." New reactors, Mr. McGaffigan said, have "a terribly complex set of target sets that makes it highly improbable that a terrorist would succeed."

The commission should not make companies that want licenses to build and operate plants treat an airplane attack the way they would treat an earthquake, flood or other external threat for which they are already designed, he said.

A senior staff member of the commission said, "We want to be able to stand up to answer the logical question: 'Guys, did you look at the aircraft?' We want to be able to say yes, and we're confident that there is no issue, or if there is an issue, we've taken appropriate measures."

The staff member said the commission was stopping short of setting new requirements. He said he could not be identified because he was talking about matters that the five commissioners had not yet settled on.

At the Nuclear Energy Institute, the industry's trade association, Adrian Heymer, senior director for new plant deployment, said designers had analyzed existing plants and made many changes that cost little but made the new designs more difficult to attack. But, in general, Mr. Heymer said, protecting against terrorism was a government function.

"Refineries, tall buildings, those are the responsibility of federal government to protect," he said.

The commission is scheduled to meet on Thursday at its headquarters in Rockville, Md., to discuss licensing procedures for new reactors.

At the Union of Concerned Scientists, an advocacy group, David Lochbaum, a nuclear engineer, said that in the early 1980s the commission had convened outside experts to talk about hardening new reactors against plane crashes.

Industry experts, Mr. Lochbaum said, talked about some simple steps. For example, backup electricity generators could be positioned on two sides of the plant instead of in one place. Control rooms could be put in less vulnerable spots, and the pools that hold radioactive spent fuel could be hardened. The studies were classified after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, he said.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, a critic of the nuclear power industry and the commission, says more should be done. In a statement, Mr. Markey said the commission should not only require design features to protect against airplane attacks but should also consider attacks by large truck bombs.

The commission has required substantial changes at existing reactors but has been reluctant to consider the threat of terrorism in the same way it handles other risks. For example, it has refused to consider the risk of terrorism in environmental impact statements, arguing that in contrast to earthquakes or mechanical failures, it does not know what probability to apply to attacks.

A California group, San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, won a decision in the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit saying the regulatory commission must consider terrorism.

Pacific Gas & Electric, a California utility, has asked the Supreme Court to hear the case.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Ousts Embattled Rumsfeld; Democrats Near Control Of Senate (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher, Peter Baker

DOJ_NMG_0091955

President Bush emerged from an election in which his party took what he described as a "thumping" and ousted Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday, saying that a "fresh perspective" is needed to guide the military through the difficult war in Iraq.

Speaking at a White House news conference the day after Democrats took control of the House of Representatives, and possibly the Senate, an apparently chastened and conciliatory Bush said he was nominating former CIA director Robert M. Gates to replace the long-embattled Rumsfeld.

After six years of a presidency that has been about drawing lines against the Democrats and taunting them as weak, Bush presented a sharp about-face in an appearance in the White House East Room. "What's changed today is the election is over," he said, "and the Democrats won."

Acknowledging that the elections amounted to a rebuke of Republican leadership, Bush said voters had signaled they wanted cooperation and problem-solving in Washington.

If anything, he seemed to greet defeat with an air of relief, as though the results had allowed him to abandon an all-is-well pretense that was increasingly at odds with his actual political circumstances.

He said that he had begun to contemplate Rumsfeld's exit before the election -- even while he was publicly vowing that he would keep the defense secretary through the end of his term and insisting that polls forecasting Republican defeat were wrong. "I thought we were going to do fine yesterday," Bush insisted. "Shows what I know." But "win or lose, Bob Gates was going to become the nominee."

Rumsfeld understood as well as he did, Bush said, that "Iraq is not working well enough, fast enough."

The defense secretary's removal was part of a broader White House effort to restructure Bush's presidency in the wake of the Democratic victory. Beyond the switch at the Pentagon, White House aides in recent weeks developed an agenda designed to attract bipartisan support, including an increase in the minimum wage -- a longtime Democratic priority -- as well as comprehensive immigration legislation, energy measures, and the extension of the No Child Left Behind education program.

"The message yesterday was clear," Bush said. "The American people want their leaders in Washington to set aside partisan differences, conduct ourselves in an ethical manner, and work together to address the challenges facing our nation."

Despite the sharp confrontation that has characterized his tenure, Bush "will make the best of the situation he finds," predicted Ari Fleischer, his former press secretary. "If that means he'll compromise, he'll do so. The question is, will the Republican base let him? And will the Democratic base let Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid compromise?"

Some senior voices from the Republican base already are urging Bush to forget cooperation. "I guess you're supposed to say that, regardless of whether you're actually planning on doing it. I hope he doesn't really mean it," said Grover G. Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. Instead, he said, Bush should use the next two years to define differences between the parties heading into the 2008 election.

Although the White House had insisted repeatedly that it was not making contingency plans for a Democratic victory, an official said yesterday that Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten assigned deputies Karl Rove and Joel D. Kaplan, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, counselor Dan Bartlett, and other aides to begin "quietly preparing in case this eventuality came," the official said.

The removal of Rumsfeld stunned Washington, because Bush had stubbornly resisted calls to dump his Pentagon chief for years despite rising pressure from within his own party and the ranks of retired generals. He had twice refused Rumsfeld's offered resignation during scandals over military detainment and interrogation methods, and he had rebuffed bids by his chief of staff to remove the defense secretary. Just last week, Bush declared publicly that he wanted Rumsfeld to remain at the Pentagon for two more years.

Gates served as CIA director and deputy national security adviser in the administration of Bush's father, whose foreign and defense policies have long been implicitly criticized as weak by some senior officials of the current administration. He is currently a member of a bipartisan panel headed by the former president's secretary of state, James A. Baker III, that is studying the Iraq situation and is scheduled to make policy recommendations in the next few weeks. Signaling a likely shift in Iraq policy for an administration that has been loath to make significant changes in how it wages the increasingly unpopular war, Bush yesterday made several references to the upcoming Baker report.

While emphasizing his campaign insistence that the United States cannot leave Iraq without achieving victory, Bush said that Gates "can help make the necessary adjustments in our approach." He said his national security team would meet with members of both parties in coming weeks to brief them on developments in Iraq and listen to their ideas for moving forward.

Rumsfeld earned a small army of enemies inside and outside the Pentagon during his tumultuous tenure, and his critics rejoiced at his departure yesterday. Just minutes before Bush announced the defense secretary's departure, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), suggested at her inaugural news conference as likely the next House speaker that the president dump Rumsfeld in response to the election. She and other Democratic leaders later welcomed the move and said they hoped it would prove to be the beginning, not the end, of change in Bush's leadership in Iraq.

"I hope the departure of Mr. Rumsfeld will mark a fresh start toward a new policy in Iraq," Pelosi said.

A number of Republicans were equally hopeful that the president's apparent openness would culminate in policy changes.

"This change in leadership at the Pentagon is the right opportunity for the administration to develop a new strategy," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine). "The current approach has not led to a reduction in the insurgent violence that our troops and the Iraqi people face every day."

Bush cautioned the nation's enemies not to take heart from Rumsfeld's removal or the election results. "Do not be joyful," he said. "Do not confuse the workings of our democracy with a lack of will."

Still, some of those waging the insurgency in Iraq reacted with glee to Rumsfeld's ouster. "We hope that Bush will go next, after this butcher, who's responsible for killing tens of thousands of civilian people in Iraq and Afghanistan," Abu al-Zubeir Dulami, a member of the Mujaheddin Shura Council, an umbrella organization for al-Qaeda in Iraq and other Sunni insurgent groups, said by telephone from Ramadi. "We consider it a big accomplishment for the people of al-Qaeda in Iraq."

Bush said that Rumsfeld would serve until Gates is confirmed. White House officials were exploring yesterday whether the current Senate could act on his nomination during a lame-duck session later this month or if the matter would have to wait until the new Senate convenes Jan. 3. His confirmation would raise questions about the fate of other top Pentagon officials, particularly Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England and Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence Stephen A. Cambone. Cabinet secretaries typically get to bring in their own teams.

Gates has privately expressed deep reservations about the situation in Iraq, according to at least one person who has spoken to him about it in the context of the Baker group's deliberations. "He is basically very concerned about what is happening over there, and he thought that bad mistakes were made -- and he was frustrated that the administration was unable to adjust and make the changes that he feels needed to be made."

A Meek Departure From The War Cabinet (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Michael Abramowitz

With a wry smile, Donald H. Rumsfeld gently alluded to the controversies of his tenure as defense secretary, perhaps the most consequential since that of Robert S. McNamara during the Vietnam War.

Thanking the president for the opportunity to serve, Rumsfeld said in a brief Oval Office session yesterday afternoon that the experience brought to mind the words of Winston Churchill -- "something to the effect," he quipped, "that I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

It was a rare melancholy moment for the alpha male and onetime Princeton wrestler who ran roughshod over the military brass, sparred bitterly with the media and mounted fierce rear-guard battles against the State Department during a six-year run that saw him become, first, an unlikely television celebrity and then the face of an unpopular war.

Though Bush affectionately patted Rumsfeld on the shoulder as he ushered him out of the Oval Office, there was little sugarcoating the reality that the defense chief, 74, was being offered as a sacrificial lamb amid the repudiation of Bush and his Iraq policy that the American electorate delivered on Tuesday.

Andrew H. Card Jr., then the White House chief of staff, had actually recommended this course of action to Bush two years ago. The fact that the defense chief lasted so long in the job was essentially a reflection of the fact that, in firing Rumsfeld, "you are basically admitting you made some serious mistakes in the conduct of the war," observed former White House chief of staff Leon E. Panetta.

What is certain to be long debated is Rumsfeld's legacy at the Pentagon, which involved two tours. The first lasted 14 months in 1975 and 1976, when, at just 43, he served as the youngest defense secretary ever under President Gerald R. Ford and as a close ally of then-White House chief of staff Dick Cheney. (It was Rumsfeld who first recruited Cheney into the Nixon administration.)

Admirers and detractors alike credit Rumsfeld with an unusual willingness to question prevailing assumptions, such as where U.S. troops should be deployed overseas, and to shake up a Pentagon bureaucracy that he regarded as an impediment to making changes necessary to confront new and evolving threats to the United States.

Where they split is over whether Rumsfeld had the capacity to carry out true institutional change at the Pentagon, since from Day One he alienated top military brass and powerful congressional figures with his brusque manner and confusing decision-making process.

On Iraq, Rumsfeld found himself increasingly questioned by generals, lawmakers and others over miscalculations that included not planning adequately for the post-invasion occupation and failing to recognize soon enough the nature of the insurgency, as well as what they regarded as his derelict handling over the past five years of the detainee and interrogation controversies at the Pentagon.

With Rumsfeld's departure, most of the top Pentagon civilians responsible for planning the invasion and early occupation of Iraq are gone.

Early into the Iraq occupation, Rumsfeld was being compared by many military men to McNamara, resented by the military for the perception that he micromanaged matters during the Vietnam War.

"McNamara, for four years of Vietnam going down the toilet, was absolutely convinced with a religious zeal that what he was doing was the right thing," Thomas E. White, who was Rumsfeld's first Army secretary, once said. "It wasn't until 30 years later that it dawned on him that he was dead wrong. And I think you have the same thing with Don Rumsfeld."

Aides said Bush began thinking about making a change about a month ago, increasingly convinced that he needed to do something dramatic to shake up an Iraq situation that was deteriorating by the day.

"It was an evolving process," said one senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal deliberations. "It was a cumulative effect of where we are in the war, where the president wants to take us in the next two years."

Bush brought up the subject at one of his regularly scheduled weekly meetings with Rumsfeld, the first of several searching conversations about what to do in Iraq. But the president resisted making the change until after the elections out of concern that it would get caught up in the white-hot campaigns.

In the past, Vice President Cheney resisted proposals to dump Rumsfeld, according to a book by The Washington Post's Bob Woodward. White House officials said they did not know whether he did so again this time. Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride said the vice president "doesn't discuss the advice given to the president."

Bush was already thinking about sacking Rumsfeld when he met with news service reporters on Nov. 1, but, by his own account, he decided to mislead them to preserve the secret. One reporter asked Bush if he wanted Cheney and Rumsfeld to remain through the end of his term, on Jan. 20, 2009. The president answered yes.

In fact, Bush was then busily searching for a replacement for Rumsfeld. Former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a close friend and ally of Bush's father who is heading a blue-ribbon commission studying options for Iraq, had praised Robert M. Gates to the president, but he did not recommend him for the Pentagon job, nor did he recommend that Rumsfeld be ousted, the senior official said.

Other candidates were considered, but Bush met only with Gates, on Sunday at his Texas ranch. After flying back to Washington on Election Day, Bush met with Rumsfeld in the Oval Office to tell him that he was going forward with the move. The president sat down with Gates again at the White House yesterday morning before announcing the appointment.

Although Rumsfeld contributed position papers to the Bush campaign in 2000, he was not a close member of the Texas governor's brain trust; and he was not the president-elect's first choice for defense secretary. But Bush turned to him at Cheney's suggestion, made in part as a way of providing a counterweight to Colin L. Powell, who had already been chosen as secretary of state. Conservatives were nervous about the power that the moderate, multilateralist Powell, a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, might wield over defense as well as foreign policy.

Rumsfeld's assertive voice on foreign policy matters stems from the early days of the Bush administration, when he advised the new president to limit his involvement in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and to adopt a tough line on issues including North Korea and China. Although Rumsfeld was considered less an ideologue than an unyielding iconoclast, he brought with him to the Pentagon's executive suites and advisory councils a collection of neoconservatives with strong views on the Middle East, Russia, China and other foreign policy issues. They clashed at nearly every turn with officials of Powell's State Department, setting up an internal conflict that would run through Bush's entire first term.

Rumsfeld's early efforts to speed military transformation were stymied by resistance to requested budget increases. Many in Congress -- in both parties -- were put off by his abrasive style, and he had already alienated many in the Defense Department. There were widespread rumors in the summer of 2001 that he would not last through Bush's first year. Then came the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and Rumsfeld suddenly appeared on the cover of the conservative National Review, drawn with bulging muscles and wearing a Superman costume. Once the Taliban and al-Qaeda were vanquished in Afghanistan, he quickly turned his attention to Iraq as a testing ground for his transformation ideas.

"There is an upside and a downside to Rumsfeld," said one retired four-star general who had been close to Rumsfeld and who spoke on the condition of anonymity to speak more candidly. "The upside is that he came to the job with a valid vision of the need for, and ideas about how to transform the military and to make it more suitable for the new century. The downside is that he muddled the [Iraq] war so badly that nobody is ever going to remember the upside."

Rumsfeld seemed uninterested in the ideas of others around him, particularly those within the uniformed services. By numerous accounts of those who worked with him, he did not encourage the questioning of his ideas or orders and was quick to ridicule ideas with which he did not agree.

Eliot A. Cohen, a professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University who closely follows the Pentagon, offered a more sympathetic account of Rumsfeld's tenure.

"This is a guy who has devoted an enormous amount of his career to service and doing his best as he understood it," said Cohen. "To a large extent, he got turned into a scapegoat and also a caricature -- the fire-breathing bully. My experience with him is that he could be an excellent listener.

"He deserves his share of the blame for what happened," Cohen added. "but to think that it is entirely his fault . . . would be missing the point."

Rumsfeld's account yesterday in the Oval Office of the fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan might also stand as his defense of his record: "The first war of the 21st century . . . is not well known, it was not well understood. It is complex for people to comprehend."

Rumsfeld Resigns; Bush Vows "To Find Common Ground"; Focus Is On Virginia (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — Faced with the collapse of his Republican majority in Congress, President Bush responded swiftly on Wednesday by announcing the departure of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and vowing to work with Democrats “to find common ground” on the war in Iraq and domestic issues.

With Democrats having recaptured the House and control of the Senate depending on the outcome of a single unsettled contest in Virginia, Mr. Bush, sounding alternately testy and conciliatory at a White House news conference, said he was “obviously disappointed.” He portrayed the results as a cumulative “thumping” of Republicans and conceded that as head of the party, he bore some responsibility.

In Virginia, though Senator George Allen had not conceded Wednesday night, the Democrat, Jim Webb, was confident enough of victory to begin talking about transition. Mr. Allen’s defeat would mean that the Democrats would control the Senate for the first time since 2002 and would control both houses of Congress.

Just days after telling reporters that he would keep Mr. Rumsfeld on for the rest of his term, Mr. Bush said that the two had agreed "after a series of thoughtful conversations" that it was time for Mr. Rumsfeld, a magnet for criticism about management of the war, to go.

The president asked Robert M. Gates, who was director of central intelligence under Mr. Bush's father, to take over at the Pentagon at a time when the administration is under intense pressure to develop a new approach in Iraq.

Senior White House officials said the Rumsfeld resignation had been discussed for weeks, coming as the violence intensified in Iraq and a growing number of critics — including Republicans — called for the secretary's firing.

Several weeks ago, with the White House's own internal polls showing Democrats making gains on antiwar sentiment, Mr. Bush and a few top aides began a series of secret meetings to discuss what he knew would be an explosive announcement.

Meanwhile, the president was holding heart-to-heart talks with Mr. Rumsfeld. As the longest-serving member of Mr. Bush's cabinet — and a member of Mr. Bush's father's cabinet as well — the defense secretary had always enjoyed Mr. Bush's unconditional public support.

The impending resignation was so closely held that the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, did not learn of it until Mr. Rumsfeld called him 45 minutes before it was announced. The White House was also wary about how the news might affect the election.

"It's like when you get asked about the dollar," one senior White House official said in describing why Mr. Bush gave no hint of the resignation when asked directly about it last week. "If you don't give the same answer every time, the markets move."

The timing of the announcement left no doubt that Mr. Bush wanted to make a dramatic demonstration of flexibility in dealing with a war that has come to define his presidency.

The White House said it had not yet determined whether to ask the departing Republican-controlled Senate to take up the Gates nomination or to wait for the new Senate, potentially in the hands of Democrats, to take it up next year. But Mr. Warner said he would like to see Mr. Gates confirmed by the end of the year, if possible.

Tuesday's vote ripped apart the political landscape in Washington just two years after Mr. Bush won re-election and declared that he intended to expend his political capital on behalf of an ambitious agenda.

While members of both parties said the election was about the war as much as anything, Republicans opened a debate about whether they had also been undone by failing to stick closely enough to conservative principles. Republicans in the House moved toward overhauling their leadership, and presidential contenders in both parties began preparing for an almost immediate start to the 2008 campaign.

Democrats picked up at least 28 seats in the House, putting them in control of that chamber for the first time in 12 years.

By midday Wednesday, Democrats had won one of the two Senate races that had been left undecided overnight, claiming a seat in Montana from the incumbent Republican, Conrad Burns.

In Virginia, the Democrat, Mr. Webb, held a lead of less than 0.5 percent of the 2.3 million votes cast, aides to Mr. Allen suggested on Wednesday evening that he could acknowledge defeat as early as Thursday afternoon.

After spending weeks questioning Democratic approaches to the economy and national security as dangerous for the nation, Mr. Bush said he recognized "that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress" in Iraq. He said he intended to "work with the new Congress in a bipartisan way" and invited leading Democrats to meet with him at the White House beginning on Thursday.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who is now expected to become the first female speaker of the House, said Mr. Bush had invited her to lunch, calling her "Madam Speaker-elect."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who spearheaded his party's campaign to take back the Senate, said he had received calls from Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow, and his chief political adviser, Karl Rove, as well as the president himself. Mr. Schumer said he thought it meant the White House was serious about reaching out.

"He was gracious," the senator said of Mr. Bush. "He said, 'You did an amazing job, congratulations.' He said, 'I wish you were on my team.' And I said, 'No you don't, Mr. President.' "

In the Capitol, Ms. Pelosi vowed to use the first 100 hours of the new Congress to push through what Democrats dubbed their "Six for '06" agenda.

That program includes calls to raise the minimum wage, repeal subsidies for oil companies and incentives for companies to send jobs overseas, cut interest rates on student loans, give the government the authority to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies for lower prescription drug prices, and expand opportunities for embryonic stem cell research. On one of those issues, the minimum wage, Mr. Bush signaled there was room for a deal, as he also did on immigration.

But Democrats made it clear that their first order of business, even before taking over in January, would be pressing the Bush White House to change course in Iraq.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, called for Mr. Bush to convene a bipartisan summit meeting on Iraq. Ms. Pelosi, apparently unaware that Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation was about to be announced, called pointedly on Mr. Bush to get rid of the secretary of defense, saying it would "signal an openness to new, fresh ideas."

As Democrats turned their attention to governing, Republicans — including Mr. Bush — grappled with their losses. Although Mr. Bush had been insisting in public that he was confident Republicans would retain control of both houses of Congress, his aides said privately on Wednesday that the president knew as early as several weeks ago that Democrats were likely to capture the House, even as he hoped for an upset.

"If you look at it race by race, it was close," the president told reporters in the East Room of the White House. "The cumulative effect, however, was not close. It was a thumping."

Washington has been a one-party Republican town for almost the entire six years Mr. Bush has been president. Tuesday's election ended any talk about Republicans establishing a permanent majority in the capital and upset a power structure that extended from Congress and the White House through the network of lobbyists, interest groups and donors who have supported Republicans and their agenda for years.

"We're going to take a two-year hiatus," Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, told reporters at a morning news briefing. Of Ms. Pelosi, he said: "My goal and job will be to make sure she never sets the record that Denny Hastert set."

Mr. Reynolds was referring to the current speaker, Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who has held the job longer than any other Republican in the nation's history. Mr. Hastert issued a statement on Tuesday saying he would not seek the role of minority leader in the new Democratic-controlled House.

In addition to upending the balance of power between the parties in Washington, Tuesday's election also set up a leadership scramble within the parties themselves. Two Democrats, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland and Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania have both said they will seek the position of majority leader, to replace Ms. Pelosi if, as expected, she moves up to speaker.

And there has been speculation that Representative Rahm Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee who is widely viewed as an architect of Tuesday's House victory, would seek the position of Democratic whip. Mr. Emanuel said Wednesday that he had not made any decision about the whip's race but would do so "in short order."

At the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, Mr. Bush gathered his senior aides — Mr. Rove; Joshua B. Bolten, the White House chief of staff; and Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president — in the Oval Office before 7 a.m. Wednesday to assess the new power structure on Capitol Hill.

Although the White House had been insisting for weeks that it was not planning for a Democratic takeover, those in the room were part of a small cadre of presidential advisers, also including the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, and the domestic policy adviser, Joel D. Kaplan, who had already been doing just that.

"We got thumped, it's time, let's go," Mr. Bush said, according to one person who was present at the early morning meeting. "Let's get them on the phone. Is it too early?"

Aides to Mr. Bush said they wanted to make some fast moves to show they were nimble in the face of the new challenge and to seize at least some of the stage on a day that belonged to Democrats. At the same time, they said, they wanted to show they had heard the voters' message that it was time for a new direction in Iraq.

And they said Mr. Gates was someone the president was comfortable with; Mr. Bush considered him for the position of director of intelligence, now held by John D. Negroponte.

Mr. Gates and the president met secretly on Sunday at Mr. Bush's ranch in Crawford, Tex.; to avoid the prying eyes of reporters and low-level White House officials who were camped out in nearby Waco, Mr. Gates met senior aides to Mr. Bush in the little town of McGregor and was then spirited into the ranch, aides said.

Mr. Gates, the president of Texas A&M University, had a difficult confirmation as director of central intelligence 15 years ago because of accusations that he had slanted intelligence. Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, pledged to give Mr. Gates "a fair and fresh look," despite voting against his confirmation in 1991.

Despite the pronouncements of bipartisanship on both sides, there were questions about how Mr. Bush would work with a party whose Senate leader, Mr. Reid, has called him "a liar," and whose House leader, Ms. Pelosi, has called him "incompetent."

Asked in an interview on ABC News about her comments that Mr. Bush was incompetent, Ms. Pelosi replied, "Incompetence in the implementation of a war is dangerous," but she quickly added that it was time to move past old conflicts.

Mr. Bush, meanwhile, was asked at his news conference how he could have been so hopeful of Republican victory in the face of polls predicting such serious losses.

"I thought when it was all said and done, the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security," the president said. "But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on."

Nomination Offers "fresh Perspective" On Iraq (USAT)

By Susan Page, Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Stay the course?

The White House announced two weeks ago that President Bush no longer planned to utter that signature phrase about the war in Iraq, and with a stunning White House announcement Wednesday that signal went beyond rhetoric: Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, an architect of the Iraq war, was stepping down.

To replace him, President Bush turned to an adviser to his father's administration, former CIA director Robert Gates, a member of the bipartisan commission that is now putting the final touches on a report with recommendations on what to do about Iraq.

Endorsing the need for a "fresh perspective," the president opened the door to changing tactics in the war, though he didn't back away from its justification.

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there," Bush told an East Room news conference. He said voters, increasing the ranks of Democrats in the House and Senate, had delivered his party a "thumpin'. "

The morning after the worst setback for Republicans on Capitol Hill since Watergate, the president sought to rescue the final two years of his tenure from being paralyzed by an increasingly violent and unpopular war.

He gave what military analyst Charles Pena calls "a peace offering" to Democratic congressional leaders who have been demanding Rumsfeld's departure for months. An hour before news of the resignation began to leak Wednesday, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill, chairman of the triumphant Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, had declared the Pentagon chief's ouster a priority for the incoming Democratic majority.

"It's clear that what we're doing (in Iraq) is not working," Emanuel said at his first news conference of the day. "We need both a new strategy and a management team, at least in the secretary, that does that."

In January, with control of one or both houses of Congress, the Democrats would have been in a position to do more than complain about Rumsfeld. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., in line to become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, told reporters Wednesday that he planned to create a subcommittee to focus on oversight and investigations of the Pentagon.

"Will this change the policy?" Skelton asked of Rumsfeld's departure. "I don't know. I certainly hope so." He added, "I'd rather have that than have a new face with the old policies of stay-the-course and keep feeding young people into the cauldron of Iraq."

Rumsfeld was characteristically wry as he stood between his boss and his intended successor in the Oval Office Wednesday afternoon.

"It's been quite a time," he said. "It recalls to mind the statement by Winston Churchill — something to the effect that 'I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof.' " Bush laughed at that.

The brusque Pentagon chief was also uncharacteristically emotional as he finished his comments. There was an audible catch in his voice when he said the "young men and women in uniform … remain in my prayers always." Bush gave him three hearty slaps on the back as the men walked out.

A former Eagle Scout and Navy pilot, Rumsfeld was elected four times as a congressman from suburban Chicago, then served in the Nixon White House. (There, he gave a young congressional fellow named Dick Cheney a job; Cheney as vice president returned the favor a quarter-century later by putting forward Rumsfeld's name for the Pentagon post.) As President Ford's chief of staff, Rumsfeld struggled to manage the repercussions of a Watergate scandal that decimated GOP ranks in Congress in the 1974 midterm elections.

In 1975, at 43, he became the youngest secretary of Defense.

In 2001, at 68, after earning a fortune at J.D. Searle Co. and elsewhere, he became the oldest secretary of Defense. It was, he told Bush Wednesday, "a wholly unexpected opportunity."

Skelton says Rumsfeld plans to stay on the job until Gates' nomination can be confirmed by the Senate. If he does, Rumsfeld late next month will add one more milestone to his resume: the longest-serving secretary of Defense. He'll surpass the tenure of Robert McNamara, who was pushed to resign in 1968 as President Johnson struggled to manage an unpopular war in Vietnam.

Rumsfeld's legacy at the Pentagon during this tour of duty is mixed, analysts say.

"There's much that Rumsfeld did that's commendable: His focus on transformation of the military, on quicker responses, on a variety of new thinking," says Kurt Campbell, a former Pentagon and National Security Council official for President Clinton. He is now a scholar at the non-partisan Center for Strategic and International Studies. "But because of Iraq, much of his legacy is likely to be considered tragic."

Rumsfeld returned to the Pentagon determined to transform the U.S. military into a leaner, more agile and technologically sophisticated force. Critics say his insistence on a "lean" invasion force in Iraq — despite the views of Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki and others — and the failure of U.S. forces to control the looting and disorder that followed Saddam Hussein's ouster contributed to the current impasse in Iraq.

During the months after the 2001 terrorist attacks, when the United States invaded Afghanistan, Rumsfeld was a media star and a calming and unifying leader, says Barry Blechman, head of the military consulting firm DFI International and a member of the secretary's policy advisory board.

"The president made some excellent speeches, but on a day-to-day basis, it was Rumsfeld's steadfastness, determination and involvement that people saw," says Blechman. Rumsfeld's sharp rejoinders to reporters and his ruminations about "known knowns, known unknowns and unknown unknowns" made the Pentagon's televised briefings fodder for comedy routines on late-night TV.

But Rumsfeld made a "tragic mistake" in Iraq, Blechman said. "He made one big mistake, in that he believed those who said that all we had to do is get rid of (Saddam) Hussein and we didn't have to worry much about what would happen afterwards. As a result, we didn't plan properly for the period that followed Hussein's demise and made some bad decisions about how to conduct the occupation."

A half-dozen retired generals this year began publicly criticizing Rumsfeld's leadership, among them, three who had served in Iraq under Rumsfeld. An editorial in the Army Times, Navy Times, Air Force Times and Marine Corps Times (publications owned by Gannett, which also owns USA TODAY) last week called for his resignation.

Rumsfeld's resignation comes after a spike in sectarian violence during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan helped push the death toll for U.S. troops to 105 in October, the fourth-deadliest month since the invasion in March 2003.

Military commanders have shifted hundreds of American forces to Baghdad to crack down on Sunni and Shiite militias, but U.S. generals acknowledge that effort has fallen short of expectations.

Rumsfeld's departure doesn't make the policy options any less problematic, however.

DOJ_NMG_0091963

"If there were easy solutions, we would have figured out what they were a long time ago," says Ivo Daalder, a national-security aide in the Clinton White House. "Everyone is looking for the Holy Grail, to withdraw with honor, to not leave the mess worse than it is today."

That may not be possible, he says. "Basically, it seems to me we either accept defeat and its consequences, or we just in one form or another continue down a course that makes us accept defeat down the road, and the consequences being larger."

The 10-member bipartisan panel is due to issue recommendations soon. Chaired by former secretary of State James Baker and Lee Hamilton, former House International Relations Committee chairman, the committee has worked with four task forces studying Iraq's "strategic environment," military and security situation, political development, and economy and reconstruction.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, predicts the commission's options will include the substantial redeployment of U.S. forces, consultation with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and increased political independence for Iraq's ethnic regions. The panel "will give the administration the necessary political room to be able to make a radical change," Biden says, especially with a new secretary of Defense in charge.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a critic of the war who testified before the commission, says he believes it will propose deploying U.S. troops away from the daily crossfire between Iraqi factions. "I see signals that they are talking about benchmarks and redeployment sooner rather than later," he says.

Gates is a 26-year veteran of the CIA, named by the first President Bush to head the agency. A native of Wichita, Gates is now president of Texas A&M University, where the elder Bush's presidential library is located. While Rumsfeld sometimes flares with drama, Gates personifies the circumspect analyst.

John McLaughlin, a former CIA deputy director who worked for Gates, says "it's not inconsequential" that Gates is a member of the commission.

"What we're seeing is a convergence of pragmatic people from Bush I, Bush II and Congress on the next steps" in Iraq, he says.

An unscientific sampling of opinion from members of the military who have served in Iraq and their families found a range of views about Rumsfeld.

"To be honest with you, I thought we were doing a good job in Iraq helping the Iraqi people liberate themselves from the few people who don't want us there," says Luis Valdovinos of Riverside, Calif. He left the Marine Corps last year after two tours in Iraq. He proudly remembers shaking Rumsfeld's hand when the secretary visited troops at the Al Asad base in Iraq in 2004.

Army Reserve Sgt. 1st Class Carl Church, of Hemet, Calif., is ambivalent. "My reaction is, hopefully, some good will come of it," he says of Rumsfeld's departure. "There's some good decisions (in Iraq) and there's some bad decisions. They say the commanders in the field are running things, and some people say the politicians are running things. I have no idea."

"I think we need a change and maybe some fresh perspective," says Gailo Bodenhamer of Belton, Texas, outside Fort Hood. Her husband, Army Capt. Jonathan Bodenhamer, is a company commander slated to come home next week after a second year-long combat tour in Iraq.

Maybe new leadership will mean he won't have to return a third time, Bodenhamer says.

Rumsfeld Quits; Bush Taps Gates For Post (AP)

By Robert Burns, Katherine Shrader

AP, November 8, 2006

After years of defending his secretary of defense, President Bush on Wednesday announced Donald H. Rumsfeld's resignation within hours of the Democrats' triumph in congressional elections. Bush reached back to his father's administration to tap a former CIA director to run the Pentagon.

The Iraq war was the central issue of Rumsfeld's nearly six-year tenure, and unhappiness with the war was a major element of voter dissatisfaction Tuesday — and the main impetus for his departure. Even some GOP lawmakers became critical of the war's management, and growing numbers of politicians were urging Bush to replace Rumsfeld.

Bush said Robert Gates, 63, who has served in a variety of national security jobs under six previous presidents, would be nominated to replace Rumsfeld. Gates, currently the president of Texas A&M University, is a Bush family friend and a member of an independent group studying the way ahead in Iraq.

The White House hopes that replacing Rumsfeld with Gates can help refresh U.S. policy on the deeply unpopular war and perhaps establish a stronger rapport with the new Congress. Rumsfeld had a rocky relationship with many lawmakers.

"Secretary Rumsfeld and I agreed that sometimes it's necessary to have a fresh perspective," Bush said in the abrupt announcement during a postelection news conference.

In a later appearance at the White House with Rumsfeld and Gates at his side, Bush praised both men, thanked Rumsfeld for his service and predicted that Gates would bring fresh ideas.

"The secretary of defense must be a man of vision who can see threats still over the horizon and prepare our nation to meet them. Bob Gates is the right man to meet both of these critical challenges," Bush said.

But underscoring that he would not bow to those pushing for a quick U.S. withdrawal, Bush also said, "I'd like our troops to come home, too, but I want them to come home with victory."

In brief remarks, Rumsfeld described the Iraq conflict as a "little understood, unfamiliar war" that is "complex for people to comprehend." Upon his return to the Pentagon after appearing with Bush and Gates, Rumsfeld said it was a good time for him to leave.

"It will be a different Congress, a different environment, moving toward a presidential election and a lot of partisanship, and it struck me that this would be a good thing for everybody," Rumsfeld told reporters.

Asked whether Rumsfeld's departure signaled a new direction in a war that has claimed the lives of more than 2,800 U.S. troops and cost more than $300 billion, Bush said, "Well, there's certainly going to be new leadership at the Pentagon."

Voters appeared to be telling politicians that the sooner the war ends the better. Surveys at polling places showed that about six in 10 voters disapproved of the war and only a third believed it had improved long-term security in the United States.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Rumsfeld was not leaving immediately. Rumsfeld planned to deliver a speech on the global war on terrorism at Kansas State University on Thursday.

Just last week Bush told reporters that he expected Rumsfeld, 74, to remain until the end of the administration's term. And although Bush said Wednesday that his decision to replace Rumsfeld was not based on politics, the announcement of a Pentagon shake-up came on the heels of Tuesday's voting.

With his often-combative defense of the war in Iraq, Rumsfeld had been the administration's face of the conflict. He became more of a target — and more politically vulnerable — as the war grew increasingly unpopular at home amid rising violence and with no end in sight.

He joined the CIA in 1966 and is the only agency employee to rise from an entry level job to become director. A native of Kansas, he made a name for himself as an analyst specializing in the former Soviet Union and he served in the intelligence community for more than a quarter century, under six presidents.

Numerous Democrats in Congress had been calling for Rumsfeld's resignation for many months, asserting that his management of the war and of the military had been a resounding failure. Critics also accused Rumsfeld of not fully considering the advice of his generals and of refusing to consider alternative courses of action.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan and Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri — the top Democrats on the Armed Services committees — said the resignation would be a positive step only if accompanied by a change in policy.

"I think it is critical that this change be more than just a different face on the old policy," Skelton said.

Rumsfeld, 74, has served in the job longer than anyone except Robert McNamara, who became secretary of defense during the Kennedy administration and remained until 1968. Rumsfeld is the only person to have served in the job twice; his previous tour was during the Ford administration.

Rumsfeld had twice previously offered his resignation to Bush — once during the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal in spring 2004 and again shortly after that. Both times the president refused to let him leave.

Gates took over the CIA as acting director in 1987, when William Casey was terminally ill with cancer. Questions were raised about Gates' knowledge of the Iran-Contra affair, and he withdrew from consideration to take over the CIA permanently. Yet he stayed on as deputy director.

Then-National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft, who has been a critic of the younger Bush's policies, asked Gates to be his deputy in 1989 during the administration of Bush's father. The elder President Bush, a former CIA director himself, asked Gates to run the CIA two years later.

Gates won confirmation, but only after hearings in which he was accused by CIA officials of manipulating intelligence as a senior analyst in the 1980s.

Melvin Goodman, a former CIA division chief for Soviet affairs, testified that Gates politicized the intelligence on Iran, Nicaragua, Afghanistan and the Soviet Union. "Gates' role in this activity was to corrupt the process and the ethics of intelligence on all of these issues," Goodman testified.

The Bush administration's use of intelligence on Iraq has been a central theme of criticism from Democrats who say the White House stretched faulty intelligence from U.S. spy agencies to justify invading Iraq in 2003.

Gates has taken a much lower profile since leaving government. He joined corporate boards and wrote a memoir, "From The Shadows: The Ultimate Insider's Story of Five Presidents and How They Won the Cold War." It was published in 1996.

Gates is a close friend of the Bush family, and particularly the first President Bush. He became the president of Texas A&M University in August 2002. The university is home to the presidential library of the elder Bush.

Rumsfeld Steps Down (CHIT)

By Stephen J. Hedges, Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld resigned Wednesday within hours of a stunning Republican setback in nationwide midterm elections, a vote that became a referendum on President Bush's strategy for the war in Iraq and on Rumsfeld's stormy stewardship of the Pentagon.

Bush announced Rumsfeld's departure during a news conference, stating that he had nominated former CIA Director Robert Gates as his next secretary of defense. All three men convened later in the Oval Office of the White House to discuss the changing of the guard.

While Bush explained his decision as a need to put "fresh eyes" on his Iraq policy, it came after voters Tuesday turned over control of the House to Democrats, who had made the military stalemate in Iraq a campaign priority. The Senate may fall to Democratic hands as well, pending the outcome of a close race in Virginia.

Rumsfeld's sudden departure was the clearest signal yet that Bush may soon make a dramatic shift in his Iraq war strategy.

Rumsfeld, the Pentagon chief since Bush took office in January 2001, was viewed as the key architect of the 2003 military invasion of Iraq, and in more recent times the public face of the failures there. His ouster could both embolden the military, with which he was often at odds, and those who have pressed for solutions that Rumsfeld strongly opposed, such as a partitioning of Iraq.

Rumsfeld's primary strategy of having U.S. troops train Iraqi military and police units to take over security in Iraq was viewed by critics as progressing slowly and poorly managed. There were also complaints about the soaring cost of reconstructing Iraq's neglected infrastructure, overcharges by private Pentagon contractors and a perceived lack of adequate U.S. troop strength.

Iraq panel's report due soon

During his news conference, Bush seemed almost eager to meet with a congressionally mandated group of experts who are soon to make recommendations on options for the U.S. forces in Iraq; the president said that session will occur next week.

DOJ_NMG_0091966

That panel, known as the Iraqi Study Group, is co-chaired by James Baker, a Bush family friend who served as secretary of state during Bush's father's presidency, and former Indiana Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton.

Gates, now president of Texas A&M University, also is a member of its board.

Bush assured Iraqis and members of the U.S. military that Rumsfeld's departure would not cause ripples of uncertainty about the U.S. mission in Iraq, but at the same time he signaled a willingness to pursue a new strategy.

Washington caught by surprise

The speed of Rumsfeld's resignation caught official Washington by surprise. A combative bureaucrat with a razor-sharp wit, Rumsfeld was expected by many to depart only when conditions in Iraq improved. Bush only last week offered assurances that Rumsfeld would stay, and that Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney, another enthusiastic proponent of the Iraq war, were doing a "fantastic job."

Rumsfeld's combative nature made him a target for those who oppose the war in Iraq, and for Democrats and some Republicans in Congress who came to question the Bush administration's assessment of the U.S. military mission there.

Rumsfeld offered to resign twice before, both times during the scandal that erupted in April 2004 over the abuse of Iraqi prisoners by U.S. soldiers. Bush then refused to accept Rumsfeld's offers to quit.

But Tuesday's elections, and the struggle in Iraq, appear to have eroded Bush's confidence in Rumsfeld, who is expected to remain at his post until the Senate confirms Gates' nomination.

After Tuesday's vote, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumptive House speaker when Democrats assume control of the chamber in January, called on Bush to fire Rumsfeld to demonstrate a change in the administration's Iraq policy. The White House announcement of Rumsfeld's resignation came an hour later.

The president said he already had set in motion the process of replacing Rumsfeld before the election, although Bush had maintained in an interview with reporters just last week that he expected to keep his defense secretary through his second term.

He said, though, that he had not met with Gates until Sunday and didn't have a final meeting with Rumsfeld until Tuesday. Bush met with Gates at the president's Prairie Chapel Ranch outside Crawford, Texas, before heading out for a day of campaigning in Nebraska and Kansas.

Bush said Wednesday that he misled reporters on the Rumsfeld question because "I didn't want to inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign. And so the only way to answer that question and to get you on to another question was to give you that answer."

Denying that Rumsfeld's replacement is a result of the election that has handed Democrats control of the House and possibly the Senate, Bush said: "Actually, I thought we were going to do fine yesterday. That shows what I know."

The election was not close, he said. "It was a thumpin'."

Bush directly acknowledged the role that public unrest over the war played in the midterm elections and voiced a willingness to discuss war strategy with the new Democratic leaders. But he also made clear that any new tactics must be aimed at achieving his unswerving goal of "victory" in Iraq.

Bush: 'Committed to victory'

"I'd like our troops to come home, too, but I want them to come home with victory, and that [Iraq] is a country that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself," Bush said. "I'm committed to victory. I'm committed to helping this country so that we can come home."

Congressional Democrats instantly hailed Rumsfeld's removal.

"The American people spoke yesterday with great force and great clarity on the need to change direction in Iraq," said Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the influential ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I hope that Secretary Rumsfeld's departure will lead to a change in policy."

Levin said he will do "everything I can to facilitate" consideration of Gates as Rumsfeld's replacement.

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a member of the Armed Services Committee, said he would ask Gates to describe the administration's new plan for Iraq during the confirmation process.

DOJ_NMG_0091967

"I think I'd ask him to try to define the mission in Iraq today … ask him to show us how he is going to help engage the Iraqis more aggressively in seeking out militias," Reid said.

Bush Replaces Rumsfeld (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, stung by election losses that he acknowledged were a rebuke of the Iraq war, dismissed Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld Wednesday and named former CIA Director Robert M. Gates to replace him.

Conceding that voters spurned Republicans in part "to register their displeasure with the lack of progress" in Iraq, Bush said at a White House news conference that there was a need for "new leadership" and "fresh perspective" at the Pentagon. Gates sits on a panel that is expected to present Bush with a new Iraq policy next week.

Replacing Rumsfeld, the longest-serving member of his Cabinet, was a stunning turn for a president who has staked his legacy -- and, to some degree, the fortunes of his party -- on a war plan that has lost the support of most Americans.

Bush said he had been ready to replace Rumsfeld regardless of the election's outcome, but the move was widely viewed as a bow to the new reality in Washington, in which the president will be forced to work with Democrats to find a way out of Iraq and advance his domestic agenda.

Bush said he would meet early next week with a bipartisan commission of which Gates is a member -- co-chaired by Republican former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana -- in what could be the start of a substantial change in the U.S. approach to Iraq.

Democrats greeted Rumsfeld's replacement as a sign that Bush was heeding a call from voters for a course change in Iraq and said they hoped that the president would follow it with concrete shifts in strategy.

"I welcome the long-overdue change in leadership at the Pentagon. Now we need a change in policy," Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, said in a statement.

It was unclear, however, how far Bush was willing to go in reconsidering his policy, particularly in hastening a U.S. troop withdrawal. The president touted his selection of Gates as proof that he was open to new ideas but he rejected the idea of a quick pullout, saying that voters had not demanded such a move.

"I can understand Americans saying, 'Come home.' But I don't know if they said, 'Come home and leave behind an Iraq that could end up being a safe haven for al-Qaida.' I don't believe they said that," Bush said.

The president said that replacing Rumsfeld was a way of showing the public that he is not locked into a failed approach.

"'Stay the course' means, 'Let's get the job done,' but it doesn't mean staying stuck on a strategy or tactics that may not be working. So, perhaps I need to do a better job of explaining that we're constantly adjusting," Bush said. "What the American people hear today is, we're constantly looking for fresh perspective."

Rumsfeld's ouster came just a week after Bush issued his most recent endorsement of the Pentagon chief, telling reporters that the 74-year-old defense secretary -- a lightning rod for criticism of Bush's Iraq policy, including among retired military brass and a growing chorus of Republicans -- was performing well and would stay on.

The president acknowledged that he had lied earlier about Rumsfeld's impending departure so as not to "inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign" and because he had not yet had a chance to speak with Gates or conclude his discussions with the defense secretary. Those talks, Bush said, had been going on for some time.

In naming Gates, an experienced Washington hand who served in Republican and Democratic administrations, including that of Bush's father, the president was signaling a willingness to make substantial changes to his war plan, analysts, strategists and lawmakers said.

Bush "recognizes -- certainly, this election documented -- the fact that there's a great deal of concern, deep concern among the people of the United States" about Iraq and Afghanistan, said Republican Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The "convergence" of a new defense secretary and the Baker commission's report will influence the administration's thinking on Iraq, he said. <

Republican Sen. Susan M. Collins of Maine called Rumsfeld's departure "the right opportunity for the administration to develop a new strategy," adding that Bush's approach thus far has failed to curb the violence in Iraq.

"It strikes me as inevitable that there will be serious discussions almost immediately about a nontrivial change in our [Iraq] policy," said William A. Galston, a former domestic adviser to President Bill Clinton.

Gates "knows that by accepting this job he's stepping into a very difficult situation that could disrupt his life and blemish his reputation," said Galston, adding that he would be unlikely to do so merely "in order to preside over the continuation of a failed policy."

Republican moderates who have long questioned Bush's war strategy said Rumsfeld's departure would be a chance for a much-needed re-evaluation.

"This midterm election and Don Rumsfeld resigning sends a powerful signal to the rest of the world that the U.S. is ready for a change of course," said Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest of the Eastern Shore.

"We're turning the ship around, we've come to our senses. I hope [Bush] is ready to sit down for serious conversations, and I have some hope that that will happen" because of the Baker-Hamilton commission, the Maryland Republican added.

Republican moderates will join Democrats, Gilchrest said, in demanding better oversight of the war in Iraq.

Some Republican strategists said privately that Rumsfeld's departure was overdue, and that an earlier exit might have staved off or minimized the heavy losses the party took in Tuesday's balloting.

Thomas H. Kean, the former Republican governor of New Jersey who headed the 9/11 commission, said Rumsfeld "should have resigned two years ago."

Bush's emerging shift on Iraq is just the first sign, analysts said, that his presidency has been transformed by the midterm elections, from one of audacious plans backed up by sharp rhetoric to one defined by cooperation where possible to achieve far smaller goals, some of which could evaporate once he leaves office.

Democrats are all but certain to block extension of Bush's tax cuts, and with renewed focus on a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, Bush's "legacy could very well be a time-limited one," said Michael Franc of the conservative Heritage Foundation. "There will be no permanent victories for Bush."

The president cracked his customary jokes with reporters in the ornate East Room during an afternoon news conference. But he appeared chastened by the election outcome, for which he said he bears "a large part of the responsibility."

Stressing bipartisanship, Bush said he would now work with Democrats to renew his signature No Child Left Behind education law and an immigration plan spurned by many in his party. He said he would consider an increase in the minimum wage, a top Democratic priority that he has opposed in the past.

"I believe on a lot of issues we can find common ground," Bush said.

Democrats also have reason to work with Bush, analysts said, though many predict two years of gridlock.

"A new Democratic majority is going to have to calibrate its stance toward the president very carefully -- so, obviously, they can't just roll over and play dead. But they also can't simply say, 'We're here to oppose you,'" Galston said.

Still, Bush's collegial talk could not mask his obvious disappointment that the public rejected his campaign trail argument that putting Democrats in charge would mean a huge tax increase and a less-safe country.

"I thought when it was all said and done, the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security," Bush said. "But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on."

Democrats Fell Rumsfeld And Close In On Senate (FT)

By Edward Luce, Caroline Daniel, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, the architect of America's Iraq war strategy, became a casualty of the Republican party's unexpectedly heavy defeat in the mid-term congressional elections when George W. Bush said on Wednesday it was time for "new leadership at the Pentagon".

In his first public statement since the result Mr Bush said he accepted a "large part of the responsibility" for his party's defeat. But it was his defence secretary, who paid the price for failure as the President admitted that "many Americans voted to register their displeasure at the lack of progress we are making [in Iraq]".

With the announcement of Mr Rumsfeld's departure, Mr Bush will be hoping to draw a line under the election results, by seeming to bow to the public anger over the strategic failures in Iraq. The war proved the dominant issue in the campaign which cost the Republicans control of the House of Representatives and left their control of the Senate hanging on the outcome of a desperately close contest in Virginia.

Saying he needed a "fresh perspective" at the Pentagon, Mr Bush named Robert Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency under the first President Bush – would replace Mr Rumsfeld, whose previous offers of resignation had been turned down.

But Mr Bush ruled out any fundamental change of strategy in Iraq. "I recognise that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there [in Iraq]," Mr Bush said in a televised press conference.

"Yet I also believe most Americans and leaders here in Washington from both political parties understand we cannot accept defeat."

Mr Bush presented the secretary of defence's departure as part of a larger reinvention of his presidency in which he would seek to restore a "bipartisan tone" to Washington DC, as he had promised in his first presidential campaign in 2000. In a surprisingly upbeat account of an election that others believe could render the Mr Bush a lame duck president in his last two years in office, he promised to work with the new Democratic leadership in Congress.

On Tuesday the Democrats gained as many as 27 seats in the House of Representatives, which will give them a working majority of up to 15 seats. Control of the Senate hung in the balance on Wednesday, with Democrats having 50 confirmed seats to the Republicans' 49 but with the Democrats' wafer-thin victory in the Virginia Senate race subject to a recount.

As the extent of the Democrat victory became apparent, Nancy Pelosi, the Democrat House leader who is set to become the first female speaker in America's history, and other leading Democrats, moved swiftly to reassure Americans that they would work with Republicans to pursue a moderate centrist agenda.

On Wednesday Mr Bush warmly welcomed Ms Pelosi's offer and said there were many areas, including immigration reform, energy independence and reform of social security where the two parties could find common ground. But Mr Bush said he would not waver from his objective of achieving "success" in Iraq and winning the "war on terror".

Rumsfeld Resigns Under Pressure (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the icon of the U.S. war on Islamic terrorists, succumbed to mounting pressure to resign, allowing the Bush administration to begin examining a new course on the bogged-down Iraq war where the American death toll exceeds 2,800.

Appearing with President Bush at the White House yesterday, Mr. Rumsfeld referred to his many critics on Iraq by paraphrasing a hero, Winston Churchill: "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

He then talked of "this little understood, unfamiliar war," a conflict the Pentagon has dubbed "the long war" because of the time it will take to dismantle al Qaeda worldwide.

"The first war of the 21st century is not well-known, it was not well-understood, it is complex for people to comprehend," he said.

Mr. Bush, appearing the day after many Americans registered a protest vote against his Iraq policy, said, "As the secretary of defense, he has been dedicated to his mission, loyal to his president and devoted to the courageous men and women of our armed forces."

He was flanked by his the defense secretary-designate, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates, who will take a fresh look at Iraq policy.

White House press secretary Tony Snow told The Washington Times that Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld had been talking about future operations in Iraq for months, but he did not know who first raised the issue of the departure.

"It wasn't like, 'come see the principal,' " Mr. Snow said, who noted Mr. Rumsfeld had offered twice to resign two years ago.

He said they both agreed that "Iraq is not working well enough and fast enough." He referred to Mr. Gates' "new energy."

He said Mr. Rumsfeld formally submitted his resignation on Election Day.

A defense source said Mr. Rumsfeld knew he was leaving at least several weeks ago.

Another factor in the two men's thinking was that a Democratic victory likely means hours of inquisitions on Iraq policy by several House and Senate committees.

"If he'd have to go up to the Hill three times a week to answer another request, how effective would he really be?" said a former Pentagon official. "I think that's got to be a factor on some level."

His resignation ends the Rumsfeld era in the Pentagon that saw a supremely confident dynamic manager tear up years of static processes and war-fighting strategy to build a faster, lighter military with better intelligence and precision power. Along the way, he alienated some people at the Pentagon, especially senior Army officials.

Mr. Rumsfeld prided himself in management skills. But in the end, it was his perceived management failures in the three-year Iraq war that did him in.

Mr. Gates, an intelligence analyst by trade, is expected to do a top-to-bottom review of Iraq strategy and of the generals executing it. He will also consult with the two officers whom Mr. Rumsfeld had handpicked to run the war, Army Gens. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, and John Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command.

Mr. Rumsfeld, 74, who will stay in office until Mr. Gates' Senate confirmation, became more than a paper-pushing bureaucrat. The September 11, 2001, attacks on New York and the Pentagon thrust him into becoming the face, and some say, the chief strategist for a global campaign to find and kill al Qaeda terrorists.

After the attacks, Mr. Rumsfeld became a regular fixture on global television networks, talking about how he would be happy to have his troops kill members of the Taliban regime. His poll numbers soared to 70 percent job approval in late 2001 and early 2002 as U.S. troops ousted the Taliban in Afghanistan just a few months after the attack on America and as he secretly planned for war in Iraq.

Months after Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein fell in April 2003, a deadly and vibrant insurgency began killing American troops with regularity. They used what the military calls "asymmetrical" weapons -- roadside bombs and suicide bombers. Joined by al Qaeda jihadists, the enemy grew in strength and intelligence. It was able retake cities once held by the U.S. This year, insurgents controlled wide areas of Baghdad, descending the capital into daily sectarian violence as 140,000 American troops changed tactics to try to keep up.

As the U.S. death toll mounted and progress was hard to discern, a growing number of lawmakers called on him to quit. During the election, as Democrats elevated Iraq to their top issue, even a few Republicans made the same demand.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and an influential spokesman on defense issues, declared he had lost confidence in Mr. Rumsfeld.

"This important change offers the administration and Congress a fresh opportunity to examine all aspects of our strategy and tactics in Iraq and make whatever changes are necessary to succeed there," Mr. McCain said yesterday. "I look forward to discussing with Secretary-designate Gates his ideas for correcting the mistakes of the past."

One big mistake in the Iraq war was that the insurgency was not predicted or planned for. Because of this, critics said, the invasion force was too small. And it did not have the proper body or vehicle armor.

A scandal over the mistreatment of some inmates at Saddam's infamous Abu Ghraib prison also made headlines. A human rights groups soon stuck Mr. Rumsfeld with the charge of "the architect of torture." Mr. Rumsfeld's job-approval numbers dipped into the low 30s.

During his tenure as defense secretary, Mr. Rumsfeld transformed and empowered U.S. Special Operations Command as the lead player in the global war. He signed a secret directive in 2003 giving them authority to secretly penetrate foreign lands to hunt down and kill or capture al Qaeda members. Skeptical of the CIA's spying ability, he also gave commandos broader mandate to collect intelligence.

Mr. Bush picked Mr. Rumsfeld not to wage war, but to transform a military still stuck in the Cold War. He focused on the Army, killing some of its pet weapons projects and breaking the Army division system into what became known as combat brigade teams. He also shook up how and where U.S. troops are based abroad, reducing ground forces in both Europe and Asia.

Rumsfeld's Ouster Transforms Iraq Debate (WSJ)

WASHINGTON -- The resignation yesterday of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, in the wake of the Democrats' decisive electoral victory, now opens the door for the biggest change of U.S. policy in Iraq since American troops got bogged down there three years ago.

After gaining substantial power in Congress, Democrats indicated that they intend to push for a different course in Iraq. The planned departure of Mr. Rumsfeld, one of the war's chief architects, signaled that President Bush might be open to far-reaching changes. To his critics, Mr. Rumsfeld had become a symbol of an administration that they saw as unbending and defensive in its handling of the war.

Now come two decisive questions: Can Democrats agree on a unified approach for pulling U.S. troops out? And will Mr. Bush show willingness to weigh those ideas, which he has dismissed for months on the grounds that they would essentially hand victory to the terrorists? Mr. Bush's appointment of Robert Gates, a former head of the Central Intelligence Agency, to replace Mr. Rumsfeld signaled to some that the president might be open to changes.

Triumphant Democrats argue that their victory in Tuesday's congressional elections showed how strongly the U.S. public wants a new approach toward Iraq. But they still aren't clear about how to get the U.S. out of a war that has cost more than 2,800 American lives.

"Nowhere was the call for a new direction more clear from the American people than in the war in Iraq," said the incoming speaker of the House, Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi. "Hopefully, we can work with the president for a new direction, one that solves the problems in Iraq."

Democrats, while divided over details on how to proceed, have coalesced around some core concepts. These include a belief that the U.S. should begin by pulling its forces in Iraq, which currently total about 150,000 troops, off the streets within months and push Iraqi troops to the fore. That would be followed by a gradual withdrawal of the majority of troops from the country. Some of the 50,000 U.S. troops that would be left in Iraq would focus on advising and mentoring Iraqi forces. The majority of those remaining would serve as an emergency force that could swoop in to help Iraqi forces in trouble. Many Democrats also support the idea of holding negotiations with regional powerhouses like Iran and Syria, which maintain deep influence in Iraq.

Other critics of Mr. Rumsfeld's handling of the war, such as Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican, likely will continue to call on the U.S. to beef up its military presence in a bid to resolve Iraq's problems once and for all. The drawback of such an approach is that the badly strained U.S. Army and Marine Corps simply don't have enough available troops.

In remarks to reporters at the White House yesterday, President Bush didn't give a clear sense of how he intends to proceed in coming weeks. He hinted he was open to suggestions, but also vowed he wouldn't leave Iraq in the lurch. Mr. Bush said he is seeking "fresh perspective" on Iraq, but that the U.S. "cannot accept defeat." The president said he would bring back the troops only when Iraq has become "a country that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

White House officials say the events that led to Mr. Rumsfeld's replacement began several weeks ago when Mr. Bush held a series of discussions with his defense secretary about the deteriorating situation in Iraq. A senior administration official says Mr. Bush had planned to replace Mr. Rumsfeld regardless of how the elections played out. White House aides brought Mr. Gates to the presidential compound in Crawford, Texas, for an interview on Sunday.

When Mr. Rumsfeld submitted his resignation early Tuesday afternoon, Mr. Bush accepted it. As polls began closing in parts of the country, the president offered the job to Mr. Gates, officials say. Several White House officials say Mr. Rumsfeld wasn't forced out, although one added: "It was clear to Don that the president wanted him out." At a brief Oval Office ceremony yesterday, Mr. Rumsfeld thanked Mr. Bush for the chance to have served a second tour at the Pentagon, but took no questions about his resignation.

The most important figure at the moment may be a man who comes from neither party's leadership. Former Secretary of State James Baker, an old Bush family friend, is heading a bipartisan task force that is expected soon to issue recommendations for future U.S. policy in Iraq. Mr. Bush has said he plans to take seriously the proposals of the task force, which is co-chaired by former Rep. Lee Hamilton, a Democrat. The president yesterday said he plans to meet with task force members next week.

The commission's influence is likely to be bolstered by the fact that one of its members is Mr. Gates, who will take over for Mr. Rumsfeld. The arrival of Mr. Gates in the upper echelons of the Bush national-security team marks the return to prominence of someone closely associated with the Iraq policy views of the president's father, who took a markedly different approach to Iraq during the Gulf War 15 years ago.

During that conflict, the U.S. drove Iraqi troops out of Kuwait. But the senior Mr. Bush's team decided not to invade Iraq or drive to Baghdad to oust Saddam Hussein. The first Bush team was afraid that such a move would throw the country into turmoil, splinter it into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish sections and compel the U.S. to stay in Iraq to put the nation back together.

Mr. Gates's boss at that time was Brent Scowcroft, then national security adviser, who argued that driving into Iraq would be a mistake. The first President Bush apparently agreed, as did Mr. Baker, then secretary of state.

The Baker commission is widely expected to call for talking directly to Iran and Syria, both American foes, about problems in Iraq, in hopes of getting their help in quelling the violence.

Mr. Gates had earlier advocated direct talks with Iran. In the summer of 2004, Mr. Gates and President Carter's former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski co-chaired a task force that called for direct dialogue, arguing that a lack of American engagement with Iran had harmed American interests.

In a statement yesterday, Mr. Brzezinski, a critic of the war in Iraq, hailed Mr. Gates's appointment and said it may mark "the beginning of a major corrective in American policy towards the Middle East."

Mr. Rumsfeld had long resisted efforts to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. Even after his resignation, it isn't likely that there will be a surge in U.S. ground forces into Iraq, as some people have sought.

The new defense secretary is more likely to oversee a shift of the U.S. effort away from providing security in urban areas such as Baghdad to a more advisory role -- in keeping with many Democrats' proposals. In such a scenario, the Pentagon would turn big U.S. units into quick reaction forces to bail out Iraqi soldiers and advisers who get overrun. Teams of American advisers who live and work with Iraqi units would increase in number. U.S. commanders are also debating how to increase the size and number of provincial reconstruction teams, which oversee economic development and local governance.

That would represent a scaling back of U.S. ambitions. Instead of trying to transform Iraq into a model democracy, the U.S. would try to use the largely Shiite Iraqi Army, which has been beset by corruption and allegations of human-rights abuses, to stabilize the country. Police forces, which have been widely infiltrated by Shiite militias, likely would get less support.

Senior military officials say a push to bolster the U.S. advisory effort in Iraq has been in the works for several weeks and would have occurred even if Mr. Rumsfeld remained in office. There are no plans to reduce U.S. force levels in the country in the next 12 months, nor are there plans to move troops out of urban areas.

But the focus of U.S. troops appears on the verge of shifting. Lt. Gen. Ray Odieno, who will deploy to Iraq in the coming weeks to serve as the second-highest ranking U.S. officer there, said in an interview that a move to restructure and possibly increase the size of the advisory effort would likely happen "sooner rather than later."

In pushing for a new approach in Iraq, the Democrats have public opinion on their side, a fact that President Bush acknowledged yesterday. In exit polls on Tuesday, nearly 60% of voters said the war had not improved the long-term security of the U.S., and 55% said the U.S. should move to pull out some or all troops from Iraq. After Tuesday's defeat, some Republicans may join Democrats in pushing for change.

It may be difficult for Democrats to force the president to change policy. Democratic leaders have said they will not resort to the ultimate cudgel: their grip over wartime appropriations. Yet control of the House -- and likely the Senate -- will give Democrats other tools.

Two Democratic congressmen have said they will introduce bills to increase oversight of the troubled U.S.-led efforts to rebuild Iraq's infrastructure and train its security personnel. Democrats have also said they will subpoena information from the White House and Pentagon and force administration officials to appear at public hearings.

Because the Bush administration may be reluctant to appear too open to Democratic proposals, policy recommendations from the commission headed by Messrs. Baker and Hamilton, known as the Iraq Study Group, could be critical. The panel is set to release its proposal within weeks.

"I predict that the vehicle for a change in Iraq policy will be the Baker-Hamilton commission. It gives Bush a way of saving face," says Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware. In a Democratic Senate, Mr. Biden becomes chairman of its Foreign Relations Committee. "You have to give Bush a way out, because if you back him into a corner, he gets too blindly stubborn to change course," he says.

Democrats are almost certain to back the commission's recommendations, which are expected to include calls for a regional summit with Iraq's neighbors. Several leading Republicans, such as Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the outgoing chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, have also said they are likely to back the panel's proposals.

Still, Democrats and Republicans remain deeply divided about both the path forward in Iraq and the conditions on the ground there.

The administration and many Republicans in Congress argue that for all the problems, progress is being made. The White House says withdrawing U.S. forces before Iraqis are ready to take over security responsibility would lead to greater violence -- and possibly full-scale civil war. Some Republicans also say a U.S. withdrawal would play to Islamic extremists' belief that the U.S. could be driven out of the Middle East through guerrilla violence, and would give terrorists a new haven in the heart of the oil-rich region.

"I can understand Americans saying, 'Come home,'" Mr. Bush said yesterday. "But I don't know if they said, 'Come home and leave behind an Iraq that could end up being a safe haven for al Qaeda.'"

Many Democrats argue that Iraq is spiraling further out of control, with little prospect of improvement. They say the open-ended U.S. military commitment is harming morale and reducing the armed forces' ability to prepare for potential future conflicts with countries like Iran or North Korea. To prevent further damage to the American military and to jolt the Iraqi government to make compromises needed to pacify the country, Democrats assert, the U.S. must move soon to diminish its troop presence in Iraq.

Mr. Biden is championing a proposal he drafted with Leslie Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations. Democratic Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island have hatched another plan, which has received the backing of nearly all Senate Democrats. House Democrats like Rep. Jack Murtha of Pennsylvania have proposed yet other redeployment plans.

Virtually all the Democrats' proposals call for a regional summit to engage Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, to help stabilize the country. They call for a national reconciliation effort within Iraq designed to bridge the gaping divisions between Iraq's Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, especially over control of the country's future oil revenues. There is also a shared appeal among the Democrats' plans for more reconstruction work at a time when U.S. funds are drying up and major companies engaged there, such as Bechtel Corp., are pulling out. And all advocate the gradual redeployment, or pulling out, of U.S. forces, with wide variations on numbers and timing.

Looking to give a catchy ring to these proposals, Democratic Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois calls them "the five R's: reconciliation of the warring parties, reconstruction, responsibility for results, recognizing the parties in the region and then redeployment."

Top Democrats disagree on some important points. The central plank of Sen. Biden's plan calls for Iraq to be divided into three semiautonomous regions -- one largely Shiite, one Sunni and the last Kurdish -- each with its own proportionate share of Iraq's oil wealth. Some prominent Democrats have called that a recipe for massive sectarian strife.

New York's Sen. Hillary Clinton backs the idea of an oil trust that would guarantee that each Iraqi gets a cut from the country's oil revenues instead of divvying it up by region or ethnic identity.

Washington Shake-up, Part 2: Rumsfeld Departs (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

By changing the leadership of the Department of Defense, President Bush has not necessarily changed his policies in Iraq. But he may have changed the tone of Washington's debate about Iraq, at least for now.

It's not yet clear whether Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld chose to leave on his own, or whether he was pushed. It's quite possible that it was a mutual decision, as Mr. Bush implied in his press conference Wednesday afternoon.

But Secretary Rumsfeld, a pugnacious former wrestler and fighter pilot, has long been a symbol of intransigence to the administration's critics. Now, newly empowered Democrats won't have him to kick around during any oversight hearings into the preparation for, and conduct of, the Iraq conflict.

"Don Rumsfeld has been a superb leader during a time of change," said Bush in announcing the change. "Yet he also appreciates the value of bringing in a fresh perspective during a critical period in this war."

From the outset, Rumsfeld was a controversial choice to lead the Pentagon. His abrasive style did not sit well with many in the military, including some of the nation's top uniformed generals and admirals. Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," contains a scene in which Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, when asked how to decode his new boss, simply lays his head down on his desk in frustration.

Rumsfeld was not a secretary the military could easily distract by dispatching him to foreign bases on goodwill tours. His "snowflakes" - short action memos or questions about a particular subject - drifted through Pentagon offices by the dozens, causing many to work late as they drafted replies.

Critics said that Rumsfeld's views on the need for the military to transform itself into a light, lightning-strike force led to the US becoming embroiled in Iraq with too few troops. Rumsfeld himself disputed this notion, saying that he listened to his generals when it came to troop levels, and that if they had asked him for more, he would have provided them.

Initial reaction from Democrats on Rumsfeld's departure was positive, with Senate minority leader Harry Reid of Nevada, among others, saying that Bush had "taken a step in the right direction."

Senator Reid went on to call for a rethinking of the administration's overall approach to Iraq, however. There is no indication yet whether that is in the works.

Given the timing of Rumsfeld's departure, it is difficult to see it as anything less than a concession on Bush's part to the results of Tuesday's Democratic victories. "The American people have spoken," says Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas. "President Bush has listened, and Mr. Rumsfeld is gone."

Robert Gates, the man Bush intends to nominate as Rumsfeld's replacement, is perhaps a more restrained personality. Currently president of Texas A&M University, he was a longtime Washington intelligence and security-affairs official.

Mr. Gates directed the Central Intelligence Agency from 1991 to 1993, having risen through its ranks from an entry-level position. He had joined the agency during the Vietnam War, straight from Indiana University.

He is not a Rumsfeld-level thrower of bombs. He served at the CIA under Stansfield Turner, for instance, whom he later criticized for not cultivating enough of a constituency for the changes at the agency that Mr. Turner wanted to make.

He has been serving as a member of the commission on Iraq policy that includes former Secretary of State James Baker III, among others. That commission is expected to report its findings and possible recommendations for changes in policy to the president in coming weeks.

Stage Set For Iraq Policy Shift (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Democratic control of the House and possibly the Senate, combined with the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, has set the stage for a dramatic shift in the Bush administration's policy toward the Iraq war, lawmakers and experts said. The contours of a new policy are not clear, but there is likely to be more pressure on the Iraqi government to rein in sectarian violence and a growing clamor from Democrats to begin a drawdown of U.S. troops.

Rumsfeld is slated to be replaced by Robert M. Gates, a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group who has spent recent weeks learning the problems of the administration's current approach. Unlike Rumsfeld, who was widely seen as a roadblock to a shift in strategy, Gates is expected to be much more receptive to implementing the group's recommendations, due to be made public about Dec. 7.

Gates has been frustrated that the administration has been unable to adjust to changing circumstances in Iraq, according to one person who has spoken to him about the administration's management of the war. Gates, he said, believes "you can't be afraid to adjust your action to adjust to the realities on the ground."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who would chair the Senate Foreign Relations Committee if Democrats capture the Virginia Senate seat and control of the Senate, said he understood that Gates "has a much more pragmatic and realistic view of the place we find ourselves" in Iraq and is much more willing to work with the uniformed military than Rumsfeld was.

Even before the election, both Democrats and Republicans had been eagerly awaiting the recommendations of the study group, which is headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a Republican, and former Democratic representative Lee Hamilton of Indiana. The group of mainstream foreign policy experts is not poised to make radical suggestions when it unveils its report, but official Washington has expected both parties to seize on its ideas for political cover.

One senior Senate aide said both parties are looking for an exit from Iraq out of "pure political interests." After their devastating losses, Republicans do not want Iraq to be an electoral albatross in 2008; Democrats, meanwhile, do not want it to still be the first order of business if they reoccupy the White House in 2009.

Biden said that a number of Republicans have told him privately that they are willing to push for a change in course on Iraq after the election. "We have a narrow window before 2008 kicks in to get a bipartisan consensus on Iraq," he said.

The administration has long set a goal of a stable, democratic Iraq, suggesting that major troop withdrawals could not be expected until the Iraqi government was capable of sustaining that enterprise itself.

"I'd like our troops to come home, too, but I want them to come home with victory, and that is a country that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself," President Bush said yesterday at a news conference. But he added that "Iraq is not working well enough, fast enough."

The Baker-Hamilton study group is not expected to call for pulling out of Iraq quickly. Rather, insiders say, the most likely recommendation will be to curtail the goal of democratizing Iraq and instead emphasize stability. That might entail devoting more resources to training and equipping Iraq's military, perhaps by radically increasing the size of the U.S. training and advisory effort.

Bush, who will meet with the Baker-Hamilton group next week, told reporters he is awaiting its report, mentioning twice more in his news conference that he would "work" with them. In announcing the nomination of Gates, Bush said that "he will provide the department with a fresh perspective and new ideas on how America can achieve our goals in Iraq."

Democrats served notice that they will push for a change in approach, such as beginning a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops soon. "The American people have spoken," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who is in line to become House speaker in January. "It's important for us to work in a bipartisan way with the president, again, to solve the problem, not to stay the course. That's not working. That's clear."

Specifically, Pelosi said, the administration and Congress need to work together "to send a clear message to the Iraqi government and people that they must disarm the militias, they must amend their constitution, they must engage in regional diplomacy to bring more stability and reconstruction to Iraq, and that we must begin the responsible redeployment of our troops outside of Iraq."

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who likely will take over as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, last year sent Bush a letter calling for the removal of one U.S. brigade -- about 3,500 troops -- for every three Iraqi brigades deemed capable. He said Bush told him his formula was "too rigid," but Skelton said he will press for this approach from his new position of power. "I think this is an important opportunity to begin a new policy direction," he said.

Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), in line to head the House International Relations Committee in the next Congress, said there are few new ideas left to be tried and wasn't sure how much the Baker-Hamilton report would alter the debate.

"You can't unscramble the omelet and the tremendous mistakes that were made after major military operations," he said. "I don't see any magical solutions, but the president may be sending a signal of a change in course" by removing Rumsfeld immediately after the election, he said. "We are willing to meet him halfway."

Democrats yesterday appeared to have little interest in mandating a reduction in U.S. forces through spending cuts, a politically risky step.

Michael O'Hanlon, a defense expert at the Brookings Institution, said congressional Democrats will face some difficult choices as they try to move Bush toward a new approach to the war. He said they could rhetorically put pressure on Bush, but not enough to sound defeatist, keeping blame for policy failures on the GOP.

Democrats also could work with Bush to jointly pressure Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take more action to end the violence in Iraq, but that would directly associate the Democrats with administration policy.

O'Hanlon said the Baker-Hamilton report might help frame the debate by delivering a diagnosis of the problem that both sides can accept, in contrast to rhetoric from Bush that he said was often "divorced from reality."

Rumsfeld's Tenure A Long, Hard Slog (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, November 8, 2006

He has been the square-jawed face of the war, the man behind the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that he predicted were just the beginnings of a long, hard slog.

On Wednesday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld resigned from his post and became the latest casualty of those conflicts — a victim of a war he steadfastly contended the American public simply did not understand.

Standing next to President Bush in a brief White House appearance, Rumsfeld, 74, offered no regret for a war gone wrong that mushroomed into an issue that helped carry Democrats in Tuesday's elections to control of the House and the Senate. Instead, he provided a glimmer of the trademark temperament that has prompted some critics to call him arrogant.

The war, he said, "is not well known. It was not well understood. It is complex for people to comprehend." And he alluded to the crescendo of calls for his ouster, quoting Winston Churchill: "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

In the days after Sept. 11, 2001 — when he helped carry victims of the terrorist attack out of the burning Pentagon — Rumsfeld was hailed by some as a visionary who was smartly shaping the military into a new, agile force for the 21st century.

His adept management of the attack on Afghanistan in October 2001 was deemed a success, as U.S. forces drove out the ruling Taliban. His stock rose over the next year as he delivered televised war briefings from the Pentagon.

The high point may have come as Rumsfeld introduced America to "shock and awe" bombing during the ferocious assault on Baghdad in the opening days of Operation Iraqi Freedom — a tactic meant to force a quick surrender by the Iraqis.

Rumsfeld's plunge from hero soon after the spring 2003 fall of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein to war wounded began in the murky aftermath of the fall of Baghdad. After the initial assault was over, the harder, bloodier struggle for peace began.

U.S. casualties began to mount, war costs ballooned past $300 billion and scandals over the abuse of prisoners in Iraq and elsewhere began to broaden. The calls for his resignation began with a few senior Democrats during the 2004 campaign, but slowly military leaders — mostly some who had already retired — started adding their criticism for his conduct of the war.

In response, Rumsfeld told interviewers that criticism in time of war was to be expected. He dismissed much of it as complaints from "naysayers" reluctant to confront the tough realities of a global conflict pitting Islamic extremists against forces of moderation.

He often told troops in the field that in the future, they would look back on their effort in Iraq or Afghanistan and feel proud that they were part of a historic effort to promote freedom.

While some blame him for having no plans for postwar Iraq and misjudging the strength of the insurgency, others say he served as the lightning rod for criticism of the president's war.

"He really has made some very hard calls in the Department of Defense that needed to be made that he hasn't gotten credit for, and he catches a helluva lot of criticism that he personally probably hasn't earned," said Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum , chief of the National Guard. "He just ends up being a convenient target for somebody's frustration or disenchantment."

Rumsfeld's tenure at the Pentagon parallels that of another man whose legacy is also tied to an unpopular war — Robert McNamara, who led the Pentagon during the Vietnam conflict.

"They became identified with the war and the war with them," said Andrew Krepinevich, executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington. "Ultimately they departed as a consequence of the crisis in the field and politics here at home."

Rumsfeld offered his resignation twice to Bush during the furor over prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, but Bush repeatedly declared his support for his embattled secretary. As recently as last month, when the latest in a series of critical books on the war was published, Rumsfeld snapped at reporters asking about his future.

"No, no, no," he said, he was not resigning.

Even Bush, when questioned by reporters a week ago, again declared his support for the secretary and insisted Rumsfeld would stay through the end of his term.

But with casualties climbing beyond 2,800 and U.S. troop levels in Iraq stuck at about 152,000 with little hope of significant reductions anytime soon, Rumsfeld became a political liability the administration could no longer endure. Even the independent Army Times, which serves the armed forces, called for him to resign earlier this week.

And as the announcement sent shock waves through Washington on Wednesday, Bush acknowledged that, in truth, he had been considering the change for at least two weeks.

Rumsfeld remained closed-mouthed about his departure until the very end. Early morning meetings went on as scheduled Wednesday, with no visible inkling of the announcement that was coming.

Then, at 10 a.m., he told the news to Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He asked Pace to let all of the senior military commanders know, shortly before Bush's 1 p.m. address. Rumsfeld also told a few other close senior staff, but much of the Pentagon learned it when it broke in the news.

"I've been here six years and I think it's probably good for this department to have a change in leadership that is fresh, that is supportive of the president, as I am," he said. "It will be a different Congress, a different environment, moving towards a presidential election and a lot of partisanship, and it struck me that this would be a good thing for everybody."

Democrats Vow Not To Block Gates Hearings (RC)

By John Stanton, Emily Yehle

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Senate Democrats on Wednesday said they would not look to block hearings on President Bush's nomination of Robert Gates to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, although they stopped short of pledging to confirm Gates during the upcoming lame-duck session of Congress.

Bush announced Gates' nomination after Rumsfeld resigned Wednesday morning. Although Bush in a press conference said he had been preparing for Rumsfeld's departure for at least several days, the timing was viewed by Democrats and political observers as a response to Tuesday's election results.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said in an interview with Roll Call that he thought the Senate could address the nomination during the lame duck, so long as Gates is qualified and is not controversial. "I think we should do it as quickly as we can," Reid said, adding that "the country needs a Secretary of Defense."

Similarly, Senate Armed Services ranking member Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) said he would like to move the nomination as quickly as possible and dismissed any possibility that Democrats would look to hold up the nomination until next year.

"I wouldn't do it for that reason. If we can get the information we need ... I think we ought to then expedite the Senate consideration of that nomination. I would not want to hold it up until next year," Levin said.

Levin and fellow Armed Services member Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) also said the nominee himself may not be as important as whether Rumsfeld's departure signals an actual change in administration policy on Iraq. "What we need is a change in direction," Levin said. "That's what counts regardless of who the secretary of Defense is."

Reed added, "What we don't want to see is repetition of the Rumsfeld situation where relevant information was not forthcoming [to Congress] and it in fact undercut our ability to our job."

Gates, a longtime friend of both President Bush and his father, former President George H.W. Bush, has had a long history of political and business ties to the Bush family.

He served as the director of the Central Intelligence Agency under former President Bush, and has acknowledged deciding to begin his current academic career with Texas A&M at the request of the Bush family, according to press reports in the 1990s covering his arrival at the university.

Although Gates has only given a small amount of money to federal campaigns — including $2,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign in 2004, he sits on the boards of directors for several high-profile companies that have been generous GOP donors.

Executives for NACCO International, Brinker Industries and Parker Drilling Company, as well as Brinker's federal political action committee, have given millions of dollars in contributions to federal candidates and PACs since 2000, the vast majority going to Republicans, according to federal campaign finance records.

Gates also is no stranger to controversy in Washington, D.C. During his time with the CIA under former President Ronald Reagan he became involved in the Iran-Contra scandal, and was accused of overseeing a program which spied on Members of Congress as part of the elaborate guns-for-drugs scheme. Gates, however, denied any knowledge of the program during his confirmation hearings in 1991, and a Democratically controlled Senate confirmed him.

Gates Nomination Marks Change Of Direction For Bush (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — In turning to former CIA Director Robert M. Gates to take the reins at the Pentagon, President Bush has selected a low-key loyalist who is in many ways the opposite of outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Whereas Rumsfeld often seemed bent on running roughshod over the Pentagon brass, Gates is described by longtime associates as collegial and a consensus-builder.

If Rumsfeld had little regard for President George H.W. Bush and many of his pragmatic security advisers, including Brent Scowcroft, Gates was part of that inner circle. He remains close not only to Scowcroft but to other Rumsfeld rivals, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Rumsfeld placed little trust in intelligence agencies and pushed the military to encroach on their turf. In a turning of the tables, a 27-year veteran of the CIA and the National Security Council is poised to take charge of the military.

Democrats praised Gates' nomination, hoping for a less combative Pentagon chief. But Gates has proved controversial in the past. He was forced to withdraw from his first nomination as CIA director before winning a split-vote confirmation four years later.

Across the national-security community Wednesday, the deep contrasts between Rumsfeld and Gates were a subject of conversation.

Rumsfeld "is a guy who is kind of burdened with his own certitude at times," said John Gannon, a former high-ranking CIA official who worked with Rumsfeld and Gates. "That is not Bob Gates. He came out of an analytic culture where listening to the ideas of others and questioning your own assumptions is part of the tradecraft."

In announcing the changes Wednesday, Bush praised Gates' experience, but he also made clear that he expected the nominee to find fresh approaches in Iraq.

"He's a steady, solid leader who can help make the necessary adjustments in our approach to meet our current challenges," Bush said.

Gates is a member of a White House panel, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., that has been charged with developing an array of alternatives to foundering Iraq policies. Gates recently traveled to Iraq as part of that team, according to the White House, and met with Iraqi leaders and U.S. military commanders.

Whereas Rumsfeld was a leading advocate for invading Iraq in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks -- part of an ideological team that regarded deposing Saddam Hussein as unfinished business -- Gates was among those who cautioned the first President Bush not to press toward Baghdad after expelling the Iraqi army from Kuwait in 1992.

Gates, 63, started out at the CIA fresh out of college as a Soviet analyst and is the only agency officer to rise through the analytic ranks to take the top job. He served as CIA director under the elder Bush for a little more than a year before President Clinton was elected.

Gates, who has been president of Texas A&M University since 2002, is not without detractors. He was first nominated to be CIA director by President Reagan in 1987, but he withdrew amid congressional opposition. Gates was considered too closely tied to the Iran-Contra scandal, which had been engineered by former CIA Director William J. Casey while Gates was his deputy.

Rather than taking the helm at the CIA, Gates joined the National Security Council staff at the White House, where he made connections with Scowcroft and Rice.

After the Iran-Contra scandal faded, Gates was nominated to be CIA director by President George H.W. Bush. His 1991 confirmation turned into a battle. Gates was accused of politicizing intelligence -- a charge that has been repeatedly aimed at the White House of George W. Bush. Agency analysts testified that he was heavy-handed in seeking to influence assessments of the Soviet Union. Helater was accused of failing to anticipate that communist regime's collapse.

Gates was confirmed, but his margin of approval -- 64-31 -- represented the largest expression of Senate opposition to a nominee for intelligence director.

One of Gates' first initiatives as director was to confront perceptions that intelligence had been politicized within the agency. He appointed a task force on "analytic objectivity" and implemented all its recommendations.

While CIA director, Gates became embroiled in a controversy over an investigation of questionable financial dealings between a U.S. branch of an Italian government-owned bank and the Iraqi government before the 1991 Persian Gulf War. The Senate Intelligence Committee faulted CIA and Justice Department officials but found no criminal wrongdoing.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, D-W.Va., ranking Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said Wednesday that the Gates nomination suggested Bush was "searching for a realistic and pragmatic approach in Iraq and the war on terror, rather than continuing on a course driven by ideology."

Bush's Choice Of Gates Sets Stage For Shift On Iraq War Policy (BLOOM)

By Janine Zacharia

Bloomberg, November 9, 2006

Nov. 9 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush's decision to tap one of his father's old advisers, former CIA chief Robert Gates, to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld suggests a readiness to examine a new strategy in Iraq.

Bush's announcement yesterday came after congressional elections swept Democrats to power in the U.S. House on a wave of public discontent about the war in Iraq. The president wanted to move quickly to defuse criticism of his handling of the war effort, analysts said.

Gates is one of 10 members of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel trying to devise a blueprint for stabilizing the country that can be embraced by Bush. Gates ``will certainly try to extricate us from Iraq, but how fast that can be done I don't know," said Admiral Stansfield Turner, who headed the Central Intelligence Agency from 1977 to 1981.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, former President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser, called Gates' nomination ``the best appointment that President Bush has made" and said it ``may be marking the beginning of a major correction in American policy toward the Middle East."

Gates, 63, who has served in both Democratic and Republican administrations, is known in defense and foreign policy circles as a pragmatist and an advocate of positions Rumsfeld resisted, such as direct negotiations with Iran, Iraq's Shiite neighbor.

Two years ago, Gates co-chaired with Brzezinski a task force on Iran policy that called for selective engagement with Iran ``to promote regional stability."

Father's Team

Gates has remained close to former President George H.W. Bush, and is president of Texas A&M University, which hosts the Bush presidential library. In addition to Gates, the current President Bush is turning to another of his father's elder statesmen for help on Iraq: James Baker.

The former secretary of state is co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group along with ex-Representative Lee Hamilton, an Indiana Democrat. Bush said he will meet next week with the panel.

``I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress" in Iraq, Bush said yesterday.

The Baker panel, which includes officials from President Bill Clinton's administration, is reviewing options for a U.S. withdrawal as Sunni resistance hardens and American influence wanes in Iraq. Bush affirmed yesterday that he wouldn't pull troops out prematurely amid mounting violence.

Civil War

A U.S. intelligence official familiar with the Iraqi insurgency said in an interview that the attempt to create a democracy in Iraq is failing in an atmosphere the official described as a civil war. The official said to restore order and undercut the rebellion, Iraq may have to declare an emergency and install an authoritarian Shiite government to replace what he characterized as the ineffectual Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

The U.S. needs to train and equip as many as 900,000 Iraqi security forces, almost three times the number now planned, and must find a way to persuade Sunni Arab governments such as Saudi Arabia to come off the sidelines and help stabilize Iraq, the official said.

Gates has experience on Iraq, having served as National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft's deputy during the Persian Gulf war in 1991. He has a doctorate in Soviet and Russian history and worked in the 1980s with CIA director William Casey, who led President Ronald Reagan's covert wars to oppose communism in Central America.

Andrew Krepinevich, who heads the non-partisan Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington and has briefed Pentagon officials on Iraq, sees changes coming.

``One can make a plausible case that the White House has some insight into the conclusions of the Iraq Study Group, they know what is coming and Gates is comfortable with it," Krepinevich said.

Democrats Rejoice

Senator Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, said Gates' nomination may indicate Bush ``is searching for a realistic and pragmatic approach in Iraq and the war on terror, rather than continuing on a course driven by ideology."

Michigan's Carl Levin, who would be chairman of the Armed Services Committee if Democrats take control of the Senate, said he will work to confirm Gates before the end of the year.

In remarks at the White House, Gates spoke about challenges beyond Iraq, including Afghanistan and the broader fight against terrorism. ``I believe the outcome of these conflicts will shape our world for decades to come," he said.

Criticism of Gates

Former White House counterterrorism czar Richard Clarke accused Gates, in testimony before the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, of weakening the CIA's spying capabilities. U.S. officials were slow to learn of al-Qaeda's rise because of that, Clarke said.

``When it comes to telling truth to power, this guy never did," said Goodman, now a senior fellow with the Center for International Policy in Washington. ``He serves a master. He will be very loyal. But will that be good for the country? Will that be good at getting out accurate information on Iraq?"

`Open Minded'

If confirmed, Gates would replace a defense chief known for a brusque and energetic management style, a zeal to transform the military and an unwillingness to admit mistakes -- all of which made Rumsfeld one of the most divisive figures in Bush's cabinet.

By contrast, Gates has proven he is ``open minded and he can work with Democrats," said Michael O'Hanlon, a defense analyst for the non-partisan Brookings Institution.

``Gates has a daunting job, but if I was going to make a list of my top five favorite Republicans with the sheer intellectual firepower to come up with new ideas, Gates would be on that list," O'Hanlon said.

David Boren, a Democrat who chaired the Senate Intelligence Committee from 1987 through 1992, said Gates would be a welcomed change from Rumsfeld's polarizing style. Gates ``always gave members of both parties an equal seat at the table," he said.

Rumsfeld Era

Rumsfeld, 74, oversaw the global fight against terrorism that followed the Sept. 11 attacks. While the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq initially enjoyed broad support, the public's outlook on the conflicts has soured amid sectarian and insurgent violence.

Bush said he met Gates two days before the election at his Crawford, Texas, ranch to discuss the job. Gates ``understands that defeat is not an option in Iraq," Bush said.

Prior to his nomination yesterday, Gates was perhaps best remembered in Washington for his role in the 1980s Iran-Contra scandal. As deputy CIA director under Reagan, he was examined by a special prosecutor who declined to bring criminal charges.

Gates was investigated about whether he misled Congress about when he first learned that White House aides were secretly diverting profits of arms sales to Iran to buy weapons for rebels fighting Nicaragua's anti-American government. The arms sales were intended to persuade Iran to help free hostages held by terrorists in Lebanon.

Levin, who voted against Gates when he was nominated for CIA director, said it would be ``premature" to discuss which way he is leaning now. ``I want to give him a fair and fresh look," he said.

Robert Gates, A Cautious Player From A Past Bush Team (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — In choosing Robert M. Gates as his next defense secretary, President Bush reached back to an earlier era in Republican foreign policy, one marked more by caution and pragmatism than that of the neoconservatives who have shaped the Bush administration's war in Iraq and confrontations with Iran and North Korea.

Soft-spoken but tough-minded, Mr. Gates, 63, is in many ways the antithesis of Donald H. Rumsfeld, the brash leader he would replace. He has been privately critical of the administration's failure to execute its military and political plans for Iraq, and he has spent the last six months quietly debating new approaches to the war, as a member of the Iraq Study Group run by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton.

Mr. Gates last served in Washington 13 years ago, and Mr. Bush made clear on Wednesday that he regarded his nominee as someone who would bring new perspective to the final two years of his tenure.

It was under Mr. Bush's father that Mr. Gates first rose to influence, as deputy national security adviser and then director of central intelligence. He was not part of the group that advised the current President Bush during his 2000 campaign, and he has publicly questioned the administration's approach to Iran, saying in a 2004 report for the Council on Foreign Relations that its refusal to talk to the Tehran government was ultimately self-defeating.

"This is a signal that there will be a major effort to avoid confrontation on national security issues," said Dov Zakheim, a former senior official in Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon who left the administration in 2004. He described Mr. Gates as "a pragmatist and a realist" who would be "no lightning rod."

A longtime Soviet analyst who spent two decades at the Central Intelligence Agency, Mr. Gates served as deputy to Brent Scowcroft, the national security adviser, during the administration of George H. W. Bush. There, he worked closely with Mr. Baker and Condoleezza Rice. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, now the C.I.A. director, also served on the staff of the National Security Council at the time.

Mr. Gates was confirmed in 1991 as director of central intelligence after a bruising confirmation fight in which subordinates alleged that he had politicized reporting on the Soviet Union. He has spent the last 13 years outside of government, in lucrative business posts and at Texas A&M University, first as dean of the George H. W. Bush School of Government and since 2002 as president.

Only 22 months ago, Mr. Gates turned down President Bush's invitation to become the first director of national intelligence. After agonizing for more than two weeks, Mr. Gates later recounted, he decided during a tearful, late-night walk that he "could not leave" the university to return to Washington.

But since March, as a member of Mr. Baker's Iraq Study Group, Mr. Gates has been pondering the central defense policy quandary facing the administration. Summoned to the president's ranch over the weekend and offered the defense secretary's job, this time Mr. Gates said yes.

"Because so many of America's sons and daughters in our armed forces are in harm's way, I did not hesitate when the president asked me to return to duty," Mr. Gates said at the White House ceremony on Wednesday.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser under President Carter and co-author with Mr. Gates of the report on Iran policy, said he hoped the appointment would mean "a major corrective in American policy toward the Middle East."

Born and raised in Wichita, Kan., Robert Michael Gates, whose father sold wholesale auto parts, became an Eagle Scout (he is currently president of the National Eagle Scout Association) and studied European history at the College of William and Mary. He was recruited by the intelligence agency while completing a master's degree at Indiana University and in 1974 finished a doctorate at Georgetown University, writing his dissertation on Soviet views of China.

He first served on the National Security Council staff from 1974 to 1979 under Presidents Nixon, Ford and Carter. After returning to the C.I.A., he was given a series of pivotal jobs by Director William Casey, including deputy director and chairman of the National Intelligence Council.

If Mr. Gates was initially reluctant to return to Washington, it may be because he knows what it means to be at the center of political crossfire. First picked by President Reagan in 1987 to succeed Mr. Casey, Mr. Gates withdrew in the face of senators' concern that he had not been candid about his knowledge of the Iran-contra affair.

In 1991, re-nominated by the first President Bush, he faced a grueling confirmation involving not only Iran-contra but also some colleagues' accusation that he had skewed intelligence reporting on the Soviet Union to suit the Reagan White House. Mr. Gates was confirmed, 61 to 31, as the youngest C.I.A. director in history and oversaw the agency's initial effort to tackle post-cold-war threats.

He later defended his C.I.A. record in a 1996 memoir, "From the Shadows: The Ultimate Insider's Story of Five Presidents and How They Won the Cold War."

On Wednesday, a C.I.A. subordinate who had clashed with him offered a harsh assessment. "This is not a person with a history of telling truth to power," said the former subordinate, Melvin A. Goodman, a Soviet analyst from 1966 to 1990. Mr. Goodman called Mr. Gates a micromanager and "not a big-picture person," though he also called him "a hard-working, disciplined person who's totally loyal to his bosses."

David Boren, a former Democratic chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, had warm praise for Mr. Gates's service. "I found him to be highly intelligent, an excellent manager of the large and complex intelligence community, and totally bipartisan in his approach," Mr. Boren said in a statement.

Bobby R. Inman, a former C.I.A. deputy director and National Security Agency director and an old friend of Mr. Gates, called him "a good listener" who, "after he makes up his mind, is very decisive."

"He's impatient with those whose minds don't move as fast as his does, but he's not arrogant," Mr. Inman said. He compared Mr. Gates's nomination to President Johnson's choice of Clark Clifford, another unflappable old Washington hand, to replace the lightning rod Robert S. McNamara as defense secretary in 1968 at the height of the Vietnam war.

A hint of the approach Mr. Gates might bring to the job, drawing on his experience at the end of the cold war, can be found in his remarks in 2004 at the release of the Council on Foreign Relations report, called "Iran: Time for a New Approach."

"One of our recommendations is that the U.S. government lift its ban in terms of nongovernmental organizations being able to operate in Iran," Mr. Gates said. "Greater interaction between Iranians and the rest of the world," he said, "sets the stage for the kind of internal change that we all hope will happen there."

Gates To Inherit Challenges On Multiple Fronts (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

Robert Gates, the former director of the Central Intelligence Agency nominated as defense secretary, will inherit a military badly strained by the Iraq and Afghanistan wars and increasingly skeptical of the transformative vision of his predecessor, Donald Rumsfeld.

But it remains to be seen what kind of long-term vision Mr. Gates, the 63-year-old former director of the Central Intelligence Agency nominated yesterday, will bring to that military if he's confirmed.

Mr. Gates is known as a master operator of the national-security bureaucracy. He is a specialist in Soviet affairs who moved between CIA and National Security Council staff jobs early in his career. He rose in the CIA bureaucracy despite the fact that his background was as an analyst rather than a covert operative, which then was the more normal route to the top.

In the Reagan administration, Mr. Gates had brushes with controversy because of his role as deputy to then-CIA director William Casey, who was deeply involved in sending arms covertly to Nicaragua's Contra rebels. That controversy kept Mr. Gates for a while from being elevated to the job he had always most coveted, director of central intelligence. He ultimately got that job after working as deputy national security adviser for President Bush's father. During his time in the first Bush administration, he was one of the architects of the first Persian Gulf war against Iraq, and helped manage the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Gates, a Kansan with a flat Midwestern accent, became a close and trusted adviser to the first President Bush along the way, and also worked closely with the current secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, who worked below him as an NSC staff member. He had a natural link with Ms. Rice because both are, by background, specialists in Russia and the former Soviet Union. He also developed a close relationship with Brent Scowcroft, the first President Bush's national security adviser, who now has a strained relationship with the Bush White House because of his criticisms of the current approach to Iraq.

A principal question facing Mr. Gates, currently president of Texas A&M University, is what role he will play in policy formulation, as opposed to more narrow management of the Defense Department. People who know him say he is more of a pragmatist who is likely to adopt a more measured approach to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Inside the Defense Department, the major issue facing him will be whether to shift money from the Air Force and the navy to buttress the Army. Some Army generals -- as well as Sen. John McCain -- have begun to call for a dramatic increase in their budget to reflect a future they believe will be dominated by messy guerrilla wars. Earlier this year, Gen. Peter Schoomaker called for increasing the Army's budget in 2008 to about $140 billion, up from a planned budget of about $114 billion. Such a large increase to the Army budget isn't likely to occur without at least some scaling back of big weapons programs like missile defense, major ships or some of the next-generation fighter-jet programs.

Mr. Rumsfeld had led an ambitious effort to remake the U.S. military into a faster, leaner force. His vision was driven by the belief that communications technology and precision weapons had the capacity to change some fundamental rules of war. The rapid toppling of the Taliban in 2001 and the three-week push that displaced Saddam Hussein in 2003 seemed to confirm his belief that speed and precision could substitute for large ground forces.

But Iraq and Afghanistan have since revealed the limits of a relatively small, high-tech force in bringing security and stability to chaotic lands that could become havens for terrorists. Criticism of Mr. Rumsfeld had been building steadily for almost three years. At first, Democrats excoriated him for failing to more quickly obtain protective armor for troops in Iraq. Then a chorus of retired generals called for his firing, saying his micromanaging of the war planning had resulted in too small a force being sent to Iraq. As U.S. deaths in Iraq surged in the last six weeks, many Republicans jumped on the bandwagon.

It is likely that a Democratic-controlled House of Representatives would have subpoenaed Mr. Rumsfeld early and often as the prominent face of an increasingly unpopular war. His resignation robs opponents of the war of a chance to revisit mistakes in the conflict and make theater of his congressional appearances. It also could make it easier for the administration to hammer out a compromise with moderate critics of the war -- somewhere between its early vow of total victory and opponents' calls for quick withdrawal.

Though killing or delaying big weapons programs is never popular in Congress, some Democrats yesterday suggested they would be open to shifting away from the high-tech weapons systems that made up the core of the Rumsfeld vision to a military more oriented to prevailing in messy guerrilla wars like Iraq, where the premium is on large formations of trained soldiers with more basic equipment.

Asked how he would balance defense-spending pressures, Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton, the likely new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said, "The first thing you have to do is take care of the troops. You can have all the fancy weapons systems in the world, but if you don't have the people, you don't gain a great deal."

Gates To Offer "Fresh Perspective" On Iraq (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

Former CIA Director Robert M. Gates, President Bush's choice to be the new defense secretary, is a retired career intelligence analyst with little experience in military and defense affairs.

If confirmed by the Senate, the university president will take over the Pentagon at a time when U.S. troops are fighting the global war against terrorism, with its most visible and costly battlefront in Iraq.

Mr. Bush, introducing his nominee yesterday, said Mr. Gates "will provide the department with a fresh perspective and new ideas on how America can achieve our goals in Iraq."

Mr. Gates said: "The United States is at war in Iraq and Afghanistan, we are fighting against terrorism worldwide, and we face other serious challenges to peace and our security. I believe the outcome of these conflicts will shape our world for decades to come."

Noting that long-term U.S. strategic interests and security are at risk and U.S. armed forces are in harm's way, Mr. Gates said he did not hesitate to accept Mr. Bush's request to take the Pentagon post.

Iraq looms large in his new position and remains a major focus of political and other critics, including some in the U.S. military and especially the Army who oppose current strategy and tactics, but who have offered few alternatives.

Mr. Gates, 63, currently is part of a special review panel on Iraq headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, Indiana Democrat. The panel is expected to present recommendations soon for sharply revamping the current policy on the Iraq counterinsurgency campaign.

An aide to former President George H.W. Bush, on whose National Security Council staff he served, Mr. Gates is currently president of Texas A&M University, a position he has held since 2002. Before that he headed the George Bush School of Government and Public Service at Texas A&M from 1999 to 2001.

Little is known of Mr. Gates' views on defense and military affairs, other than that he initiated a reform effort to increase intelligence support to the military after shortcomings were found after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. He spent two years as an Air Force intelligence officer from 1966 to 1968, and his career in intelligence focused on the Soviet Union.

He is expected to bring new defense and military policies to the Bush administration that likely will be more moderate than the generally conservative Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, whom he would replace. Based on recent public statements, he is also likely to favor intelligence-based solutions over military ones. By contrast, Mr. Rumsfeld has been a longtime skeptic of U.S. intelligence capabilities, often referring to intelligence products as incomplete or inadequate.

Mr. Gates, as co-chairman of a recent Council on Foreign Relations task force on Iran, stated that forcing regime change in Iran without military action is "highly unlikely" to succeed, and that military action also will not work because of U.S. commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan. The former CIA chief said he favors a policy of "engagement" with Iran on its refusal to abide by international agreements on its nuclear program.

He said in a speech last year that U.S. intelligence agencies had been unfairly criticized for failures, such as those related to the September 11 attacks and Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. Intelligence during the Cold War played an auxiliary role, but is a main element of the war on terrorism and is also more difficult, Mr. Gates said.

Mr. Gates' intelligence career and views were examined in detail during a contentious Senate nomination battle in 1991 for his CIA directorship, which he held from 1991 to 1993. He joined the CIA in 1966. From 1989 to 1991, he was deputy national security adviser in the White House National Security Council.

Senate hearings on the matter revealed Mr. Gates as a seasoned if clean-cut bureaucrat, a view confirmed by his 1996 memoir, "From the Shadows," which revealed his bureaucrat-spy career under five presidents.

Defense Nominee Can Do The Job Without 'having Rocks Thrown At Him' (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary nominee Robert Gates served more than two decades in intelligence, has served on corporate boards and done a stint as a presidential adviser on national security affairs.

But those who have observed Gates in his most recent incarnation, as president of Texas A&M University since 2002, say that job may have provided the best test of the skills he'll need to succeed if he's confirmed to succeed Donald Rumsfeld as defense secretary.

"He undertook big changes, and evidently did it with good nature and without too many bad feelings," says Felix Moos, an anthropology professor at the University of Kansas and an adviser to the intelligence community.

"He got accomplished what he felt needed to be accomplished" — including firing a football coach and ending admission preferences for children of alumni — "without being picketed or having rocks thrown at him."

Raised in Wichita, he joined the CIA shortly after graduating from the College of William and Mary in 1965. Gates, short and round-faced, was no "James Bond type," as he told the Houston Chronicle in 2004. Instead, he was an intelligence analyst specializing in the Soviet Union; spent three years as a deputy director and ran the CIA for 14 months ending in January 1993.

At the CIA, Gates was known as a committed Cold Warrior who believed the Soviet Union was unlikely to become a Western-style market democracy despite Community Party leader Mikhail Gorbachev's reforms of the 1980s.

Gates was alleged by former CIA subordinates to have slanted intelligence about the Soviet threat, Newsweek reported Wednesday on its website. As CIA director, however, he won the respect of liberals for a speech challenging the notion that intelligence collection should serve an administration's goals.

"Bob Gates … said that national security professionals were duty bound to speak the truth to power, telling political leadership when their policies had veered off course," Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., a ranking member of the House Intelligence Committee, said Wednesday.

During the 1980s, Gates was involved in the Reagan administration's plan to sell arms to the government of Iran in return for Iran's help in freeing Americans held hostage in the Middle East.

Those deals were at the heart of the Iran-contra scandal. Lawrence Walsh, the independent counsel investigating the affair, concluded in 1993 that Gates had not been truthful about when he learned money from the Iran sales had been diverted to help the rebels fighting Nicaragua's Soviet-backed government.

Gates claimed he had forgotten an earlier meeting to discuss the funds. He was not prosecuted.

If confirmed, Gates will take over a Pentagon where Rumsfeld's well-documented crustiness has heightened tensions already flowing from a difficult and controversial war. Military analyst Charles Pena says Gates will likely have a much smoother relationship with senior military leaders and with Congress than Rumsfeld did.

"Gates is more likely to be willing to reach across the aisle and find bipartisan consensus, rather than the Rumsfeld approach, which was more or less 'my way or the highway,' " said Pena, of the Independence Institute in Oakland, Calif.

Gates will enter the Pentagon soon after working with Bush's Iraq Study Group to help develop a new U.S. strategy for the war.

Gates' work on the panel is "not inconsequential," says John McLaughlin, a former CIA deputy director and Gates colleague. "What we're seeing is a convergence of pragmatic people … on the next steps."

Two years ago, Gates and Democrat Zbigniew Brzezinski chaired a commission that urged a new approach to Iran that stressed negotiating areas of mutual interest, such as security in Iraq, before tackling nuclear issues.

This isn't the first time Bush has come calling. In January 2005, Gates turned down an offer to take the newly created post of director of national intelligence.

At the time, Gates said he wanted to fulfill a five-year plan at Texas A&M that included $500 million in new construction and the hiring of 450 new faculty members.

"Much has happened both here and around the world since then," he wrote on the university's website Wednesday afternoon.

"I love Texas A&M deeply, but I love our country more, and like the many Aggies in uniform, I am obligated to do my duty."

Gates Well-armed For Tough Job (DMN)

By Jim Landers

The Dallas Morning News, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON – Robert Gates leaves Texas A&M for one of the most thankless jobs in the country.

But he returns to Washington with powerful, pragmatic allies for the battles ahead with a new Congress and within the White House itself over Iraq policy.

Dr. Gates comes from the circle of national security aides who counseled President Bush's father from 1989 to 1992, including Gen. Brent Scowcroft, Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Gen. Colin Powell, who was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

They urged the elder President Bush not to go on to Baghdad after the defeat of Saddam Hussein's forces in Kuwait.

They have sometimes criticized the current administration's decision to go to war in Iraq, but more often have kept silent about the conduct of the war.

In the current administration's first term, Mr. Powell – then secretary of state – "was a pragmatist, but he got swamped by Don Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney," said one former GOP national security aide, speaking on condition of anonymity.

"Whether Gates will be able to come out against them or the boss himself, that remains to be seen. But he will have someone else to point to as a source of wisdom."

Dr. Gates, 63, said Wednesday that he hadn't anticipated returning to public service.

But he'd already been called back into the national security arena in April as a member of the Iraq Study Group headed by Mr. Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton.

Mr. Bush said he'd be meeting with Mr. Baker next week.

The Iraq Study Group's report is thought to be nearing completion.

"I understand their report is not quite ready yet, but the members pretty much know what it's going to say," said Richard Stoll, a Rice University political science professor.

"It's interesting he [Mr. Bush] would pick somebody familiar with the study group's deliberations."

Dr. Gates can call on Mr. Baker, Mr. Scowcroft and others from the first Bush administration, but he can also seek support from Democrats.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser to former President Jimmy Carter, brought Dr. Gates to the White House from the CIA as a Soviet specialist.

"I think the Gates appointment is the best appointment that President Bush has made in the course of his six years in office," Mr. Brzezinski said.

"I co-chaired with him [Dr. Gates] two years ago a study on American policy towards Iran.

"He is a remarkably intelligent, responsible and balanced individual whose judgment can be trusted and whose common sense is reassuring. This appointment may be marking the beginning of a major corrective in American policy towards the Middle East."

Mr. Bush said Dr. Gates will bring a "fresh perspective" to the Defense Department.

After an election in which the country made clear that it isn't happy with the course of the war, Mr. Stoll said he finds it hard to believe Dr. Gates is eager for the assignment.

"I don't think he or anyone would relish this task, but somebody's got to do it, and I'm sure the president prevailed on his patriotism and sense of duty," Mr. Stoll said.

Dr. Gates, a native of Kansas, was recruited to the CIA in 1966 while studying for his master's degree at Indiana University.

He was commissioned an officer in the Air Force in 1967 and served in the Strategic Air Command.

Dr. Gates got a doctorate in Soviet and Russian history from Georgetown University in 1974 and went on to become the spy agency's top analyst on Soviet affairs.

During the Reagan administration, Dr. Gates was deputy to CIA Director Robert Casey, whose aggressive and clandestine foreign policy forays helped lead the White House into a scandal known as the Iran-Contra affair.

White House aides and CIA agents sold weapons to the revolutionary Islamic regime in Iran in an effort to win release of Americans held captive by Shiite radicals in Lebanon, and they then used the money to supply the Contra rebels fighting the leftist Sandinista regime in Nicaragua.

Mr. Casey died just as the scandal came to light, and President Reagan nominated Dr. Gates to take over as CIA director. But the scandal ruined his chances of confirmation by the Senate.

The first President Bush named Dr. Gates to head the CIA in 1991, and he held that position until 1993.

At the urging of Gen. Scowcroft, Dr. Gates was named interim dean of the George Bush School of Government and Public Service at Texas A&M. He held that post from 1999 until 2001, and became president of Texas A&M in 2002.

Gen. Scowcroft has publicly criticized the current administration's Middle East policies and the war in Iraq.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said that while Dr. Gates may be close to Gen. Scowcroft, Mr. Bush still has the final say.

"Clearly if confirmed, Secretary Gates will serve at the president's pleasure, just as Secretary Rumsfeld did," Mr. Cornyn said.

"But what will be useful is to hear sort of a fresh set of ideas, and somebody who has not been burdened by the daily conduct of the global war on terror."

Whether Dr. Gates brings a different view, he at least won't be a lightning rod, said Rep. Mac Thornberry, R-Clarendon, a member of the House Armed Services Committee.

"Rumsfeld's not the issue anymore. He was going to be a continuing target for attacks, and just by having a new person there is a chance, with the Baker-Hamilton group, to try to have some bipartisan work ... on the path ahead," Mr. Thornberry said.

Robert Gates Lauded As Breaker Of Barriers (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson, Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Robert M. Gates, a veteran intelligence official whom President Bush nominated to become his new secretary of defense, is widely viewed as a consensus-builder who may break down barriers between civilian and military leaders -- as well as between the Pentagon and other agencies -- that grew legendary under Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Gates, 63, is a close associate of former president George H.W. Bush and was deputy national security adviser during the Persian Gulf War. He rose rapidly through CIA ranks as a Soviet expert with extensive White House experience to become director of central intelligence from 1991 to 1993. The only setback in his career came in 1987 when he withdrew as President Ronald Reagan's nominee to be CIA director because of his involvement in the Iran-contra affair. In all, Gates has served six presidents in both Republican and Democratic administrations.

A native Kansan with shrewd bureaucratic instincts, Gates lacks the top-down, take-no-prisoners managerial style that won Rumsfeld enemies and instead is more likely to set up task forces and forge agreements behind the scenes, associates said. While Rumsfeld issues flurries of directives and memos, nicknamed "snowflakes," in keeping with his business-executive past, Gates is a listener and leads with the inherent circumspection of an intelligence analyst, they said.

"Rumsfeld's a wrestler. Bob Gates likes to hike," said Richard Haver, a former senior official who has worked closely with both men. "Gates is not about to get on a mat with someone and pin him. With Rumsfeld, pinning is the name of the game."

At the Pentagon, senior military officers said that while Rumsfeld is perceived as arrogant and a fierce turf-battler, Gates is viewed as a far less combative and more conciliatory figure. "Gates has a track record of bipartisan support and being respected and accepted by . . . different parties," said a senior Army general, adding, "I think he'll be fine."

Gates could help ease the tensions that arose as Rumsfeld moved to impose greater civilian control on military services and operations, active and retired military officers said.

Military leaders "will find their voice in a way that they were never going to find it with Rumsfeld. My guess is that he'll listen," a retired four-star general said of Gates, whom he knows. Still, while Gates is expected to handle dissent with more finesse, "he won't be snowed or bamboozled" by senior military officers, said a former official who knows Gates well. "Gates will listen, but he will not always take their advice," he said.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, who was Gates's boss as national security adviser in the Carter White House and today is one of the sharpest critics of the Iraq war, described the appointment yesterday as "the best . . . that President Bush has made in the course of his six years in office." Brzezinski described Gates as someone "whose judgment can be trusted and whose common sense is reassuring," and said that "this appointment may be marking the beginning of a major corrective in American policy towards the Middle East."

Former senator Sam Nunn (D-Ga.), whose questioning of Gates in 1987 led to the withdrawal of his nomination to be CIA director, praised his "ability to work closely with Congress on a bipartisan basis" and said he "has a well-deserved reputation on both sides of the aisle for competency and integrity."

Gates is a member of the Iraq Study Group, a congressionally mandated bipartisan commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). The group's review of the situation in Iraq over the past several weeks will give Gates momentum going into his new job, observers said. "Gates is going to have to move pretty fast. He doesn't have a lot of time to study this," said the retired four-star general.

Several associates stressed that Gates is a pragmatist and not an ideologue, and characterized him as being the same type of moderate Republican on foreign policy issues as Baker. A senior intelligence officer who has known Gates for 30 years described him as tough, brilliant and hard-working, but said Gates has sharp elbows for those who get in his way.

Gates has experience with Iraq as well as Afghanistan. He was deputy national security adviser during the 1991 Gulf War and helped oversee U.S.-sponsored operations in Afghanistan under Reagan in the 1980s.

Gates, who holds a PhD in Soviet history from Georgetown University, left government in 1993 for academia. He became president of Texas A&M University in 2002, a post he described yesterday as the most enjoyable of his career.

"I had not anticipated returning to government service," he said at a White House announcement ceremony, flanked by Bush and Rumsfeld. But he said that the United States is engaged in wars that "will shape our world for decades to come," and that with "so many of America's sons and daughters . . . in harm's way, I did not hesitate when the president asked me to return to duty."

Gates appeared to get a cordial reception from members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, which will have to confirm his appointment. "I think he will be a very pleasant change from Secretary Rumsfeld" in his dealings with Congress, said Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a vocal member of the panel.

But Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.), a member of the House intelligence panel, called the Gates nomination "deeply troubling."

Holt, a retired intelligence officer and a nuclear physicist, said that while at the CIA's helm, "Gates developed a reputation for pressuring analysts and managers to shape analytical conclusions to fit administration positions." Holt said Gates's confirmation hearing "should be thorough and probing."

While Gates contrasts sharply with Rumsfeld in style, the two are comparable in intellect and energy, associates said. Only hours after a recent knee surgery, for example, Gates took part in the Texas A&M football weekend tradition known as the "midnight yell," said Michael C. Desch, a professor of intelligence at the university. One of Gates's major initiatives at the university was to muster support for a 25 percent increase in the size of the faculty, which was "huge," Desch said, and won Gates admiration.

A former Eagle Scout, Gates is an avid hiker who enjoys spending time at his vacation house in the Pacific Northwest. He is married and has two children.

Rumsfeld, A Force For Change, Did Not Change With The Times Amid Iraq Tumult (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — From the day he took control at the Pentagon, Donald H. Rumsfeld was determined to reassert civilian control of the defense establishment and create a leaner, more lethal American military.

With President Bush's endorsement, he pursued his goals with a vengeance, emerging as the most powerful secretary of defense since Robert S. McNamara more than three decades earlier.

Like his predecessor, Mr. Rumsfeld was undone by policies that resulted in a quagmire in a distant land. The defense secretary's resistance to deploying a large number of troops in Iraq, his skepticism of nation-building and his reluctance to acknowledge a potent insurgency made an already challenging situation all the more difficult. As the turmoil grew in Iraq, the defense secretary who once described himself as "genetically impatient" and a force for change was slow to adapt.

"The ironic thing is that he may end up being criticized for not being more on top of Iraq," said Eliot A. Cohen, a military historian and professor at the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University. "Blame needs to be shared all around on Iraq, but he bears his share of responsibility by not being willing to make the kinds of corrections early on that were necessary."

Mr. Rumsfeld did not acknowledge missteps on Iraq in his appearance with President Bush on Wednesday, but obliquely accepted that he had become a lightning rod for criticism of the war. Paraphrasing Winston Churchill, he said, "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

Mr. Rumsfeld came to the Pentagon as a consummate insider. Among an array of important government posts, he had been defense secretary under President Ford, developing a reputation as a ruthlessly effective bureaucratic infighter.

After a career as a corporate chief executive, he returned to the Pentagon after George W. Bush was elected president. Mr. Bush had vowed during his campaign to appoint a powerful defense secretary with a mandate to overhaul the American military. Mr. Rumsfeld was to be that man.

At the Pentagon, Mr. Rumsfeld's program was called "transformation," and it acquired the status of an official ideology. Mr. Rumsfeld was enamored of missile defense and space-based systems, issues he had worked on during his years out of office. Like many conservatives, he was wary about the Army leadership, which he considered to be too wedded to heavy forces and too slow to change.

In his trademark blunt style, Mr. Rumsfeld convened a Pentagon "town hall" meeting on Sept. 10, 2001. "The topic today is an adversary that poses a threat, a serious threat, to the security of the United States of America," he pronounced. "It's the Pentagon bureaucracy."

After the terror attacks in Washington and New York the next day, Mr. Rumsfeld focused on the new war on terrorism. The defense secretary was a solid ally of Vice President Dick Cheney, who worked for Mr. Rumsfeld during the Nixon and Ford years. And he soon emerged as a spokesman for the administration's national security policies, presiding over news conferences at which he issued pithy observations about the need to be prepared for the "unknown unknowns."

Within the military establishment, however, the defense secretary quickly became a contentious figure as his penchant for hands-on management and his theories on military transformation were given a field test. Mr. Rumsfeld did not decide how many troops would be deployed for the war in Iraq, but he helped pick the generals who did. He never hesitated to push, prod and ask questions to shape their recommendations.

It was Mr. Rumsfeld who complained that the plan for invading and securing Iraq that had been left behind by Gen. Anthony C. Zinni, Tommy Franks's predecessor at the United States Central Command, called for more troops. As many as 500,000 troops would be sent to secure Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld dismissed it as old thinking, according to retired Lt. Gen. Greg Newbold.

According to General Franks, Mr. Rumsfeld was the impetus behind one of the most contentious decisions of the war: canceling the deployment of the First Cavalry Division, which was to reinforce the initial invasion force. That left the American military with fewer troops as the insurgency was beginning to develop.

It was also Mr. Rumsfeld who insisted that the Pentagon take the lead in overseeing postwar planning and the administration of Iraq in the first critical months of the occupation after the ouster of Saddam Hussein from power. When Baghdad was gripped by looting in April 2003, the defense secretary dismissed the disorder as little more than the pent-up frustrations of an oppressed people: "Stuff happens."

According to L. Paul Bremer III, the American civilian administrator in Iraq, and his aides, Mr. Rumsfeld was consulted on the controversial decision to formally disband the Iraqi Army.

Iraq, of course, is just part of Mr. Rumsfeld's legacy. In terms of his management style, he clearly succeeded in consolidating his authority as defense secretary. More than any of his predecessors, Mr. Rumsfeld influenced the appointment of three- and four-star officers, installing military leaders whom he could count on to carry out his agenda. But senior officers complained that his insistence on loyalty came at a cost: a dearth of senior officers willing to offer independent advice.

In terms of his transformation agenda, Mr. Rumsfeld enjoyed, at best, mixed success. He overhauled the cold-war-era system of military bases around the world, a decision that has led to the reduction in American forces in Europe and Korea. He also insisted on greater cooperation among the military services.

"On the positive side he brought the armed forces to a much higher degree of joint thinking and integration," said Barry M. Blechman, a member of the Defense Policy Board, which advises Mr. Rumsfeld, and the president of DFI International, a consulting firm.

Still, despite Mr. Rumsfeld's avowed intention to challenge orthodox Pentagon thinking, few major weapons programs were canceled and the military's force structure and spending patterns were not radically altered.

"At the end of the day you would have to say that for Rumsfeld, transformation was more promise than reality," said Andrew F. Krepinevich Jr., the executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments. "He made a start, but these things take time, and it is clear now that Iraq has denied him that time."

Rumsfeld Sought A New Role For Pentagon (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

The secretary's strategy led him to dominate national security policy more than any figure since Henry Kissinger.

Donald H. Rumsfeld came to the job of Defense secretary determined not only to remake the U.S. military, but to recast the Pentagon's role in national security.

He arrived with a prescription for what he believed ailed the Pentagon. As he later put it in one of his famous "snowflake" memos — so named by staffers because they arrived in a constant blizzard — the department was "tangled in its anchor chain." Rumsfeld saw the military as paralyzed by old thinking, outdated policies, service rivalries and a love of slow-moving tanks and aircraft carriers.

The Pentagon, State Department, National Security Council and intelligence community have always jockeyed for influence. But in the Bush Cabinet, Rumsfeld — in part through the force of his personality — established himself and his department as the first among equals, coming to dominate national security policy more thoroughly than any figure since Henry Kissinger.

"He was the Olympic athlete of interagency ruthless bureaucrats," said retired Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey. "He was charming, determined and absolutely brutal to those who opposed his ideas."

Rumsfeld's insistence that the Pentagon take the lead left him with responsibility for the course of the war in Iraq. And after a stunning repudiation by voters of the administration's policy on the war, Rumsfeld is leaving at what is arguably a low point in the U.S. effort.

President Bush's new Defense nominee, Robert M. Gates, is likely to be the first member of an entirely new team on Iraq. Senior State Department officials have said in recent days that Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, also is expected to resign. And senior Army officials have said they expect Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, to leave his post by early next year.

Bush said Wednesday that he had come to the conclusion before the election that a new Defense secretary was needed.

"Secretary Rumsfeld and I agreed that sometimes it's necessary to have a fresh perspective," he said.

As a result, the Pentagon chief known for lightning-rod comments about the Iraq conflict — such as his observation in 2004 that "you go to war with the Army you have, not the Army you might want or wish to have" — stepped down Wednesday.

According to two associates, Rumsfeld had wanted to serve as Defense chief as long as he could get things done. With criticism of the president's Iraq policy mounting and the U.S. prospects in the war worsening, he concluded he could no longer be effective.

"He came to accept that the scales had tipped the other way," said an associate who spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid any appearance of violating a confidence.

In brief remarks at the White House, Rumsfeld alluded to the rising criticism of the war of which he was a prime architect. Quoting Winston Churchill, he said, "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

After the 2001 invasion of Afghanistan, led primarily by special operations forces and CIA paramilitary fighters, Rumsfeld emerged with a reputation as a decisive leader. The seemingly successful invasion of Iraq in 2003 further burnished that image.

But public perception of Rumsfeld began to change as the war in Iraq dragged on and American casualties mounted. Critics charged that he had ignored or downplayed the insurgency until it was too late and Iraq had descended into sectarian conflict.

His six years under Bush were Rumsfeld's second tour in the job. He was Pentagon chief for a little over a year in the Ford administration. If he remains in office until Dec. 29, he will best the record of Robert S. McNamara, who oversaw the Vietnam War and served for more than seven years.

Rumsfeld exerted huge influence in the Pentagon because he mastered both the sweeping revolutionary ideas that so enamored Bush as well as the sometimes arcane bureaucratic fine points on which Washington runs.

"He had such an influence on the department, by the sheer force of his personality.... His rule and dictates drilled way down into the bureaucracy in the Pentagon," said James J. Townsend Jr., a civilian Pentagon official who helped direct North Atlantic Treaty Organization policy before retiring last month.

Though Townsend acknowledged that Rumsfeld is likely to be judged first by the Iraq war, he added that it is important to acknowledge that the secretary changed how the Defense Department does business.

"He really did go in with a broom and shake out a lot of cobwebs and force people to think differently," said Townsend, now the international security program director at the Atlantic Council, a Washington organization that supports NATO projects.

It is hard to imagine a more controversial leader within the department. Few in the Pentagon were ambivalent Wednesday about Rumsfeld's leadership.

His many supporters credit him with making tough decisions, speeding up the transformation of the military, cutting outdated weapons systems, advancing the missile defense system, creating a new focus on domestic security, repositioning forces out of Germany and South Korea, and reorganizing the Army to make it more adaptable.

But critics shook their heads in dismay as he considered cutting the Army by two divisions early in his tenure. They also charge that he allowed strong-willed deputies to drop the military's adherence to the baseline standards of the Geneva Convention and created a military prison at Guantanamo Bay beyond the reach of American courts.

The critics said he equated long experience with antiquated thinking, and ran roughshod over people who offered alternate ideas. To these critics, the difficulties of the Iraq war are the natural result of Rumsfeld's tendency to ignore the warnings of others.

Lawrence DiRita, a former advisor to Rumsfeld, disputed the criticism and argued that his former boss accelerated the military's move toward a more nimble and faster-moving force.

"Adversaries around the world understand how much more capable we are today," DiRita said. "There has been a paradigm shift at the Department of Defense toward speed, agility and precision."

DiRita said Rumsfeld is not to blame for the problems in Iraq.

"I think it would be counter-factual for people to conclude that but for Don Rumsfeld, things in Iraq would be very different," he said.

But many believe that the setbacks in the war have much to do with Rumsfeld's insistence on a small invasion force and his early dismissal of the idea that the U.S. military has a duty to help rebuild nations.

McCaffrey, a Rumsfeld critic, said the outgoing secretary was blinded by his view that the military was antiquated and by his decision not to listen to military experts.

"This very determined man managed, through arrogance and misjudgment, to put the country's armed forces in a strategically perilous position," McCaffrey said. "He thought we were a colossal group of lower-class minds rooted in World War II, and he was going to help us to understand the nature of warfare."

Rumsfeld's supporters argue that his emphasis on precision strikes and the power of expeditionary forces will have the most lasting impact.

But other officers believe Rumsfeld's transformation of the military will be overshadowed by the experience in Iraq, a war that stands to profoundly reshape America's armed forces in other ways.

Rumsfeld, A Newsmaker Who's Certainly Hard To Follow (WP)

By Linton Weeks

Is he stepping down? You bet. Does he admit defeat? Not by a long shot. Is the country going to miss the way he acted smarter than everyone else and often preempted media questions by interrogating himself as a rhetorical device? Sort of -- the way you might miss your father's spankings.

Goodness gracious! Donald Rumsfeld, who resigned yesterday, not only has been secretary of defense for six years, he's been secretary of offense. During his tenure, briefings by the head of the armed forces became tours de force. He would clap his hands, lick his lips, narrow his eyes into a squinty gaze and extemporize, patronize, chastise, sermonize and crack wise all at the same time.

He had his admirers. "Reporters often told me that he raised the levels of their performances," says former Pentagon spokeswoman Torie Clarke. "He forced them to be more precise in the way they asked questions." She says he obviously respected the role of the media in society.

"He tries very hard not to talk before he's thought through his answer," she says. "He thinks before he speaks."

And he had his detractors. Calvin Trillin, a writer for the New Yorker and author of "A Heckuva Job: More of the Bush Administration in Rhyme," says he has been amazed at Rumsfeld's ability to be at once brashly know-it-all and disarmingly homespun. "It was a wonderful mixture of arrogance and 'Aunt Harriet' language" like goodness gracious, Trillin says. "I don't think anybody can match that."

In the introduction to his book, Trillin writes that Rumsfeld conducted his press briefings "as if trying patiently to explain the obvious to a class of slow third-graders. (Might you prefer to be briefed by someone less arrogant and condescending? Yes. Do we always get what we want? Of course not.)"

Late-night comedians will miss him. He was an easy mark.

And for a while, back in the early days of the fighting in Afghanistan, he was considered a rock star, a sex symbol to some. But the country's fascination with him flagged as more and more people began to question the war in Iraq.

Rumsfeld always had an answer. He will be remembered as a master at holding up a word or a phrase as if it were Silly Putty, then twisting it, bouncing it, stretching it to his own liking. For instance, the time he decided that people should eschew the word "insurgents" and call them "enemies of the legitimate Iraqi government" instead.

Or the time he spoke of the precariousness of the contemporary world. "Reports that say that something hasn't happened are always interesting to me," Rumsfeld said, "because as we know, there are known knowns; there are things we know we know. We also know there are known unknowns; that is to say we know there are some things we do not know. But there are also unknown unknowns -- the ones we don't know we don't know."

He said, "The absence of evidence is not evidence of absence."

If you missed his briefings, you can still find some fragments on the Internet. God bless YouTube. It's a rip-roaring repository of Rummified irascibility.

In one video snippet he uses a high-in-the-throat, marmish tone to tell a Pentagon reporter that he is "wrong!" The reporter tries to speak and Rumsfeld wags his finger. "Just a minute, just a minute!"

For six years, Rumsfeld was the civilian rooster in the military henhouse -- the alpha male. Yesterday, he was the omega male, giving his last briefing as the unequivocal secretary of defense. Bush spoke first. Then Robert Gates, the newly nominated secretary of defense. Then Rumsfeld. He had the last word.

He stood at a funereal black lectern in the Oval Office and explained things one last time. He clapped his hands to get things started. He licked his lips. He narrowed his eyes into a squinty gaze and recalled the words of Winston Churchill, who said, "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

And Rumsfeld reminded the nation one more time about "this little understood, unfamiliar war, the first war of the 21st century -- it is not well known, it was not well understood."

Australia Hails Rumsfeld, Pledges To Stay In Iraq (AFP)

AFP, November 9, 2006

Australia hailed outgoing US Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld as a "champion of freedom" and pledged that Canberra would keep its troops in Iraq.

Defence Minister Brendan Nelson made the commitment shortly after US President George W. Bush sacrificed Rumsfeld when mid-term elections revealed the depth of voter anger over the war in Iraq.

"Mr Rumsfeld has a long and distinguished record of service to his country," Nelson said in a statement.

"He has been a true champion of freedom. I greatly appreciated working with him. Equally, I look forward to working with his successor.

"The government remains committed to supporting the people of Iraq and their democratically elected government against the insurgents and terrorists working to destroy that democracy.

"We will continue to work with our allies and the Iraqi Security Forces until Iraq can handle its own security."

Prime Minister John Howard, a close ally of Washington, has repeatedly rejected opposition calls for Australian troops to be withdrawn from Iraq, saying the country would not "cut and run".

Howard deployed Australian troops as part of the US-led invasion of Iraq. Some 1,400 troops are now involved in Iraqi operations.

Rumsfeld's Departure (NYT)

Whatever this election accomplished -- and it remains to be seen if it ended the rancor and distrust that define current American politics -- voters made it crystal clear that they want a change in direction in Iraq. Democratic and Republican leaders alike agreed that it had to begin with replacing Donald Rumsfeld as Secretary of Defense.

President Bush showed that he had heard the second half of that message and finally rid himself of the man whose bad judgments and inept leadership had done so much to create the mess in Iraq. But it still was not clear that he has yet heard the first, and more important part of the message. At his press conference, Mr. Bush was still talking about victory in precisely the same terms he had used before the election, and offered no clear sense that he was prepared to open his mind to a real change in strategy.

The challenge for Mr. Rumsfeld's chosen successor, Robert Gates, who was a deputy national security adviser to Mr. Bush's father and then served as Director of Central Intelligence, will be to make Mr. Bush realize how desperate the situation is in Iraq and that the conduct of the war should be dictated by reality and not ideology.

It's possible that no one could have turned the invasion of Iraq into a success, given the fissures in Iraqi society that the fall of Saddam Hussein exposed. But we will never know, since the shortage of American troops and the lack of postwar planning made disaster inevitable. Mr. Rumsfeld deserved to go simply because he failed at his job. Denying that reality is presumably why the president was so bent on keeping him until the Republicans' huge losses at the polls on Tuesday forced his hand.

Before he presided over the Iraq invasion, Mr. Rumsfeld promised that as secretary of defense he was going to transform America's military so it was prepared to fight the conflicts of the 21st century. Mr. Bush has cited the progress being made on that front as one of the reasons he wants Mr. Rumsfeld to stay. But -- in a familiar pattern for this administration -- the changes have been more rhetorical than real.

Truly transforming the military would have meant trading in expensive cold war weaponry, like attack submarines and stealth fighters, for pilotless drones, swifter ships and lighter, more mobile ground forces. Mr. Rumsfeld never had the interest -- or the political will -- to take on that fight. Instead, he bought peace with Congress and the military brass by holding down the size of ground forces in order to continue paying the ballooning cost of unnecessary weaponry. He created a smaller, more mobile force that was too small to successfully pacify Iraq.

There was absolutely nothing more left for Mr. Rumsfeld to do as secretary of defense except continue to defend failed policies and tinker with unworkable strategies. Most of the men and women who will be part of the new Congress came to that conclusion, whatever their party affiliation. Mr. Bush was claiming yesterday to be open to changes, talking repeatedly of a report from a bipartisan commission on Iraq that is due out soon. But we're still waiting for a sign that Mr. Bush has grasped the urgency of the unfolding disaster in Iraq as anything beyond a political problem. Mr. Rumsfeld's departure is merely the first step. It has to be followed by a major change in policy if American troops can be brought home without leaving a disaster behind.

A Bush Retreat? (WSJ)

President Bush made a crucial point at his press conference yesterday when he warned America's "enemies" not to read the vicissitudes of our democracy as "a lack of will." Too bad he then undermined that message by accepting the "resignation" of Donald Rumsfeld a day after his party's election defeat -- and only a week after saying he wanted his defense secretary to serve out his term.

We realize Mr. Rumsfeld had become a political lightening rod, and that after six years Mr. Bush may want someone else to engage on defense policy with Democrats who have demanded the Pentagon chief's head. But the timing of the secretary's dispatch, and Mr. Bush's flustered explanation about the cause and timing, sent a message of retreat, rather than resolve. His nomination of Robert Gates also doesn't reassure us about Mr. Bush's policy direction.

When the history of this era is written, Mr. Rumsfeld is likely to fare much better than his many critics assert. The secretary has been a convenient political foil -- for Democrats, for generals who didn't like the way he exercised civilian control at the Pentagon, and especially for erstwhile war supporters who wanted to blame the Iraqi insurgency on some individual rather than on the inevitable complications and setbacks of any war.

Everyone now takes for granted the ease with which U.S. forces ousted the Taliban in Afghanistan, so it's worth recalling the many predictions at the time of Soviet-style "quagmire." There was also the speed with which Saddam Hussein's regime was toppled, in part because Mr. Rumsfeld's insistence of a light-and-fast strategy prevented what might have been a protracted siege of Baghdad. The military historian John Keegan has called this campaign "the farthest advance at speed over distance ever recorded" in a military operation, and at the time it saved thousands of lives.

Mr. Rumsfeld was also a strong leader inside the Pentagon, insisting that the Armed Services learn to operate jointly, and taking on service chiefs over outmoded ideas and weapons systems. For years American editorialists screamed about Pentagon pork, only to criticize Mr. Rumsfeld for alienating some Army generals when he actually did something about it.

The defense secretary can be faulted for underestimating the Iraq insurgency, but he has plenty of company, especially the CIA. The "small footprint" strategy for U.S. forces was as much General John Abizaid's as Mr. Rumsfeld's. And the worst mistake in Iraq -- the needlessly slow development of Iraq's political and security institutions -- was much more the fault of L. Paul Bremer, Condoleezza Rice and CIA and State Department officials including current Deputy National Security Adviser Meghan O'Sullivan.

They refused to support an Iraqi government of "exiles" early enough, only to end up with a government made up largely of those same exiles after elections were finally held. For reasons we will someday learn, Mr. Bush poorly managed the disputes on his national security team over strategy toward post-invasion Iraq. In any case, the President may soon miss having Mr. Rumsfeld as his chief flak-catcher on Iraq; perhaps Ms. Rice will now volunteer for that duty.

Which brings us back to Mr. Gates, whose nomination makes us wonder if Mr. Bush is signaling a change in policy, or worse, a new resignation toward Iraq. Mr. Gates is a capable public servant with broad security experience. But much of that experience is with the CIA, which has misjudged the nature of the enemy throughout this conflict. Mr. Gates is also on the Baker-Hamilton study group that Congress established to examine policy options for Iraq, and we hope his nomination doesn't mean Mr. Bush has already signed onto its soon-to-be-released recommendations. One of those proposals is reportedly a new engagement with Iran and Syria, which would make a hash of the President's "freedom agenda."

Most troubling regarding Iraq, Mr. Gates was deputy national security adviser under Brent Scowcroft in 1991, when President Bush's father abandoned the Shiite uprising that followed the first Gulf War. One reason the Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki has had such a hard time dismantling Shiite militias is because Shiites fear that it's only a matter of time before the U.S. abandons them again and they will have to confront the Sunni Baathist insurgency on their own. If President Bush wants to reassure Shiites on this score and about Mr. Gates, he should announce that the recent efforts to appease the Sunni terrorist political fronts in Iraq have failed.

We presume Mr. Gates will be grilled about these and other issues during his confirmation hearings. He should be.

Exit Strategy, Post-Rumsfeld (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

BETTER LATE THAN never. More than two years after Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld offered to resign in the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, President Bush finally agreed to let Rumsfeld go, to make room for a "fresh perspective." It's an easy gesture at this point — the political equivalent of bringing down the piñata once it's been battered beyond recognition.

The "fresh perspective" will be provided by a close confidant of Bush's father, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates. Gates is everything Rumsfeld isn't: an understated, consensus-seeking Washington operator.

When Bush took office, his diplomatic and national security team of Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice and Rumsfeld exuded a sense of seasoned competence. Yet they presided over a faith-based policymaking that has proved disastrous to the national interest.

Rumsfeld was right to embrace the need for a technology-driven military revolution. But he confused the need to modernize weapons systems and create a more nimble military with a license to wage war on the cheap, famously dismissing advice that it would take several hundred thousand troops to secure Iraq. The occupation was ill-planned because of a reliance on the assumptions of overzealous neocon thinkers.

Now, after the gains made by Democrats in an election rightly viewed as a referendum on Iraq, Bush needs to do more than accept Rumsfeld's resignation. Characteristically, Bush sent a mixed message at Wednesday's news conference. He emphasized the "fresh perspective" that Gates would bring to the job, but he continued to define "victory" in utopian terms: a democratic Iraq "that can defend, govern and sustain itself, and [be] an ally in the war on terror."

Bush also suggested that he might find "common ground" with victorious congressional Democrats who had demanded a new approach to Iraq. The circle may be squared by the elder Bush's chief consigliere, James A. Baker III, who is presiding over the so-called Iraq Study Group — which not coincidentally counts one Robert Gates among its members.

Even before the election, administration officials and some Democrats were predicting that the Baker panel would provide a rationale for the president to scale down his ambitions for Iraq and expedite the implementation of his promise that "as the Iraqis stand up, we will stand down" — even if the posture of Iraqi forces (or of Iraqi democracy) leaves something to be desired.

It still would be preferable if Washington could find a way to induce Iraqi factions to pull back from civil strife and establish a stable, democratic and multi-religious state. But that may be impossible. If Bush feels he must camouflage lowered expectations in the language of "victory," his newfound collaborators in the Democratic Party — and the voters who selected them — are unlikely to object.

Rumsfeld's Out But Way Too Late (BOSH)

Boston Herald, November 9, 2006

Well, better late than never, as they say.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld should have been out the door two years ago, but President Bush has been loyal to a fault. Tuesday he and his party paid an enormous price for that with the voters. But they spoke and Bush - finally - listened.

The departure of Rumsfeld alone won't immediately reverse course in Iraq. But it is a long overdue acknowledgment that that policy has endangered and betrayed the very troops now assigned to pacify that fractured nation.

The appointment of Robert Gates, a former director of the CIA and current president of Texas A&M University, bodes well for a national security team that can, as the president indicated, bring a fresh perspective to a war the American people have clearly grown weary of.

Gates as a member of the Iraq Study Group, which is scheduled to issue its report to the nation at the end of this month, is already well versed in what will be his main mission. He will need no on-the-job training. And he enters the Pentagon with something Rumsfeld lost long, long ago - the confidence of the military's own leaders who know him and are more likely to trust his judgment.

But lest this internal dispute over strategy be mistaken, Bush said yesterday, "To our enemies, do not be joyful. Do not confuse the workings of our democracy with a lack of will. Our nation is committed to bringing you to justice. Liberty and democracy are the source of America's strength . . . "

And so they have been this week, even as voters made known their obvious displeasure with this administration and with the conduct of the war in Iraq. Now the man who led that effort is gone. Good riddance.

Right Warrior, Wrong War (AR)

The Arizona Republic, November 9, 2006

Generals are forever fighting the last war. If ever there was a truism embedded in military critics, this is it.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, who resigned on Wednesday, believed it with every ounce of iron in his hardened soul. From the start of his second shift as civilian director of America's military on Jan. 20, 2001, Rumsfeld sought to remake the nation's fighting forces lighter, faster, more integrated and more responsive.

The lightning invasion of Saddam Hussein's Iraq in early 2003 helped vindicate Rumsfeld's judgment that forces smaller and faster than the massive army arrayed against Saddam in 1991 in Kuwait could do the job.

Unfortunately, from that point forward Rumsfeld, too, was fighting the last war. Neither Rumsfeld nor President Bush seemed to see that the invasion was one war, the struggle against the bloody insurgency quite another.

The fact that shortly after the invasion the Defense secretary contemplated reducing the U.S. military presence in Iraq to less than half the size of the 160,000-member invasion force says all about his inability to distinguish one operation from the next. He was fighting the insurgency with the strike force. He was fighting the last war.

Much has been made of Rumsfeld's steely resistance to criticism of the administration's pacification plans in Iraq - plans that thus far have failed to quell insurgent violence there.

Earlier this year, eight retired generals called for his resignation, and just a day before the election, the nation's independent military newspapers, published by Gannett, jointly called for the same.

Democrats, until Tuesday the minority party in Congress, railed against his lack of an Iraq plan. But they were hardly alone. Among the secretary's most adamant critics was Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of the staunchest defenders of the war to depose Saddam. It didn't seem to make a dent.

Firmness in wartime is a virtue, certainly. As is consistency of leadership. And in his six years as Defense secretary - a record tenure, by the way - Rumsfeld demonstrated both. A war against a merciless foe needed to be won, and for all his hardheaded faults, Rumsfeld clearly had the determination to see it through.

Following the scandalous revelations of prisoner abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad, many outraged supporters of ousting Saddam, including this newspaper, called for Rumsfeld to step down. To take responsibility for the reckless betrayals of decency perpetrated on his watch.

Later, as Iraqis by the millions appeared to be moving forward - establishing a federal constitution, electing a parliament - the need for resolution, for consistency, re-emerged. But the primary task of the American force in Iraq, under Rumsfeld, has been to establish and maintain the peace necessary for that nascent democracy to assert itself. And that has not come to pass.

With Rumsfeld's resignation, Bush has extended an enticing olive branch to incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who as recently as Wednesday called for Rumsfeld to leave.

Presumably, designated successor Robert M. Gates, a former CIA director, will offer a more detailed plan for completing the job in Iraq. Presumably, too, the now-empowered Democrats will offer their own, more detailed plan for the sort of changes in Iraq that they envision.

Their often-elusive demand for "change of direction" in Iraq, after all, is a battle cry of the last political war . . . the one fought before their victories on Tuesday. The American people deserve a clearer plan from their new congressional leaders as well.

A Come-to-Daddy Moment (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

Poppy Bush and James Baker gave Sonny the presidency to play with and he broke it. So now they're taking it back.

They are dragging W. away from those reckless older guys who have been such a bad influence and getting him some new minders who are a lot more practical.

In a scene that might be called "Murder on the Oval Express," Rummy turned up dead with so many knives in him that it's impossible to say who actually finished off the man billed as Washington's most skilled infighter. (Poppy? Scowcroft? Baker? Laura? Condi? The Silver Fox? Retired generals? Serving generals? Future generals? Troops returning to Iraq for the umpteenth time without a decent strategy? Democrats? Republicans? Joe Lieberman?)

The defense chief got hung out to dry before Saddam got hung. The president and Karl Rove, underestimating the public's hunger for change or overestimating the loyalty of a fed-up base, did not ice Rummy in time to save the Senate from teetering Democratic. But once Sonny managed to heedlessly dynamite the Republican majority — as well as the Middle East, the Atlantic alliance and the U.S. Army — then Bush Inc., the family firm that snatched the presidency for W. in 2000, had to step in. Two trusted members of the Bush 41 war council, Mr. Baker and Robert Gates, have been dispatched to discipline the delinquent juvenile and extricate him from the mother of all messes.

Mr. Gates, already on Mr. Baker's "How Do We Get Sonny Out of Deep Doo Doo in Iraq?" study group, left his job protecting 41's papers at Texas A&M to return to Washington and pry the fingers of Poppy's old nemesis, Rummy, off the Pentagon.

"They had to bring in someone from the old gang," said someone from the old gang. "That has to make Junior uneasy. With Bob, the door is opened again to 41 and Baker and Brent."

W. had no choice but to make an Oedipal U-turn. He couldn't let Nancy Pelosi subpoena the cranky Rummy for hearings on Iraq. "He's not exactly Mr. Charming or Mr. Truthful, and he'd be on TV saying something stupid," said a Bush 41 official. "Bob can just go up to the Hill and say: 'I don't know. I wasn't there when that happened.' "

Bob Gates, his friends say, had been worried about the belligerent, arrogant, ideological style of Rummy & Cheney from the start. He fretted at the way W.'s so-called foreign policy "dream team" — including his old staffer and fellow Soviet expert Condi — made it up as they went along, even though that had been their complaint about the Clinton foreign policy team. A realpolitik advocate like his mentor, General Scowcroft, he was critical of a linear, moralizing style that disdained nuance, demoted diplomacy and inflated villains. In 2004, he publicly questioned the administration's approach to Iran.

While Vice went off to a corner to lick his wounds, W. was forced to do his best imitation of his dad yesterday, talking about "bipartisan outreach," "people have spoken," blah-blah-blah — after he'd been out on the trail saying that electing Democrats would mean that "the terrorists win and America loses."

W. has stopped talking about democracy as a standard of success in Iraq; yesterday, he said that Iraq had to "govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

He was asked if his surprise at the election results showed he was out of touch with Americans. "I thought when it was all said and done," he replied, "the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security."

So it was just that the American people were too dumb to understand? W. also managed to bash Vietnam vets, saying that this war isn't similar because there's a volunteer army, so "the troops understand the consequences of Iraq in the global war on terror." Is that why W. stayed out of Vietnam? Because he understood it?

An ashen Rummy was also condescending during his uncomfortable tableau with W. and Bob Gates in the Oval Office, implying that he was dumped because Americans just didn't "comprehend" what was going on in Iraq. Actually, Rummy, we get it. You don't get it.

"Baker's no fool," a Bush 41 official said. "He wasn't going to go out there with a plan for Iraq and have Rummy shoot it down. He wanted a receptive audience. Everyone had to be on the same page before the plan is unveiled."

They don't call him the Velvet Hammer for nothing. R.I.P., Rummy.

The Defense Secretary We Had (WP)

By David Ignatius

Senior military officers referred to it as "the 7,000-mile screwdriver." That was their way of describing Donald Rumsfeld's penchant for micromanaging aspects of the Iraq war that interested him. And it's one reason the military has to be happy that Rumsfeld is leaving -- even happier, maybe, than Democrats, who have claimed an early scalp for their election victory.

To the end, even when Rumsfeld must have known that his time in the job was short, he wouldn't give up that option to meddle with his field commanders. When Marine Gen. James Jones, the retiring NATO commander, went to see Rumsfeld a few weeks ago to talk about becoming commander of Centcom, he asked whether the defense secretary intended to continue his direct line of communication with the theater commander, Gen. George Casey, sometimes bypassing Centcom. When Rumsfeld wouldn't rule out such contacts, Jones began to doubt the Centcom job would work. And when Rumsfeld said he didn't foresee significant changes in Iraq strategy, Jones withdrew his name from consideration.

Changes in Iraq are coming, and Rumsfeld's departure is, to paraphrase the prayer book, one outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual process. Another is the choice as his successor of Robert Gates, a very different sort of figure from Don Rumsfeld in a number of ways.

The Bush administration in recent weeks has -- very much in secret -- begun to ask itself the tough questions: Is the Iraq strategy working? Can we achieve our goals with the tools we have? If not, how do we adjust them so that they fit? One top-level policymaker tried to explain the mood a few days ago by quoting the Rolling Stones: "You can't always get what you want."

Rumsfeld long ago became the symbol for a war he began to doubt at least three years ago when he wrote his famous memo predicting that Iraq would be a "long, hard slog." That illustrated the best of Rumsfeld's intellectual style: He asked whether U.S. tactics were creating new terrorists faster than we were killing the existing ones and mused: "Are the changes we have and are making too modest and incremental? My impression is that we have not yet made truly bold moves, although we have made many sensible, logical moves in the right direction, but are they enough?"

Rumsfeld showed a willingness to question received wisdom, a penchant for challenging the pet projects of the military, such as the Army's plan for a monster artillery piece, inaptly named the Crusader, which would be difficult to move quickly to any modern battlefield. Rumsfeld was convinced that the Army needed to became more mobile, agile and expeditionary. Some of his ideas about transformation were accepted, but deep down, the Army's senior generals were convinced that his policies would break their branch of the service. The biggest smiles at the Pentagon yesterday were probably in the corridors inhabited by Army officers.

Oddly enough, it was the generals who helped keep Rumsfeld in his job. The White House had decided in the spring that it was time to make a change at the Pentagon, and officials were steeling themselves to break the news to Rumsfeld when the "generals' revolt" erupted on newspaper op-ed pages, with former officers lining up to denounce their ex-boss. The White House decided it couldn't appear to bow to pressure and retreated.

Rumsfeld's gift was his brilliance and intellectual toughness. He kept his head up even as the war in Iraq went from bad to awful. In that, he was a harder man even than one of his predecessors, Robert McNamara, who in his final year running the Vietnam War began to crack privately under the pressure. Rumsfeld embodied an old injunction: Never let them see you sweat.

But the downside with Rumsfeld was so great that few people are likely to remember the upside. He came to symbolize not simply the failure of the Iraq war but also the arrogance and lack of accountability. He had a knack for dropping phrases that came to symbolize what was wrong: "You go to war with the Army you have" and "Back off."

Robert Gates will bring to the job the attentive style of a listener. He rose at the CIA in the 1980s by making himself indispensable to his boss, William Casey. He was the brightest Soviet analyst in the shop, so Casey soon appointed him deputy director overseeing his fellow analysts. I once waded through Gates's graduate dissertation for his doctorate in Soviet studies at Georgetown. It was a work of solid, earnest scholarship -- good, but not flashy. Rumsfeld might have described it as a long, hard slog. But it illustrates Gates's best qualities: his intellectual seriousness, his professionalism, his lack of "side," as the British say of good civil servants.

Gates represents the return of Bush 41 people and ideas to the Bush 43 administration. The elder Bush rescued Gates after he was rejected as CIA director in 1987 because of his role in the Iran-contra scandal, bringing him to the National Security Council staff and then appointing him CIA director in 1991. Gates is not a turfy person -- he works well with others -- a quality that Rumsfeld often lacked.

The new secretary will bring something else to the table, and it may be a crucial factor in the months ahead. He came back into the Bush administration's spotlight because of his work as a member of the Iraq Study Group, headed by Bush 41's secretary of state, James A. Baker III, and former representative Lee Hamilton. Gates embodies the group's effort to find a bipartisan policy for Iraq. In that sense, he will go to the Pentagon with an invisible mission statement that can be summed up in two words: "exit strategy." He won't want to leave Iraq quickly or dangerously, but unlike Rumsfeld, he won't fight the problem.

Election Results May Lead To Easing U.S. Alienation Abroad (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, November 9, 2006

LONDON — From Tokyo to Baghdad, Istanbul to Nairobi, Toronto to the British capital, many people said they hoped the Democratic wins in Tuesday's U.S. elections would pressure President Bush to alter course in Iraq and abandon what some called an arrogant foreign policy.

Some typical reactions:

•"I want the Bush government to be crushed. And I want the Democrats to … get rid of the (Iraq) war," said Fumiko Watanabe, 35, who works for an information technology firm in Tokyo.

•"We're going to see some change in the Bush administration's global policies now," said Samuel Odhiambo, 29, a Nairobi banker.

These hopes may have been addressed by Bush's acknowledgment Wednesday that the U.S. electorate wanted change and his announcement that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was stepping down.

"Finally, something is happening," said Peter Paczius, 27, a Hungarian who works as a bartender in London.

However, the American envoy to Iraq said Wednesday that the election results would not necessarily mean a dramatic shift in U.S. policy. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad reminded reporters in Baghdad, “The president is the architect of U.S. foreign policy. He is the commander in chief of our armed forces.”

While Rumsfeld's resignation may not change U.S. policy, some American expatriates said the election results might dispel a belief abroad that Bush administration policies are widely endorsed at home. And, they said, it could ease the anti-Americanism on the rise since the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

“This tells the world that Americans aren't happy about President Bush and many of his policies,” said Allyson Stewart-Allen, an American in London who advises U.S. and European businesses on how to avoid culture clashes. “This absolutely will ease anti-American views.”

A Pew Research Center survey of global attitudes in June found that the USA's image slipped again in 2005 after a slight uptick in 2004, when the United States helped tsunami victims in Asia.

The survey of attitudes in 15 nations from Europe to Asia found support for the war on terror also had declined, even among close allies such as Japan, which had the highest opinion of America at 63%.

Iraq isn't the only reason for Bush's unpopularity and the low opinions of U.S. policy overseas. Yet for many, especially those who are close to it, the war provided a touchstone for judging U.S. actions.

“The Democrats are better than Bush's people,” said Zeki Nayif, a Sunni Muslim in Baghdad. “We want security and peace.”

In Istanbul, civil engineer Aysen Bora, 27, said, “Bush made our country unsafe, and many Turks died in Iraq. So it's good that the American people have finally said that they've had enough of those policies.”

On the flip side: “George Bush saved our people and created a space for us to live and breathe without Saddam Hussein policing us,” said Can Ozturk, 47, of Istanbul, a Kurdish taxi driver who has relatives in Mosul in northern Iraq.

U.S. foreign policy, even with its closest neighbors, may not affect ordinary people's lives, said Jason Cameron, a Toronto restaurant owner. “Day-to-day, (U.S. politics) don't really affect us as much as we believe it does,” he said.

Other Bush administration policies have contributed to alienation abroad: Keeping the Guantanamo Bay prison camp open, rejecting the Kyoto Protocol to reduce greenhouse gases and support for Israel.

However, Bush cannot be held entirely responsible for all anti-American sentiment abroad, said Stewart-Allen in London. She said Americans don't help their cause if they come across as “arrogant, unilateral and insular.”

Envoy: U.S. Vote Won't Alter Iraq Policy (AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

AP, November 8, 2006

The American ambassador told Iraqis on Wednesday the sharp political realignment in Congress would not provoke upheaval in U.S. policy, but many in the battered capital had hoped otherwise on a day when at least 66 more people were killed in vicious sectarian attacks.

As the U.S. House of Representatives returned to Democratic control and the Senate hung in the balance, Iraqis noted the election outcome — seen by many as a referendum on the Bush administration's Iraq policy — but seemed unable to find much hope in the results.

"I expect a major change in (U.S.) military commands in Iraq. We have to wait and see the strategy of the new secretary and how we will deal with him. We hope he will be more effective and more serious in achieving security in Iraq," he added.

Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad acknowledged "the effort to help Iraq succeed was a major issue" in the election during brief remarks to a group of Iraqi journalists at an embassy reception.

But he reminded the journalists that U.S. policy in Iraq and elsewhere had not been wrenched from the administration's hands by the major shift on Capitol Hill:

"The president is the architect of U.S. foreign policy. He is the commander in chief of our armed forces. He understands what is at stake in Iraq. He sees success as an imperative for America's national interest. He is committed to working with both Houses of the American Congress to get support needed for the mission in Iraq to succeed."

Later, after President Bush announced the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a Shiite lawmaker said he expected a major change in policy.

Hassan al-Sunnaid, a member of the Security and Defense Committee in parliament, said "the Bush administration including Rumsfeld was able to topple Saddam Hussein's regime but it did not succeed in administering Iraq."

"Defense officials, on top of them Rumsfeld, failed and so did the American ambassador. Changing Rumsfeld should have happened a year ago because their work in Iraq did not achieve any results," said al-Sunnaid, a member of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa party.

A Shiite woman, who identified herself as Um Assad, mother of Assad, probably spoke for most Iraqis when questioned about the election as she shopped near the National Museum. Security was uppermost in nearly everyone's mind.

"We hope that they (the Democrats) will be kind to our people and understand our problems," she said.

"The Democrats are better than Bush's people. We want security and peace to prevail," he said, then walked off.

Ala Abid Ali, a Shiite among the group, was of the same mind: "As far as I'm concerned I hope that the Democrats will work for providing security for the Iraqi people, who are suffering greatly."

Iraqi politicians opposed to the continued U.S. presence in the country were delighted with the outcome.

"The vote shows the Iraqi and American people are of one mind about withdrawing U.S. troops," said Falah Hassan Shanshal, who leads the parliamentary bloc of radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

"We hope the Democrats don't forget their campaign promises. If they don't, we will deal with them in a brotherly way once the last American soldier pulls out from Iraq," he said.

Even moderate Kurdish lawmaker Mohamoud Othman saw the shift to Democrats as a result of the Bush administration's "bad policy of spending too many lives in Iraq and too many billions of Americans' tax money."

"Today he (Bush) was taught a lesson," said Othman, whose fellow Kurds are deeply indebted to the U.S. for allowing the ethnic group to establish a virtually autonomous region in the north of Iraq.

In the final days before the election, Bush dispatched two top officials to Iraq in a bid to pressure al-Maliki to quickly disband Shiite militia groups and death squads that have killed thousands of Sunni Muslims.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte was rebuffed by al-Maliki, however, when he demanded the Iraqi leader disband militias and wipe out death squads this year.

A top aide to al-Maliki aide, who refused to allow use of his name because of the sensitive nature of the information, told The Associated Press the prime minister flatly refused and said the task could not be taken up until next year.

Al-Maliki's refusal to act against the militias has caused deepening anger among Sunni politicians who took enormous risks in joining the political process.

Sunni lawmaker Salim Abdullah said the Iraqi Accordance Front bloc had sent messages to other political groups warning that if there is no balance and the militias are not dissolved "we will withdraw from the government."

"We are under political pressure, and if these demands are not met we will abandon politics," Abdullah said. "And this will leave us with only one alternative, which is carrying arms, and then it will be civil war. And we are against the civil war."

Envoy Seeks To Reassure Wary Iraqis (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 8 -- The U.S. ambassador in Baghdad sought to reassure Iraqis on Wednesday that major Democratic gains in Tuesday's elections did not herald an immediate or dramatic change in U.S. policy, saying President Bush "is the architect of U.S. foreign policy" and committed to success here.

In a speech to Iraqi journalists and a few government officials, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad explained that there would be a change in the balance of power in the U.S. Congress but that "Americans understand that Iraq is important" and "have made great sacrifices" for the country and its people.

While continued violence "sometimes causes some, understandably, to wonder whether Iraqis can succeed," he said, "it is clear that Americans want Iraq to succeed" and would continue supporting efforts to bring peace and security to the country. Khalilzad said Bush "is committed to working with both houses of the American Congress to get support needed for the mission in Iraq to succeed."

But many Iraqis expressed concern that a political sea change in Washington could leave them and their country in even worse shape than it is today, while others said they hoped the Democrats would be more forceful in demanding that Iraq's government curb militias and improve security.

"We are concerned that there might be a quick withdrawal from Iraq, which would seriously affect the security situation," said Kashim Mohammed, director of the Fallujah Development Center in the city of Fallujah, a Sunni Arab stronghold 35 miles west of Baghdad. "In reality, the new situation in America is a matter of concern and interest for Iraqis more than it is for Americans themselves."

"I'm optimistic. I think the Democrats will not accept the chaos in Iraq," said Saad Obeidi, 38, a Sunni who owns a fashion shop in the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada.

But some Iraqis said they saw little difference between Democrats and Republicans.

"It will be the same policy and the same ideas. Only the faces will change," said Firas Saleh, 33, a Baghdad shop owner.

"Relations with the Americans will not change with a Democratic victory, because in America, there are strategic interests that will never be abandoned by any party, and those are America's security and interests and international affairs," said Esmail al-Hadidi, a tribal leader in the northern city of Kirkuk. "The Americans will never leave Iraq in the hands of the terrorists and the extremists, but we will see a new agenda on the military front -- there will be more diplomatic and political options."

Others said that any defeat for Bush was a victory for them.

"I was so happy when the Democrats won, because I saw Bush's face when he gave a speech after the failure of his party, and he was so angry," said Ban Muhammad 24, a student in Tikrit, the home town of ousted leader Saddam Hussein. "We hope he and his party always lose."

In violence Wednesday, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a cafe in a Shiite Muslim neighborhood in northern Baghdad, killing 16 people and wounding 18. In addition, 14 people were killed and 70 were wounded in a series of mortar attacks and car bombings in the capital.

Outside Baghdad, 27 people were killed and 32 were injured in car bombings, gun battles, roadside explosions and other violence, local security officials and news services reported.

The U.S. military said troops killed 10 fighters from the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq on Wednesday and freed a kidnapped Iraqi police officer being held by them near Muqdadiyah, about 50 miles northeast of Baghdad. The officer was found after the troops searched the insurgent cell's hideout, a military statement said.

"Once inside the building, Coalition Forces found a hostage blindfolded and shackled to the floor," the statement said. "The hostage revealed he was an Iraqi Policeman that was taken hostage six days before with two other Iraqi Policemen and was being held ransom to raise money for the terrorist cell. He said the two other policemen had been ransomed earlier by the terrorists."

In another operation, four al-Qaeda in Iraq members were killed and 48 were captured when forces raided a known insurgent meeting place on Tuesday near Ramadi, about 60 miles west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

No U.S. or Iraqi soldiers were reported killed or injured in either operation.

Separately, a Marine was killed in Anbar province west of Baghdad on Wednesday and a soldier was killed Tuesday in Kirkuk province, the U.S. military reported, bringing to 21 the number of U.S. service members killed in November.

In Iraq, New Calculations Of The U.S. Role (NYT)

By John F. Burns, Michael Luo

DOJ_NMG_0092003

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 8 — Iraq's political leaders scrambled Wednesday to interpret what a sharply altered American political landscape might mean for the future of this war-ravaged country.

Initial reactions to the sweeping Democratic gains and the replacement of Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld appeared to leave Iraqis, like many Americans, unsure of the likely impact on America's policy on the war.

Some Iraqi politicians said they hoped for major changes, while others seemed more concerned about reassuring Iraq's 27 million people that America would not abandon its commitments here and order American troops home.

Mr. Rumsfeld, though, has long been reviled by Iraqis and blamed for everything from the uncontrolled looting after the invasion in 2003 to the collapse of public services and the mounting wave of sectarian violence.

That view was particularly strong among the minority Sunnis, who lost power with the toppling of Saddam Hussein, and who now waver between a subordinate role in the new power structure and an insurgency against American troops and the American-backed politicians who now hold power.

Sadoon al-Zubaidi, who was Mr. Hussein's chief English-speaking interpreter and now acts as an adviser to the Sunni bloc in Parliament, said the setback for Republicans in the elections was a moment for Americans to realize what "a total failure" the invasion of Iraq had been.

"The Americans came to Iraq three and a half years ago to do something good for Iraqis, to free them from dictatorship," he said. "That has failed. The Americans helped, encouraged and planted civil disorder and sectarianism. Now, I would like to see all American troops taken out. I'd like to see all the reins of power placed in Iraqi hands."

But calls for the withdrawal of American troops were rare, with most politicians saying they expected no radical shift as a result of the United States elections. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, in a recorded interview on BBC that was broadcast as the election results were becoming known, sought to play down the shift to the Democrats.

"In the remaining two years of President Bush's term, I don't think there will be any major changes in the American policy," he said. "Nobody is talking about a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops."

Many Iraqis, while disliking what is widely referred to here as the occupation, now say the 150,000 American troops here are a vital bulwark between the deepening chaos and outright civil war. The only major political figure now calling for an immediate American pullout is the powerful Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who led two uprisings against American troops in 2004.

Mr. Maliki has been harshly critical of some aspects of American policy in recent weeks, demanding greater Iraqi control of the war effort and blaming the United States for the worsening of the security situation.

But in the BBC interview he appeared to shift tack, saying that Iraq could rely on President Bush and that even the Democrats were not advocating a withdrawal schedule.

Adnan Pachachi, a prominent secular Sunni politician, said most Iraqis had already identified the most pressing problem here — the rampant violence by sectarian militias — and knew that American forces were essential to any hope of bringing them under control.

"All of us, Iraqis and Americans, have to face facts instead of putting our heads in the sand," he said. "We have to do something about the militias."

The only ones who could do that, he said, were the Americans or other foreign troops, because Iraq's own security forces were heavily infiltrated by the militias.

"If that requires additional troops," Mr. Pachachi said, "then so be it. But if the British or the Americans are unable or unwilling, then we will have to go to the United Nations and see whether we can get help from other countries."

In a hall hung with red, white and blue election bunting, Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, said Iraqis could rest assured that America would stand by its commitments.

Sunni politicians, many of them harsh critics of American troops at earlier stages of the war, have said they consider the American troops as their only reliable protection against the Shiite militias that have struck back at Sunni insurgents' attacks on Shiite civilians by dispatching death squads that have killed thousands of Sunnis.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leading figure in the Iraqi Islamic Party, a major Sunni group in Parliament, said he was worried about what the newly empowered Democrats in Washington might do.

"We do not expect anything good from their side and we have our own fears," he said. "As to the Republicans, their stance in Iraq is stable and they have a realistic background. We have gotten used to the Republicans and become familiar with their intentions."

Although serious ruptures have opened between the Shiite-led government and the Bush administration in recent months, several prominent Shiites were at pains on Wednesday to emphasize that no one among the Shiites — aside from Mr. Sadr, presumably — wanted an immediate withdrawal of American troops.

"Nobody is asking for the withdrawal of the multinational forces," said Qasim Dawood, security minister in the interim government that ruled for a year after the end of the formal period of American occupation in 2004.

Among ordinary Iraqis, views on the elections differed widely. One Shiite cleric, Sheik Adel Ibrahim Subihawi, awoke at 4 a.m. on Wednesday to watch the election returns, and offered an explanation for his early rising that spoke for the widespread interest in the returns. "Our future is connected to it," he said.

As the morning wore on and the Democrats picked up more seats, his enthusiasm grew.

"A Democratic victory will change the politics of Bush's Iraq," he said, sitting on a couch, machine guns propped casually in the corner. "He'll set a timetable for withdrawal because that's what the Democrats want. And when they set a withdrawal date, the resistance will stop."

But other Iraqis fretted about what the Democrats might do. "We do care if Congress pressures the president of the United States to pull out troops because we don't have yet highly trained forces," said Muhammad Nerous, a paramedic. "We don't have yet adequate equipment by which we can challenge the terrorists."

Tolerable Or Awful: The Roads Left In Iraq (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

I had to submit this column before knowing the results of yesterday's election, but here is one thing I know already: this needs to be our last election about Iraq.

The Iraq war has turned into a sucking chest wound for our country — infecting its unity at home and its standing abroad. No one can predict what Iraq will look like 10 years from now. I wish it well. But in the near term, it is clear, nothing that we'll feel particularly proud of, nothing that we'll feel justifies the vast expenditure of lives and treasure, is going to come out of Iraq.

Our only two options left today in Iraq are "tolerable" and "awful." "Good" is no longer on the menu. When you read stories from Iraq saying that all we need to do is get rid of all the police there, get one-third of the soldiers in the Iraqi Army to actually report to duty regularly, and replace all the ministers who are corrupt, you know why "good" is not on the menu anymore.

It's time to make a final push for the tolerable, and if that fails, quit Iraq and insulate ourselves and our allies from the awful. This can't go on.

That's sad. Iraq was always a struggle of hope against history. After 9/11, and the Arab Human Development Report detailing the increasingly dysfunctional Arab-Muslim world — which produces way too many terrorists — we had a real interest in collaborating with Iraqis to try to build one decent, progressive, democratizing society in the heart of the Arab East.

But to succeed we needed to establish a secure order in Iraq and prevent the murderous Sunni/Baathist attacks on Shiites. The Bush team, arriving in Iraq with too few troops and no plans, failed to do either. And therefore the natural tribalism of Iraqis surfaced and the minimal trust between citizens needed to forge a real democracy never emerged. Now we have a tit-for-tat civil war.

The "tolerable" outcome that might be self-sustaining and stable would require reshaping Iraq as a loose federation of predominantly Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni zones. To make even that work, though, would probably require cutting a new deal with Iran and its Iraqi Shiite clients, and Syria and its Sunni Baathist allies, and the Kurds. Iraq would retain a central government in Baghdad, but power and oil income would be more radically decentralized among the different sects. Democracy would be subordinated to stability.

A small U.S. or U.N. force could remain in Iraq to police the boundaries between the three communities and make sure the ongoing violence is contained. To produce even this, though, the U.S. will probably need to set a date and threaten to leave. Otherwise, the parties won't negotiate seriously.

"Awful" would be carrying out that threat to leave Iraq by a fixed date because Iraqis prove too angry and atomized to reach any deal. The fires of madness now raging in Iraq — people beheading each other, blowing up each other's mosques — would all intensify.

A U.S. withdrawal under such conditions would be messy and shameful. But when people are that intent on killing each other there's not much we can do. As bad as we've performed in Iraq, what Iraqis have done to each other, and the little that other Muslims have done to stop them, is an even bigger travesty.

Still, we'd need to give visas to Iraqis who wanted to flee the madness; we'd need to give a security umbrella to the Kurds, so that Syria, Turkey or Iran did not invade them if we left; and we'd need to protect Jordan from the spillover.

But there would be some strategic benefits. Syria would have to support the Sunnis in Iraq, and Iran would have to back the Shiites, so these two "allies" would be on opposite sides of the civil war. Iran would also have to manage the chaos in southern Iraq, particularly the Shiite militias, and this would be a permanent migraine for Tehran. U.S. troops would no longer be in range of Iranian retaliation, and therefore would be much freer to confront Iran's nuclear challenge. The U.S. would also be able to extract itself from the Abu Ghraib/occupation syndrome and could start combating Islamist radicalism by being the best America rather than the worst.

Finally, Iraqi instability would push oil to $80 a barrel. That would mean more people buying hybrid cars and investing in alternative energy, so that we end our dependence on this region sooner.

These are our real choices in Iraq now: tolerable and awful. It's time we choose. No more expending lives and treasure for nothing good. The only way we can pursue good in the world again is by either shrinking our presence in Iraq, if Iraqis will step up, or leaving entirely, if they won't.

Youths Playing Ball Killed In Baghdad (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

BAGHDAD — Explosives rained down on a dusty soccer field in the Shiite Muslim slum of Sadr City on Wednesday, killing eight Iraqi youths and injuring dozens.

Around the country, bombings and shootings left dozens of other Iraqis dead. The U.S. military reported that two of its troops had been killed, raising to at least 2,839 the number of American service members killed in Iraq.

Mortar and rocket battles reminiscent of the urban civil warfare that engulfed Sarajevo, Beirut and Kabul in previous decades have erupted occasionally throughout Baghdad's patchwork of religiously mixed neighborhoods.

The latest fighting in northern and eastern Baghdad began Sunday, with sporadic fire between adjacent districts.

The attack on the soccer field, carried out with rockets or mortar shells, occurred about 4:30 p.m. The explosives carved deep craters into the surface and scattered shrapnel, human flesh and pieces of clothing. The injured and dying were taken to hospitals.

Exchanges of mortar fire between Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods left three other people dead and five injured in the northern district of Kadhimiya and one dead and 20 injured in the neighboring Adhamiya district.

Kadhimiya, a mostly Shiite area west of the Tigris River, is home to a golden-domed shrine that is among the most revered by Shiites. Adhamiya, a heavily Sunni neighborhood on the opposite bank of the Tigris, is the site of a famous Sunni shrine.

A suicide bombing at a cafe the night before in the nearby Shiite neighborhood of Grayat killed 21 people and injured 25, officials said. That bombing followed a mortar attack that killed seven in Adhamiya.

Iraq's Shiite-led government, apparently discounting evidence that the violence was between Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods, blamed the outbreak of shelling on Sunni insurgents firing from the city of Taji, about 20 miles north of the capital.

"Baathists and [religious extremists] are launching mortars from Taji onto Adhamiya and Kadhimiya," a statement said. The Russian-made mortars used by Iraqi insurgents, however, generally have a maximum range of five miles.

Explosions shook the capital throughout much of the day. A car bomb in the mostly Sunni neighborhood of Waziriya killed one person and injured six.

Mortar rounds struck the downtown Shorja wholesale market, killing two people and injuring eight. A mortar round also struck near the Health Ministry, killing three and injuring six.

At least 29 bodies were found around Baghdad. Many of the victims had been bound, beaten and shot in apparent sectarian reprisal killings.

Outside the capital, violence raged on.

A car bomb in a crowded market near Muqdadiya killed four people and injured six. The area is in the volatile, religiously mixed agricultural province of Diyala, northeast of Baghdad.

A roadside bomb exploded near a girls high school in Fallouja, 35 miles west of Baghdad, killing two students and injuring 12.

The most seriously wounded were rushed to the capital because the Fallouja hospital lacks resources, said Kamal Issawi, director of the facility.

"We are calling on international organizations and the government to solve our problems," he said.

An explosion in a residential neighborhood of Hillah, about 60 miles south of the capital, left at least four people dead.

A city councilman in Hillah said Sunni insurgents had driven 75 Shiite families out of the nearby district of Iskandariya over the last two days.

He alleged that the insurgents kidnapped eight young Shiite men and killed an old man who confronted them.

They also destroyed two small Shiite shrines.

"They consider Iskandariya part of their Islamic state," said Mohammed Masoudi, head of the Hillah City Council.

The Americans were killed in separate incidents. A Marine assigned to serve with the Army's 1st Armored Division died Wednesday of wounds sustained "due to enemy action" in Al Anbar province, the military said.

A soldier with the 25th Infantry Division was killed Tuesday in combat near the northern city of Kirkuk. Three soldiers were also wounded during the operation, the military said.

Meanwhile, the trial of Saddam Hussein on genocide charges resumed with witness testimony and a defense allegation that the prosecution had broken into its offices and stolen files.

In a heavily guarded courtroom, Hussein's accusers recounted the alleged crimes of the former regime in the infamous Anfal campaign, in which Iraqi security forces waged war on rebellious Kurdish villagers.

Badie Aref, an attorney for one defendant, accused the court of stealing documents crucial to its case.

"There were 23 files of documents that have disappeared," he said. "I think that they were taken by the Americans, and I think that they might have given them to somebody from the prosecution."

The judge dismissed the accusation.

The case was adjourned until Nov. 27.

Iraqi Predicts The Hanging Of Hussein By Year's End (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 8 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki predicted in a televised interview on Wednesday that former President Saddam Hussein would be hanged by the end of the year.

Court officials said, however, that the prime minister's prediction was unrealistic, considering the timing of the appeals process and the sheer volume of evidence the appellate judges would have to review. It was far more likely, they said, that the hanging would not take place until January at the earliest, and probably later.

The authorities reported the killing on Wednesday of more than 30 people in various attacks around Iraq. And the American military command described a major attack on an American military base in northeastern Baghdad on Sunday that lasted for an hour and a half and left at least 38 insurgents dead.

Under Iraqi law, a nine-judge appellate court will begin its review of the death sentences against Mr. Hussein and two of his co-defendants 30 days from Sunday, when the sentences were handed down. If the appellate judges uphold the rulings, the executions must be carried out within 30 days.

The appellate judges are not bound by a deadline for their deliberation, but Mr. Maliki and other Shiite leaders have made no secret of their desire to see Mr. Hussein executed as soon as possible. They say that Mr. Hussein's survival could help to rally the Sunni Arab-led insurgency that has been trying to drive American forces out of the country and topple the Shiite-dominated government. He periodically issues written messages from his cell at an American military detention center here exhorting insurgents to continue their resistance.

Mr. Hussein was found guilty of crimes against humanity for the persecution of the townspeople of Dujail, north of Baghdad, after what was said to be an assassination attempt against him there in 1982. A total of 148 men and youths were killed, and hundreds of others banished for years to a remote desert camp in southern Iraq.

American and Iraqi officials had originally planned to prosecute Mr. Hussein in a series of trials that, they said, would describe his long rule of terror. He is the principal defendant in a second trial involving the so-called Anfal military campaign in the late 1980s in which, prosecutors contend, as many as 180,000 Kurdish civilians were killed.

But with the conflict worsening, senior Iraqi officials, including Mr. Maliki, now say they would rather eliminate Mr. Hussein as a source of inspiration for the Sunni insurgents than use the trials to prove his personal responsibility for atrocities during his 24-year rule. According to Iraqi court officials, nothing in Iraqi law would prevent Mr. Hussein being executed before the Anfal trial ends.

In an interview televised by the BBC on Wednesday, Mr. Maliki said, "I think the court is determined to pursue this case that they are looking at, but we will not interfere."

When asked to specify when he expected Mr. Hussein to be executed, Mr. Maliki said, "I expect it to happen before the end of the year."

The Constitution mandates that President Jalal Talabani and his two vice presidents must approve the execution. But Mr. Maliki raised the possibility during the interview that because the decision was rendered by a special tribunal, it might not be subject to that constitutional provision. Mr. Hussein was tried before the Iraqi High Tribunal, the court set up to prosecute the top officials of the ousted government.

President Talabani, a Kurd, has said publicly that he is opposed to the death penalty, suggesting that he would not approve the execution. But according to court officials, the president has said he is prepared to designate Adel Abdul-Mahdi, one of his vice presidents and a Shiite, as his proxy in the vote.

Court officials said they also did not anticipate opposition from Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni Arab. Mr. Hashemi, they contend, accepted his post on the assurance that he would not oppose the court's findings.

The insurgent blitz against the American military base on Sunday began when attackers opened fire from the north and south with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, the military said Wednesday in a statement.

The garrison, called Forward Operating Base Apache, is in Adhamiya, a heavily Sunni Arab neighborhood.

Iraqi Kurds Accused Of Spying For Iran (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub, Jamal Halaby

AP, November 8, 2006

A co-defendant in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial accused Iraqi Kurds on Wednesday of spying for the Iranians at the time of the government crackdown on the Kurdish population.

Former military intelligence chief Sabir al-Douri made the accusation after listening to Kurdish witnesses testify about chemical attacks against their villages in northern Dahuk province in August 1988.

Saddam, al-Douri and five other former members of Saddam's regime have pleaded innocent to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their role in the military offensive against the Kurds, known as Operation Anfal. The prosecution says about 180,000 people, mostly civilians, were killed in the 1987-88 crackdown. Saddam and one other defendant are also charged with genocide.

Al-Douri told the court the Iranians, who fought an eight-year war with Iraq starting in 1980, had asked Kurdish guerrillas to provide intelligence about a prison camp near Mosul and about the homes of two senior Iraqi commanders in the north.

"The (Kurdish) rebels and the Iranians were working together there," he said.

The presiding judge did not respond to the remark.

The trial adjourned until Nov. 27 to give time for the defense to assemble its list of witnesses. But court spokesman Raed Juhi said the prosecution still had more witnesses to call.

If convicted, Saddam and his co-defendants could be sentenced to death.

Saddam is already under a death sentence imposed by another court Sunday for the deaths of more than 140 Shiite Muslims after an assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail in 1982.

His trial for the Kurdish crackdown will continue while an appeals court reviews the Dujail case.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was quoted as telling the British Broadcasting Corp. that if an appeals panel upholds the Dujail sentence, Saddam could be executed before the end of the year.

With the likelihood of his execution increasing, Saddam rose in the dock Tuesday and called on all Iraqis to "forgive, reconcile and shake hands."

On Wednesday, witness Ayoub Abdellah Mohammed said his village was attacked with chemical weapons on Aug. 24, 1988 — four days after a cease-fire in the war with Iran.

"After this, we had difficulty breathing and I told the villagers that the village was hit by chemical weapons," he said. "I could see birds falling and liquids coming out of people's noses."

Another witness, Tawfeeq Abdul-Aziz Mustafa, said he and other villagers fled to Turkey after a chemical attack on their community and remained there until a Kurdish self-ruled area was established in northern Iraq in 1991.

"We looked at the villages and there was yellow smoke coming out," he said. "Our eyes became red, itchy and teary. We knew it was a chemical attack."

Mustafa said his uncle died in Turkey from the effects of the attack, and he lost about 40 percent of his vision because of exposure to the chemical weapons.

The session opened with a demand from defense lawyer Badee Izzat Aref for the court to order an investigation into the alleged ransacking of the defense team's office in the U.S.-controlled Green Zone last month.

Aref said intruders damaged and stole dozens of documents, undermining the defense's effort in the trial. Chief judge Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa ordered the prosecution to give a new set of documents to the defense.

"I demand the opening of an investigation on the American side because the area of the offices is guarded by the Americans, who would shoot anybody who comes near," Aref said.

It was the first time that Aref appeared in the court since Sept. 21, when the defense team announced a boycott of the trial to protest the court's rejection of many of their motions.

Suicide Bomber Kills 42 Pakistani Soldiers (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall, Salman Masood

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Nov. 8 — A suicide bomber detonated explosives on a military training ground in northwestern Pakistan on Wednesday morning, killing at least 42 army recruits and wounding about 20 more in the deadliest terrorist attack against the Pakistani military on record, government officials said.

Suspicion immediately fell on Pakistani militants who had vowed vengeance for an airstrike on a madrasa, or religious school, that killed 83 people near the Afghan border in the Bajaur district on Oct. 30.

The Pakistani military claimed responsibility for that attack, which it said was against militants in terrorist training. But residents and opposition politicians contend that the strike was conducted by an American drone aircraft, though the Pakistani government denies it.

The sudden escalation of casualties in Pakistan's fight against militants is likely to further polarize public opinion, which is already broadly opposed to President Pervez Musharraf's cooperation with the United States and his military campaign against tribes in border regions. It may also raise questions in the military about the campaign, in which about 600 soldiers have been killed in the past two years.

Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao said a suicide bomber wrapped in a shawl ran onto the military training ground, in Dargai, a town in North-West Frontier Province, and detonated his bomb amid about 130 recruits around 8:40 a.m. The military reported that 42 soldiers had been killed, but that number may rise, because some of the wounded were in critical condition.

"It was a guy with a short beard, wearing a shawl," Khalid Mehmood, 18, a student who was walking on a road nearby and was wounded by shrapnel, told a local journalist.

Gulam Younas, a shopkeeper across the parade ground, said he was working when he heard a big explosion. "Amidst the rising dust, I saw bodies lying on the ground, wounded soldiers, limbs, shoes," he said. "It was horrible."

The military was pursuing a man suspected of being an accomplice Wednesday night who was chased to sugar cane fields several miles away. The man, described as in his mid-20s with a short beard, had been was spotted close to the scene of the blast by townspeople who said he was behaving suspiciously, military and security officials said. When someone fired on him, the officials said, he pulled out a hand grenade and threatened to hurl it at them, then disappeared into fields in a nearby village.

About 400 Pakistan Army soldiers and paramilitary Frontier Constabulary set up a cordon around the thick cane fields, which cover a little more than a square mile. Army tracking dogs, helicopters, searchlights and flares were brought in to help.

An unidentified caller told a local journalist on Wednesday that "Pakistani Taliban" were behind the suicide bombing and were retaliating for the airstrike in Bajaur on Oct. 30. The strike has been followed by daily demonstrations and protests against the government and the perceived American involvement in the strike. At least one militant leader from the Bajaur area, Maulana Faqir Muhammad, threatened to carry out revenge attacks.

Government officials in Islamabad, the capital, said Wednesday that the suicide bombing was linked to Bajaur, but emphasized that rather than a revenge attack, it was a proof of terrorist training in the region.

"We can trace back the linkage with Bajaur," said Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, the chief military spokesman, [a news service] reported. "We have been receiving intelligence reports about militants being trained for such activities," he said.

"It is linked with the Bajaur incident. It is not a consequence," said Mr. Sherpao, the interior minister. "It is linked in the sense that suicide bombers were trained in the area."

Foreign fighters and operatives for Al Qaeda are known to be at large in the mountainous tribal regions adjoining Afghanistan. Local fighters and the militants are accused of training bombers and orchestrating attacks in Afghanistan and Pakistan from their hide-outs.

A senior Pakistani intelligence official said Monday at a briefing that the madrasa in Bajaur had been receiving money from Al Qaeda to train militants and send them to Afghanistan to fight American and Afghan forces. Abu Faraj al-Libbi, an important Qaeda operative who was arrested in May 2005, disclosed under interrogation that he and other Qaeda members had visited the madrasa, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The anonymous telephone caller on Wednesday, who called the journalist Rahimullah Yusufzai of The News, a national newspaper, said that the suicide bombing had been carried out by a group led by Abu Kalim Muhammad Ansari, an otherwise unknown figure. The caller contended that the group had 274 more volunteers ready to be suicide bombers, Mr. Yusufzai said.

Yet while Pashtun tribesmen in border areas have sympathized with the Afghan Taliban and Al Qaeda, suicide bombing is new to them. Many Pashtuns say such attacks are alien to their tribal code, Pashtunwali, which forbids the killing of innocent people, and to their understanding of Islam, which forbids suicide.

General Musharraf has vowed to continue to fight such militants and to crush terrorism in almost daily comments since the Bajaur strike. Yet the suicide bombing is likely to increase the pressure on him to end military action in the tribal areas.

"There are very few now who think the military is an instrument that will work," said Talat Masood, a military analyst and retired general.

Suicide Bombing Kills 41 Troops At Pakistani Army Base (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Kamran Khan

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Nov. 8 -- A suicide bomber detonated explosives on a field filled with army recruits doing exercises in northwest Pakistan on Wednesday morning, killing at least 41 soldiers and wounding dozens in one of the worst such attacks in Pakistan's recent history.

Officials immediately blamed the bombing on al-Qaeda and local Islamic extremists. They said it appeared to be an act of reprisal for a government missile attack Oct. 30 that killed 82 people at an Islamic school in the nearby Bajaur tribal region. Officials suspected that the school was being used as a training camp for guerrillas.

"It seems that this was linked to the action by our forces against militants in Bajaur last week. Al-Qaeda and its followers in this region are getting desperate because of our actions," Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao said from Islamabad, the capital. "I am afraid this is a beginning of a new phase of terrorism in Pakistan. The terrorists are now pitched directly against our security forces."

Military officials said the bomber, wrapped in a cloak, wandered onto the unguarded training field and detonated explosives before anyone noticed him. They said a second intended suicide bomber escaped on a motorbike from the military training camp, located in Dargai village near the semiautonomous tribal areas that border eastern Afghanistan.

Several hours later, a man called the office of Geo television in Peshawar, the provincial capital of North-West Frontier Province. He identified himself as the second suicide bomber and claimed that the attack had been carried out by local insurgents from the Islamic Taliban movement, which operates on both sides of the border.

"Our martyr has clearly stated that this attack is our response to the Pakistan army attack in Bajaur," the caller said in Afghan Pashto, according to journalists at Geo. "This attack marks the end of our commitment not to target the Pakistan army. We have enrolled 275 people as suicide bombers, and now they will take revenge."

Dargai is a stronghold of a banned Islamic militant group, the Movement for the Enforcement of Islamic Law, which ran the religious school that was bombed by the military in Bajaur. The group has been fighting government troops in the tribal areas for months and was banned in 2002 after trying to impose Taliban-style rule in the tribal areas.

After Wednesday's attack, security was heightened at all military facilities in Pakistan and soldiers in the northwest region were told not to visit public places in uniform, a senior army official said. On Tuesday, the North-West Frontier provincial governor was forced to cut short a visit to the South Waziristan tribal area when two rockets were fired near a meeting he was attending with local elders.

The tribal areas are plagued by violence and Islamic extremism, and U.S. and Afghan officials believe both Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters have taken refuge there. Recently the Pakistani government made two peace agreements in South and North Waziristan, hoping to end the conflict that has pitted Islamic insurgents against Pakistani troops on one side of the border and NATO and Afghan forces on the other. A third agreement was due to be signed in Bajaur last week.

But the Oct. 30 missile attack, which Pakistani officials said was based on U.S. intelligence and carried out by Pakistani forces, appears to have sabotaged that effort. News of the attack has convulsed the tribal region, with daily demonstrations taking place and local politicians resigning from parliament in protest.

According to Pakistani and U.S. officials, the Islamic school in Bajaur had been under suspicion for some time as a training place for insurgents, and there were reports of senior al-Qaeda figures visiting there.

Pakistani officials have strongly defended the attack and continued to assert responsibility for it despite widespread public protest. On Tuesday, the army's powerful corps commanders met with Pakistan's military president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and resolved to continue the campaign to free Pakistan from armed Islamic militancy, according to a military press statement.

But many Pakistanis in the volatile tribal region are convinced that the missile attack killed only innocent young religious students, that it was carried out by U.S. Predator drones and that U.S. officials pressured Pakistan into supporting it. U.S. officials have said the United States did not carry out the attack.

If it did, however, analysts said, that would mean Musharraf's government, already tarred as a U.S. puppet by many Pakistanis, chose the lesser evil of claiming it had carried out an attack that was bound to create enormous domestic anger, unleash the kind of violent reaction that occurred Wednesday and undermine a reconciliation policy it had worked hard to promote.

Sayed Sahibzada Haroon Rashid, a resident of Bajaur and member of the National Assembly from Pakistan's largest legal Islamic party, said in an interview Wednesday in Peshawar that he personally knew the names, relatives and tribes of most of the victims and that all were teenage students. He said a government list of purported national ID cards showing many to be in their 20s was a fabrication.

"This was not a training camp, it was a school where boys study the Koran. They didn't even find a knife," said Rashid, who reached the blast site within minutes and helped collect pieces of bodies. "We all recognized the American drone planes because they fly over every day. There was no al-Qaeda there; it was just an excuse to destroy our peace process. This will unite the whole country against the Musharraf dictatorship and America."

Taliban Fighters Talk Tactics - While Safe In Pakistan (CSM)

By Suzanna Koster

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

The 22-year-old doesn't look like the traditional turbaned Taliban commander. His black hair shoots out at all angles from beneath a red cap. He smiles easily and has a neatly trimmed beard.

But Hilal says he is the co-leader of 200 Taliban fighters who operate across the border in Afghanistan. "Two years ago, we only attacked Afghan officials, but now we have so many Talibs that we can attack Americans," he boasts.

In a rare interview with a Western reporter, Hilal and three other Afghan Taliban fighters describe how they slip into Afghanistan, attack NATO and Afghan forces, and return to Pakistan to rest.

"Everybody in the neighborhood knows we are Talibs," says Noman, a 19-year-old fighter with a blue-white block-printed turban. "Paki-stan is a little bit free for us."

The interview was conducted over two days in a small house made of yellow mud in Pakistan's Balochistan Province. The fighters, who won't give their real names, say they are here for a refresher course in Taliban ideology in a Pakistani religious school.

A year ago, such confident talk from Taliban fighters could have been chalked up to bravado. But with more than 50 suicide attacks in the past six months, resistance by large Taliban units in the increasingly volatile provinces of Kandahar and Helmand in the south, and a greater willingness of Taliban fighters to come out into the open and speak their minds are all indications that the Taliban resurgence is no longer a matter of conjecture.

This year has been a difficult one for the US, coalition, and Afghan forces. With US commanders handing control of the south over to its British, Canadian, Dutch, and other allies in NATO, the Taliban are making the transfer a bloody one. How NATO forces fare in the south could determine whether the democratically elected government of President Hamid Karzai - and indeed, the experiment in Afghan democracy itself - succeeds or fails.

Commander Hilal says that currently 40 of his troops are in Afghanistan fighting, and 160 are "refreshing their ideology" in Pakistan. Hilal says that he discusses military plans by cellphone and satellite phone with higher Taliban commanders who are all in Afghanistan.

Hilal says his fighters operate in groups of 20 to 25 men in the Afghan provinces Ghazni and Zabul. There are 35 groups active in Zabul's capital, Qalat, and 20 to 25 in the rest of by American forces controlled province.

Mustafa, in the black turban, says that the Talibs cross the border alone or in twos. Depending on the crossing point, he says - listing Pakistan border cities of Chaman, Badini, and Torkham - it takes one or two nights to join up with other Taliban fighters, he says. "The majority have Pakistani identity cards, so crossing the border is no problem," he says.

The Taliban fighters return to a different house in Pakistan every month, but say that they must be very careful in Afghanistan, says Noman, a gaunt-faced young man who says he wants to learn English. But Mustafa adds that they are no longer in hiding in Afghanistan. "We are now 200 to 300 at a time and can roam around freely," he says.

Prior to every mission, they get training in one of the many training camps in the Afghan mountains, says the 22-year-old Ali, who is quiet through most of the interview.

Afghanistan and NATO officials regularly accuse Pakistan of harboring Taliban leaders. Pakistan officials say they are doing everything they can to remove them.

On Wednesday, a suicide bomber killed 35 Pakistani soldiers in a brazen attack at a military base in Pakistan's North West Frontier Province, leaving the Army shaken and a Taliban peace deal in tatters.

"Never has there been so many military casualties in one attack," says Ramiullah Yusufzai, a Peshawar-based journalist who has covered the Pakistan military's campaign against militants since 2001.

Hours after the attack, an organization calling itself the Pakistan Taliban, which had never come forward before, phoned Mr. Yusufzai to claim responsibility. The caller told Yusufzai that the bomber prepared a suicide video before carrying out the strike, suggesting a parallel in tactics used by Taliban militants in Afghanistan.

The four fighters say they all studied at an Afghan madrassah (religious school) before the American forces entered Afghanistan in 2001. Hilal fled to Pakistan when his fellow students at the madrassah were arrested after the Taliban regime was toppled. In 2003, he says, he joined the jihad.

In their Afghan camps, "we get training, even suicide education. There are many groups saying how we suicide bomb, lay mines, or use Kalashnikovs," he says. Suicide attacks are not for him, he says. "It takes a lot of training. You have to think about target time, because maybe you blow up yourself but nobody else."

All of their ammunition is inside Afghanistan and is used against non-Muslims, says Mustafa. "There is a lot of ammunition in Afghanistan to use against the non-Muslims. We hid it in depots after the fall of the Taliban."

The Afghan forces are the targets are considered "non-Muslims" because they work with the Americans. "All the checkpoints are covered by Afghan troops, so we go for them first," he says.

A month ago, Hilal says his forces attacked a military convoy in Zabul's provincial capital, Qalat. He says they killed 35 Afghan troops. Two Taliban fighters were injured.

The Taliban fighters also pride themselves on blocking the main highway between Kandahar and Kabul.

Mustafa says he's in favor of the international reconstruction work in Afghanistan. But Noman interrupts, raising a finger. "We are not in favor of reconstruction work, because it happens in the name of Christianity. This is why we close the schools. The government completely changed the books. A was for Allah, now it stands for Aass [mule in Pashto], J was for Jihad, now it stands for Jawary [maiz in Pashto]. With pamphlets, letters, and by taking the teachers "into confidence," Noman says they try to close down the schools - if necessary, by force.

More than 160 Afghan schools have been attacked this year, according to The Associated Press.

The fighters say ordinary Afghans give them vehicles, fuel, food, medicine, and information. "There are many business men who help us. We were given 10 vehicles in Kandahar and 15 in Helmand. Sometimes they give us security. They say, 'He is not a Talib, he is my family member.' That is jihad," says Noman.

The interview has been watched by a silent little observer: an 11-year-old boy on a wooden seat. His parents have sent him to Noman for religious training. He brings food to the Taliban fighters in the house. When he is grown, he says shyly, he wants to be a fighter. "Now I am still a kid, but when I have a beard I can join."

Poll: Afghans Express Confidence In Country's Direction, Security (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092013

Most of the 6,200 surveyed say they are satisfied with democracy, but corruption is a major problem

Despite a raging pro-Taliban insurgency, the people of Afghanistan say they are optimistic about the future, satisfied with their young democracy and rank security low on their list of everyday concerns, according to a survey out today.

In what it is billing as the widest opinion poll conducted in Afghanistan, the non-profit, San Francisco-based Asia Foundation surveyed 6,226 Afghans 18 and older in person in 32 of the country's 34 provinces over the summer.

Polling couldn't be conducted safely or reliably in two areas: southern Afghanistan's strife-torn Zabul and Uruzgan provinces, which together account for 2.3% of the country's population. The survey's margin of error was +/-2.5%.

The poll, financed by the U.S. Agency for International Development, suggests that Afghans are surprisingly confident about the direction of their country even as NATO forces battle a pro-Taliban insurgency in southern and eastern provinces and the violence begins to threaten other places that previously had been considered safe.

While violence has increased, Afghanistan has made some progress in the nearly five years since U.S.-led forces overthrew the fundamentalist Islamic Taliban regime.

Afghans finally got a chance to vote — in presidential elections in 2004 and parliamentary elections in 2005. Roads have been paved and schools reopened after three decades of anarchy.

Outside the south, major Afghan cities such as Mazar-e-Sharif in the north, Herat in the west and the capital, Kabul, have been largely free of political violence.

Frederick Starr, chairman of the Central Asia-Caucasus Institute at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies in Washington, said he was not surprised by the survey. “These findings … in no way contradict the larger conclusion that this is a country still desperately poor and desperately in need of help,” Starr said. “What they affirm is that help produces results, which in turn generates appreciation.”

The poll found that:

•Afghans were more than twice as likely (44% to 21%) to think their country was headed in the right direction, rather than the wrong direction; 29% had mixed feelings. Still, the optimists were down from 64% in a smaller Asia Foundation survey conducted in 2004.

By contrast, Iraqis have a bleaker outlook. A Sept. 1-4 World Public Opinion Poll of more than 1,000 Iraqis showed that 47% thought their country was going in the right direction, while 52% thought it was going the wrong way.

•77% said they were satisfied with the way democracy is working in Afghanistan.

•Only 6% ranked security as the biggest problem in their area, behind unemployment (18%), electricity shortages (12%), poverty (10%), a weak economy (10%) and scarce water supplies (9%). Sixty percent said they rarely or never worried about their own safety. However, 22% said security was the biggest problem facing the nation.

•54% said they were more prosperous than they were under the Taliban, which governed Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001; 26% felt less prosperous.

•42% said corruption was a major problem in their daily lives, and 77% called it a major national problem; 51% of those who dealt with public health care officials reported paying bribes for health service.

•Afghans had contradictory attitudes toward political tolerance: 85% said the government should allow peaceful opposition, but 64% said they would not allow political parties they personally opposed to meet in their areas.

•Nearly one-tenth of men and one-eighth of women felt that women should occupy most political positions in a country where women traditionally have been barred from schools and jobs.

•87% said they trusted the Afghan national army, and 86% said they trusted the Afghan national police. The police, in particular, have been widely criticized for being corrupt, brutal and beholden to local warlords. A report released this month by the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based non-profit group devoted to conflict prevention, called the Afghan police “little more than private militias … regarded in nearly every district more as a source of insecurity than protection.”

“I have never met one person, including the minister of the Interior, who trusted the Afghan national police,” Barnett Rubin, who studies Afghanistan at New York University's Center on International Cooperation, said in an e-mail. “I think this is not a very reliable survey.”

Starr counters: “For a country that didn't have a national army and had only local militias, the fact that one exists — no matter its absolute level — is a breakthrough.”

George Varughese, who directed the poll for the Asia Foundation, which supports programs in Asia that help improve governance and law and encourage economic development, agrees that some of the results “appear to challenge the current wisdom on issues in Afghanistan,” but says, “We feel it is a solid, important piece of work, completed during a difficult time.”

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-U.S. Foodservice Executive Convicted (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

A New York jury convicted former U.S. Foodservice Inc. marketing chief Mark P. Kaiser yesterday of conspiracy, securities fraud and false filing charges, all but bringing to a close a three-year, $800 million accounting fraud probe at the Columbia food distribution company.

Kaiser, 49, remains free on bond until his sentencing Feb. 8. He is the only former official at U.S. Foodservice, a unit of the Dutch grocery retailer Royal Ahold NV, who presented his case to a jury.

A few weeks before the trial began last month, former finance chief Michael J. Resnick pleaded guilty to conspiracy for his role in the scheme, which boosted earnings by inflating the amount of promotional rebates U.S. Foodservice received from suppliers.

Kaiser's deputy, Timothy J. Lee, also pleaded guilty and testified against his former boss in the course of the case, which spanned about four weeks. In closing arguments, Kaiser's lawyer, Richard J. Morvillo of the District, labored to paint Lee as a liar trying to curry favor with the government and win a lighter prison sentence.

"Nothing has changed in terms of our view of Mr. Kaiser's innocence, and we plan to pursue what we believe is a meritorious appeal," Morvillo said in an e-mail yesterday.

Through a spokeswoman, Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia declined to comment.

The conviction came two days after Ahold said it would put U.S. Foodservice up for sale, even as it retains control of local supermarket chain Giant Food.

Earlier this year, Ahold reached a nonprosecution agreement with the Justice Department over the accounting problems at the Columbia unit. Ahold's stock plummeted more than 60 percent when the problems were disclosed in early 2003. Ahold, which did not pay fines to the government because of its extensive cooperation with investigators, later paid $1.1 billion to resolve shareholder claims.

In all, more than a dozen executives at U.S. Foodservice and its supplier companies have pleaded guilty and settled related civil charges with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Conviction In U.S. Foodservice Trial (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

NEW YORK -- The former marketing chief of Ahold NV's U.S. Foodservice Inc. unit was convicted of participating in a scheme to create millions of dollars in fake supplier rebates in order to artificially increase the unit's operating results by hundreds of millions of dollars.

After about a day of deliberations, a jury in U.S. District Court in Manhattan found Mark Kaiser guilty of conspiracy, securities fraud and four counts of making false filings. Mr. Kaiser faces a maximum of 20 years in prison on the most serious charge of securities fraud. Sentencing is set for Feb. 8.

"We'll do our talking in the Court of Appeals," said Richard J. Morvillo, Mr. Kaiser's lawyer, when asked for a comment on the verdicts.

The government alleged Mr. Kaiser and others misrepresented to U.S. Foodservice's auditors and the public how much the company was receiving in supplier rebates, known as promotional allowances, by hundreds of millions of dollars in order to meet income targets.

More than a dozen U.S. Foodservice vendors and three former executives, including former U.S. Foodservice Chief Financial Officer Michael Resnick, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter.

On Monday, the Amsterdam-based retailer said it will put the U.S. Foodservice unit and its Tops supermarkets in New York and Pennsylvania up for sale.

UnitedHealth Executives Forfeit $390 Million In Options (WSJ)

By STEVE STECKLOW And VANESSA FUHRMANS

Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

The two top executives of UnitedHealth Group Inc. agreed to forfeit about $390 million in stock-option compensation, by far the biggest sum returned to a company under scrutiny for backdating options awards.

The giveback was announced at the same time the giant health insurer disavowed more than a decade's worth of earnings statements.

Last month, an internal inquiry found that the two executives -- outgoing Chief Executive William W. McGuire and his successor, Stephen J. Hemsley -- received options that carried dates prior to the dates on which they were actually granted, making them more valuable than they otherwise would have been.

Other senior UnitedHealth executives will also return unspecified options gains. Paul Hodgson, senior research associate at Corporate Library, a corporate-governance research group in Portland, Maine, said the $390 million giveback by Dr. McGuire and Mr. Hemsley may be the largest voluntary forfeiture by corporate executives ever. "This is certainly the biggest that I'm aware of," he said.

UnitedHealth is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, in which companies manipulated the dates that options were awarded to provide additional compensation to executives. More than 130 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, and many of those are also being probed by the Justice Department.

UnitedHealth also disclosed that it would have to take "significantly greater" charges related to its backdated stock options than it had previously estimated and that it expects the charges to affect the past 12 years of previously reported earnings. The Minnetonka, Minn.-based health-insurance giant didn't specify what the new charges would be. It had previously said it might have to restate up to $286 million in earnings, stemming from three years' worth of earnings.

UnitedHealth also said its chief financial officer, Patrick Erlandson, resigned his post and will be succeeded by G. Mike Mikan, the company's senior vice president of finance. Mr. Erlandson will be reassigned to other "operational duties," the company said. A UnitedHealth spokesman declined to say whether Mr. Erlandson's move was related to the stock-options issue.

More than 40 executives have lost their jobs to date in the options imbroglio, including Dr. McGuire, who agreed last month to step down as UnitedHealth's chairman. He will leave his post as chief executive by Dec. 1, after 15 years at the company. UnitedHealth's internal probe concluded that Mr. Hemsley, the company's chief operating officer, received backdated grants, but it made no finding that he had a role in their creation.

UnitedHealth's options troubles followed a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal in March that showed that Dr. McGuire had received stock options grants at favorable times, including awards received in 1997, 1999 and 2000 whose dates coincided with those years' lowest closing share price. The article reported that the odds of such a favorable pattern occurring by chance were at least one in 200 million. At the time, UnitedHealth called its options-granting process "appropriate."

Options are intended to give recipients the opportunity to profit if the company's share price rises in the future. Usually, the recipient can buy shares in the future at the price of the stock on the day the option was awarded. Backdating involves pretending that the grant was awarded on an earlier day, when the share price was lower, giving the recipient the potential for greater profit. If not disclosed to shareholders, the practice can result in serious accounting and tax consequences.

UnitedHealth, in fact, faces a slew of noncash charges related to stock-based compensation, as well as cash charges resulting from tax liabilities. It said yesterday it would have to further delay filing its third quarter Form 10-Q to the SEC.

Both Mr. Hemsley and Dr. McGuire agreed last month to allow the exercise prices of previously granted options to be reset to the highest share price during the grant year after a board-commissioned review concluded that several option grants had likely been backdated.

The company said Mr. Hemsley and other unnamed senior executives had agreed not only to give up paper gains on unrealized stock options with questionable grant dates, but also to forfeit some money already made on previously exercised options. For Mr. Hemsley, the actions -- including forfeiting a complex tranche of grants that were suspended and then reactivated in August 2000 -- will reduce his past stock compensation by $190 million in both unrealized gains and money he would return. "My decision is in keeping with my personal goal of avoiding even the appearance of any unintended benefit from any past option grants to me," he said in a statement. Before joining UnitedHealth in 1997, Mr. Hemsley was chief financial officer at the accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP.

Dr. McGuire has also agreed not to benefit from any grants with problematic dates that he has already exercised, although it isn't yet clear how this will be done, according to a person familiar with the situation. His attorney, David Brodsky, said, "Dr. McGuire is pleased to have reached an agreement to reprice his options. The agreement to forgo approximately $200 million means that Dr. McGuire will receive no benefit at all from dating issues in connection with his options."

But Dr. McGuire hasn't yet agreed to forfeit the reactivated options in which he and other employees were effectively able to get the same options twice, at favorable prices. For Dr. McGuire alone, those extra options are now valued at about $250 million. The issue of those options hasn't been resolved between Dr. McGuire and the company, according to people familiar with the situation.

At the end of 2005, Dr. McGuire had a cache of unexercised options valued at $1.78 billion. Mr. Hemsley's options at the time were valued at more than $650 million.

UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay wouldn't provide any details on the formula the company is using to determine how much executives have to return to the company from previously exercised grants. He added that the company was still working out the details on how the money would be paid back.

However the payback is handled, executive compensation experts said the move to undo past compensation is likely to complicate the tax liabilities that UnitedHealth faces from backdated grants. "The IRS doesn't like that sort of thing," said James Reda, managing director of a New York-based pay consulting firm James F. Reda & Associates.

The company's board also set new rules for its independent directors, prohibiting business relationships that involve payments from company executives or any direct compensation from the company, other than for board service, within the prior three years. That is tougher than New York Stock Exchange requirements, which limit other direct compensation for independent directors to less than $100,000. The more stringent rules come amid the resignation last month of William Spears, a UnitedHealth board member for 15 years, after the company's probe revealed undisclosed financial entanglements with Dr. McGuire.

UnitedHealth also said it reached a new, four-year employment agreement with Mr. Hemsley that is remarkably spartan compared with his and Dr. McGuire's previous contracts. Under its terms, Mr. Hemsley will receive a base salary of $1.3 million, $1 million less than Dr. McGuire earned as CEO. Far from the power Dr. McGuire enjoyed to negotiate and, in some years, set the date for his own option awards, Mr. Hemsley's contract doesn't set any minimum or target level for bonuses or other incentive-linked compensation. Rather, any additional bonuses are "solely at the discretion" of the board's compensation committee, the company reported in a filing with the SEC. "It's unusual for someone to relinquish that much control over how his bonus gets set," Mr. Reda said.

UnitedHealth Options Probe Cost Higher Than Expected (Update7) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, November 9, 2006

Nov. 8 (Bloomberg) -- UnitedHealth Group Inc., the largest U.S. health insurer, said its restatement of earnings to correct accounting for stock-based compensation ``will be significantly greater'' than the $286 million it estimated in May.

The insurer also said today it will reduce the value of stock options awarded to two top executives and delay filing third-quarter earnings to U.S. regulators. UnitedHealth is among at least 167 companies that have disclosed probes into backdated options in a broadening U.S. scandal, including 71 which changed previously reported financial results.

Departing Chief Executive Officer William McGuire will lose about $200 million because of the restatements, said his lawyer, David Brodsky. Stephen Hemsley, who replaces McGuire on Dec. 1, will give up about $190 million, Minnetonka, Minnesota-based UnitedHealth said. Last month, both agreed to let their option dates be reset to the highest share price in the grant year.

The repricing ``probably removes one more overhang on the stock, but you can't draw any more conclusions at this point about what McGuire has or hasn't done wrong,'' said Les Funtleyder, an analyst at Miller Tabak in New York, in a telephone interview.

UnitedHealth said its financial statements from 1994 through September this year ``should no longer be relied upon'' because they may not reflect costs of stock-based compensation.

Oct. 15 Agreement

McGuire agreed Oct. 15 to be replaced by Hemsley, the current president and chief operating officer, after an independent inquiry found evidence that company options were backdated during the past 12 years.

Investigators are trying to determine whether companies inflated the value of options awarded to senior executives by backdating or timing the grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low.

The shares fell $1.57, or 3.2 percent, to $48 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Brodsky, with Latham & Watkins in Washington, said today in a statement that his client's agreement to reprice options ``means McGuire will receive no benefit at all from dating issues in connection with the options.''

``All of the remaining value of his options are the result of the outstanding performance of the company, which saw 8,400% growth under his leadership,'' Brodsky said.

Chief Financial Officer

Patrick Erlandson resigned as chief financial officer of UnitedHealth and will be succeeded by G. Mike Mikan, the company said. Forrest Burke was named acting general counsel, replacing David Lubben, who resigned Oct. 15.

The company also said it strengthened its requirements for defining the independence of its directors and restricted charitable contributions to organizations run by independent directors. UnitedHealth also prohibited business relationships between the independent board members and executives employed by the company.

An internal inquiry by Washington law firm Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP examined 29 option grants from 1994 through 2006 and found that the measurement dates for most were incorrect and many ``were likely backdated,'' according to a summary of the report, released Oct. 15.

`Central To'

McGuire was ``central to'' a process that set many option dates ``at or near'' the lowest price in a quarter or year, raising his potential profit over 12 years, the law firm said.

In the WilmerHale report, McGuire stated that grant dates on the CEO's options ``typically coincided with'' a memo, phone call, meeting or discussion with at least one member of the board's compensation committee.

The report's authors responded that there were ``relatively few instances in which there are either direct or circumstantial evidence to establish that a grant date was selected on that particular day.''

McGuire is under investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the U.S. Department of Justice and the Minnesota Attorney General. The company also faces shareholder lawsuits.

UnitedHealth on Oct. 19 said third-quarter net income rose 38 percent after acquisitions raised the number of policyholders. Earnings climbed to $1.1 billion, or 79 cents a share, beating analysts' estimates by 3 cents, and the company increased its forecast for next year.

DOJ_NMG_0092018

Revenue rose 55 percent to $18 billion after the acquisition of PacifiCare Health Systems Inc., with 3.3 million members in medical plans, helped push the number of people covered by UnitedHealth policies to more than 70 million, up 24 percent in a year.

UnitedHealth's Options Just Got Messier (BSWK)

By Sonja Ryst

BusinessWeek, November 9, 2006

The health insurer says costs for backdated stock options will balloon beyond its prior estimates. The new CEO has his work cut out for him

UnitedHealth Group (UNH) faces a whopper of a bill from backdated stock options. It's also hoping to renew favor with investors by repricing options for several executives and bringing new leaders into its executive suite.

Less than a month after ousting its CEO over the options scandal, the suburban Minneapolis health insurer told investors Nov. 8 that it expects to take "significantly greater" charges than the $286 million it had previously predicted. The company also said its financial statements for the past dozen years are suspect and shouldn't be relied on, pending restatements. The reviews also will cause the company to delay filing its third-quarter report with the Securities & Exchange Commission.

The news came as UnitedHealth announced that its new chief executive, Stephen Hemsley, has agreed to have his options from 1997 and 2002 reset to the highest share price in the year in which they were granted. He also agreed to give up gains from options that were suspended in 1999 and reinstituted in August, 2000. The decision cuts the value of his options by $190 million. "My decision is in keeping with my personal goal of avoiding even the appearance of any unintended benefit from any past option grants to me," Hemsley said in a press release. Under Hemsley's new four-year employment agreement with UnitedHealth, he's guaranteed only a base salary. Widespread Restatements

Hemsley replaces company founder and current CEO, Dr. William McGuire, who will have the exercise prices reset for all of his options with recorded grant dates between 1994 and 2002. McGuire resigned as board chairman on Oct. 15 after an external review found that many of his stock options were most likely backdated (see BusinessWeek.com, 10/16/06, "Hard Times for UnitedHealth").

McGuire is scheduled to leave the company on Dec. 1. The terms of his severance are still being negotiated. At the end of last year, McGuire's options were worth $1.78 billion. He has agreed to have them repriced to their highest point in the grant year. That will shave about $200 million from the value of McGuire's options, his attorney, David Brodsky, told The Associated Press on Wednesday.

The options backdating scandal has snared more than 120 companies to date, many of which will need to restate results to account for the compensation expense and pay taxes for options that were mishandled. The practice of backdating, which is allowed under accounting rules as long as it's disclosed, allows the recipient of a stock option to snag an immediate paper gain, since the strike price is set below the current share price. First Priority

UnitedHealth also ousted its chief financial officer, Patrick Erlandson, who has been in that position since 2001. Erlandson will remain with the company, and be succeeded by G. Mike Mikan, a senior vice-president of finance. In addition, UnitedHealth designated Forrest Burke as acting general counsel, from his former role as general counsel for UnitedHealthcare, Uniprise, and specialized-care services.

The company says senior executives and its former general counsel, David Lubben, have agreed to reset the dates on all options from 1994 to 2002 to the day they were actually granted. They also have agreed to a formula to account for income on options they have already exercised. "The effect of these changes is to remove any potential whatsoever for these individuals to have financially benefited from any option misdating," the company said.

Cleaning up the options mess is Job No. 1 for Hemsley, who joined the company in 1997. In a conference call with analysts last month, he apologized for the fiasco and promised new managers with "stature, expertise, and integrity. We will be unrelenting in achieving the highest standards for governance and integrity" (see BusinessWeek.com, 10/18/06, "The Ties UnitedHealth Failed to Disclose"). Changing the Culture

Still, some analysts want to see results—and the debacle's costs—before saying the company has found its way. "Their corporate governance has been abysmal, and they've made a few changes over the last couple months," said Brandon Troegle, an analyst at research firm Morningstar in Chicago. "I think they're all very positive changes, but they're reactionary. There's always more they could do."

The latest options news, coupled with uncertainty over what newly empowered Democrats in Washington might plan for the privatized health industry, sent UnitedHealth shares down 3.2% on Nov. 8, to $48, on the New York Stock Exchange. The stock is down by more than a third from its 52-week high of $64.61 in December.

"They have to prove there's a cultural change in the organization," says Sheryl Skolnick, a senior vice-president at investment bank CRT Capital Group. She's watching to see what sort of retirement package McGuire will get. The whole mess, Skolnick predicts, will be largely closed by the spring. Investors will be hoping that estimate proves accurate.

UnitedHealth Expects Greater Charges Due To Options (LABIZ)

Los Angeles Business, November 9, 2006

UnitedHealth Group Inc. announced Wednesday a series of actions to address the problems of backdating stock options at the company.

The company said in a statement that it cannot yet determine the amount of "cash charges resulting from potential tax liabilities," but that it will be "significantly greater" than the $286 million initially anticipated.

The board of the Golden Valley, Minn.-based health insurer said that due to the adjustments necessary to correct the backdating of stock options, its quarterly reports from 1994 to September 2006 "should no longer be relied upon."

The company also is withholding the filing of its 10-Q report for the third quarter of 2006.

New President and CEO Stephen Hemsley signed a four-year employment agreement, and voluntarily agreed to reprice any stock options questioned by the independent WilmerHale report of the company's internal finances. This will reduce the value of Hemsley's past compensation by $190 million.

Outgoing CEO William McGuire also agreed to reset his options dates from 1994 to 2002 to the highest stock price during those years, but the company did not indicate the reduced dollar value of that recalculation.

The board strengthened requirements for ensuring the independence of its directors, going further than the standards of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the New York Stock Exchange.

After this announcement, shares of UnitedHealth's (NYSE: UNH) stock dropped $1.96, or 3.95 percent, to $47.61 in mid-day trading on the New York Stock Exchange. It closed at $48, down $1.57 from Tuesday's $49.57 closing price.

Fannie Mae Spending Over $1B On Review (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, AP Business Writer

AP, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Fannie Mae said Wednesday it expects to spend more than $1 billion this year on the massive review of its accounting and preparing financial statements as the mortgage giant pushes to complete it by year's end.

The government-sponsored company, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States, is emerging from an accounting scandal that brought the ouster of top executives and a record $400 million civil fine in a settlement with federal regulators. Fannie Mae also said it would miss a regulatory deadline Wednesday for filing its financial report for the third quarter of 2006. The company hasn't filed an earnings statement since late 2004.

Federal regulators that year accused Fannie Mae of serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation to meet Wall Street targets, and the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered the company to restate earnings back to 2001.

Washington-based Fannie Mae is the second-largest U.S. financial institution after Citigroup Inc.

The anticipated restatement has been estimated at $10.8 billion, though Fannie Mae says it expects the final amount could be lower. The company said in August it believes that the accounting review has uncovered the last of the errors.

In its third-quarter filing Wednesday, Fannie Mae said it expects to spend about $850 million this year on the complex reworking of its accounting and related expenses - including legal fees for its defense against suits filed by shareholders - and more than $200 million on preparing financial statements for periods after 2004 to bring its reporting current.

The process "has required, and continues to require, a substantial amount of time and resources because the restatement entails significant complexities," the company said in its filing with the SEC.

Last May, the federal agency that regulates Fannie Mae and its smaller government-sponsored sibling, Freddie Mac, issued a blistering report alleging a six-year accounting fraud at Fannie Mae. Regulators said the scheme included manipulations to reach quarterly earnings targets so that company executives could pocket hundreds of millions in bonuses from 1998 to 2004.

The Justice Department had pursued a criminal investigation, but federal prosecutors said in August they had shut down their probe. The SEC still could bring civil actions against individual executives, including people no longer at Fannie Mae, with the burden of proof less stringent than in criminal prosecutions.

In May, the company disclosed new accounting problems that had been uncovered in its business of issuing securities backed by the billions of dollars of home mortgages annually that it buys from lenders and bundles together for resale to investors worldwide.

Similarly, Fannie Mae in March disclosed new accounting problems that had been uncovered in several areas, including loans, investment securities, houses acquired through foreclosures, interest on delinquent home loans, and reverse mortgages.

They all are in addition to the accounting-rule violations that came to light in September 2004 involving derivatives, the financial instruments that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac use to hedge against swings in interest rates, and its mortgage commitments.

The two were created by Congress to pump money into the $8 trillion home-mortgage market to keep interest rates low and make home ownership affordable for low- and moderate-income people. Freddie Mac has been emerging from its own accounting scandal, which surfaced in mid-2003.

Fannie Mae shares rose $1.74, or 2.9 percent, to $41.64 in midday trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

S.E.C. Is Seeking To Help Small Companies On Audits (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

Regulators are seeking a way to lighten the burden of the Sarbanes-Oxley law on smaller companies by addressing the focus and cost of audits of internal controls, Christopher Cox, the chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said yesterday.

Mr. Cox said in an interview that the goal was to focus the attention of auditors on only those controls that could be important to assuring the accuracy of financial records, a measure required by Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, and to hold down the cost of the audits.

“There will be an audit for everybody, which is a major decision we took,” he said, adding that the nature of the audit could change. “It is supposed to be risk-based, so that the auditor’s time is focused on the areas of greatest risk.”

He said that was particularly important for smaller companies, some of which have complained that costs are excessive. The burden of such audits has also been blamed for a reluctance of foreign companies to list their securities on American markets.

Mr. Cox said his goal was to smooth the way for the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board to propose a new auditing standard in the area, and for the S.E.C. to approve it, by this spring. To do that, he said, he has held extensive consultations with Mark Olsen, the chairman of the oversight board.

The commission appears to be seeking a middle road in a contentious fight that pits advocates of strong controls on corporate misbehavior — who fear any weakening of the law that was passed in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals

— against corporate executives who see an opportunity to roll back what they see as overregulation and, at the same time, perhaps adopt other business-friendly policies. A committee appointed by the previous chairman of the commission, William H. Donaldson, urged the S.E.C. to eliminate audits for many smaller companies.

Some members of Congress have said they will push for legislation next year, and commissions appointed by business interests are planning to produce proposals for legislation soon. But other legislators have urged regulators to find ways to cut costs without having to reopen the law.

Mr. Cox said that many were taken by surprise by the cost, noting that Section 404, which requires company managements to assess the state of internal financial controls, was based on existing legislation affecting financial institutions.

"That did not cause the sky to fall," he said of the earlier rule, "and there was no advance warning that the sky would fall" when Section 404 was adopted.

But, he said, the accounting oversight board decided to go further than bank regulators had gone. He said he expected the revised audit standard to be easier to comply with, but added: "I am very concerned that no matter what we do in this audit standard, we will not have much impact on audit fees. But it is our intention to do so, in a way that gives investors far more bang for the buck."

Mr. Cox said the commission would propose new rules to provide guidance to companies on how to evaluate internal controls.

And, he said, it is likely to accept the size categories proposed by the small-business advisory committee, even while requiring audits of all companies. For two years, companies with market capitalizations under $75 million would be required to evaluate their own internal controls but not to have the results audited.

Audits would begin in the third year, and continue every year thereafter. But, he said, they would most likely focus on the "suitability of the design of internal controls," noting that in many cases the auditor would in any case have to go beyond those controls to conduct the financial audit.

Somewhat larger companies, with capitalizations of up to $700 million, would also get less expensive audits, he said, although he conceded that details were still up in the air. The S.E.C. hopes to encourage auditors to use the work of others, and work they did in previous years, to reduce current costs, and not to focus on control issues that are unlikely to create problems even if the controls are weak.

The goal, he said, was to "relieve investors of unnecessary costs" while providing "higher-quality risk-based audits that will focus on what is truly material to a company's financial statements."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jefferson, Carter Go On The Attack As New Orleans Runoff Campaign Starts (AP)

By Cain Burdeau

AP, November 9, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, handicapped by an FBI bribery investigation, embarked Wednesday on a monthlong and grueling contest against a young but politically experienced challenger seeking to end his 16-year turn as this city's face in Congress.

State Rep. Karen Carter played up the old-versus-new dynamic at a Wednesday news conference, keying on the hurricane-battered city's recovery.

"We are tomorrow's leaders," she said. "We will stop waiting for someone to save us, because we're going to save ourselves. We're going to stand up for what is still good about New Orleans and embrace new visions and change.

"The torch of leadership is passing — pay attention — it's passing. Change is coming."

"I've heard that before," Jefferson said later at his own news conference. "It took place in a speech in 1960 by President Kennedy. So, it's a time of youth phrase. Right now, it's simply a bunch of catch words."

The eight-term congressman faces his toughest political test yet as he attempts to energize a base of supporters cast afar by Hurricane Katrina.

Jefferson, 59, won about 30 percent of the vote in the multiparty primary Tuesday, outpacing 12 challengers lured into the race because of his vulnerability stemming from the FBI bribery investigation into his African business dealings.

Carter, 37, got about 22 percent of the vote, finishing second to earn a spot in the Dec. 9 runoff. But analysts said Jefferson's showing was poor for an incumbent.

"We can assume that the voters who voted for other candidates will not vote for Jefferson" in the runoff, said Susan Howell, a political analyst at the University of New Orleans.

"At this point, frankly, it's Karen Carter's to lose," said Larry Powell, a politics professor at Tulane University. "She has a lot of corn-fed earnestness about her and she will be attractive."

Both candidates are black. Carter drew from a more diverse crowd of voters, analysts said. Jefferson received nearly 72 percent of his roughly 27,700 votes in predominantly black precincts, according to an analysis by Edward Chervenak, a politics professor at the University of New Orleans.

Carter found her votes in both predominantly white and black precincts and she had a strong showing in more racially mixed neighborhoods, Chervenak said.

Jefferson said he will seek to shore up the black vote by canvassing in the heavily populated West Bank, which was not struck by Katrina's flood waters, and traveling to Atlanta, Houston and other places where people were displaced.

Carter said she will strive to keep her "gumbo" of political allies — whites, blacks, Republican backers — intact while attempting to draw in people who voted for the 11 other candidates in the primary.

Jefferson's legal troubles — including allegations in an FBI affidavit that he hid bribe money in a freezer — came to light shortly before Katrina hit on Aug. 29, 2005. Though he has not been charged with a crime, the allegations led to his loss of a spot on the House Ways and Means Committee.

The scandal has hurt the city's recovery efforts, Carter charged at her morning news conference.

A few hours later a tired-looking Jefferson, flanked by his wife, a minister and trade union representatives, touted his record in Congress and declared his re-election bid alive and well.

"Seventy-nine percent of the people haven't voted for her," he said. "By miles I'm better able to do the job."

Carter, Jefferson Gear Up For Runoff (NOTP)

By Frank Donze, And Michelle Krupa%%par%%staff Writers

New Orleans Times-Picayune, November 9, 2006

They must scramble to plug vote gaps

Conventional political wisdom says that a congressman who lands in a runoff, particularly after 16 years in office, should seriously consider cleaning out his desk.

For U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, the adage may be even more apropos, given that Hurricane Katrina scattered much of his traditional voter base last year just as FBI agents were ramping up their federal bribery probe into his business dealings in Africa.

But maybe not.

A day after running ahead of 12 challengers with 30 percent of the vote in Tuesday's 2nd Congressional District primary, the New Orleans Democrat wasn't talking like someone preparing to pack up.

In fact, his voice hoarse from weeks of nonstop campaigning, Jefferson said he is looking forward to the Dec. 9 runoff with state Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans, who finished second with 22 percent.

Asked to comment on Carter's election-night observation that 70 percent of the electorate rejected him Tuesday, the eight-term incumbent noted that nearly eight in 10 voters in the district "haven't voted for her either."

As for Carter's call for a passing of the torch "to a new generation of leadership," Jefferson said, "It's a time-used phrase. "But right now it's simply just a bunch of catchwords. I don't know that one ought to pass off an effective, active leader for someone who has some philosophical notion that there ought to be a passing of the torch."

But political observers say the situation he finds himself in is less than ideal.

"He got 30 percent. For an incumbent, that's terrible," said Ed Renwick, director of Loyola University's Institute of Politics.

But Renwick noted that Carter has work to do if she is to replace Jefferson as the representative of a district that spans Orleans and Jefferson parishes.

Votes up for grabs

A precinct analysis of the election results by University of New Orleans political scientist Ed Chervenak, who broke down the vote by race, reveals the challenges that lie ahead for both candidates.

Jefferson, the numbers show, will have to expand his African-American base, much of which remains displaced more than a year after the storm. In addition, he must pick up support from voters who chose one of two West Bank Democrats -- state Sen. Derrick Shepherd of Marrero or former New Orleans City Councilman Troy Carter.

Carter, who fared well among white voters, is likely to pick up the lion's share of support that went to lawyer Joe Lavigne, a white New Orleans Republican who finished fourth on the strength of numbers that rivaled Carter's in majority white precincts.

"Republicans are going to vote for Karen Carter. There's no doubt," UNO political scientist Susan Howell said. "And they're going to turn out to vote. If you're going to vote the anti-corruption ticket, she's the reform candidate."

Meanwhile, Carter also must improve her numbers among black voters and, to a larger degree, across Jefferson Parish, where she failed to win a single precinct. As expected, Shepherd led the way in his home parish with 34 percent.

Though Jefferson Parish residents across most of the West Bank and a sliver of south Kenner comprised only about a third of the 91,000 voters who cast ballots Tuesday, their influence will be crucial in the runoff, political observers said.

The other candidates

Almost 70 percent of suburban ballots went to candidates other than Jefferson and Karen Carter.

The bulk -- more than 10,000 of 31,381 votes -- were won by Shepherd, who enjoyed widespread backing from the Jefferson Parish political establishment, which seized on his candidacy as its best chance to exploit New Orleans' reduced population and send a Jeffersonian to represent the 2nd District.

Also in the mix was Algiers resident Troy Carter, who failed to win a significant number of precincts but nevertheless surpassed Karen Carter in his Jefferson Parish take. Lavigne, meanwhile, earned nearly as many suburban votes as Troy Carter and Karen Carter combined.

All those votes are now up for grabs, and they could provide a substantial boost to Karen Carter to tip the scales in her favor, Chervenak said.

"One of the wild cards is Shepherd," he said. "He does very well in the white precincts in Jefferson Parish, and he does well in the heavily black precincts as well. The key is whether Karen Carter can tap into the Derrick Shepherd/Troy Carter vote, especially in heavily white precincts."

Shepherd did not return calls Wednesday, and it is unclear whether he intends to endorse a candidate in the runoff.

But at an unusual joint session of the Jefferson Parish Council and the New Orleans City Council aimed at fostering regional unity, several top suburban politicians who backed Shepherd in the primary suggested Wednesday that they may stay out of the runoff. Their neutrality could well be viewed as a tacit endorsement of the sitting congressman.

A Jefferson victory, of course, would give the incumbent two more years in Congress, during which he could be indicted in the federal bribery case. Such a scenario has the potential to lead to a special election to fill the seat.

In one gambit being discussed among Jefferson Parish power brokers, Shepherd then would get the chance to run again, giving Jefferson Parish another shot at installing a native son to represent them in the 2nd District.

Treatment of evacuees

Parish President Aaron Broussard said the "chess pieces" are still in play regarding an across-the-board runoff endorsement by the Jefferson Parish guard.

He said Karen Carter's comments to Spike Lee in the filmmaker's Katrina documentary could be a liability with suburban voters. Carter labeled as unjust, inhumane and un-American the decision by Jefferson Parish law enforcement leaders to block New Orleans evacuees from walking across the Crescent City Connection in an effort to flee the devastated city.

"My observation is there is a friction factor between a number of segments and their experience in dealing with Karen Carter," he said, adding that the conflict went beyond the bridge debate to incidents in the Legislature. He would not be specific.

Meanwhile, Sheriff Harry Lee, who endorsed Troy Carter in the primary, railed against Karen Carter on Wednesday. Lee said he would not support Jefferson in light of his reduced effectiveness since news of the federal probe broke.

But the sheriff said he may work to defeat Carter because of her criticism of his deputies, who he says blocked the bridge to protect property and because there were no supplies or shelter for the evacuees on the West Bank. Evacuees countered that they had no intention of looting, and were simply seeking safety, but were stopped at gunpoint by Jefferson Parish law enforcement officers.

"It's personal between her and me," Lee said. "I'm thinking of getting some people together who she so severely affronted by running her foul mouth. I may spend some money and get the clip of Spike Lee's film and show what she said about those of us on this side of the river."

Carter said she is prepared for a rough-and-tumble runoff, especially in light of the grueling primary in which she said Jefferson and others "tried to distort and slander my record," forcing her to spend money to defend herself on TV and radio.

"I'm armored," she said, "and I'm ready."

Who's backing whom

Carter stuck to her campaign mantra that she would re-establish credibility in the 2nd District. She said her message is bolstered by the political watershed of Tuesday's elections that put Democrats in control of the U.S. House of Representatives. The presumptive Speaker of the House, U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., took to the national airwaves Wednesday promising to clean up Congress' sullied image.

"I expect this to be a discussion about ethics . . . and the statement that Ms. Pelosi made this morning that will be the most open and transparent Congress in the history of this country," Carter said.

Howell said Jefferson is likely to paint Carter as too aligned with white interests by continuing to highlight her connections with the city's two leading Republican power brokers, developer Joe Canizaro and shipbuilder Donald "Boysie" Bollinger, who have pumped money into her campaign.

At the same time, Howell expects Jefferson to try to persuade voters that he alone has the interests of African-American voters at heart, a strategy New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin used effectively in his May re-election bid.

In the mayor's race, however, Nagin was able to play on fears circulating through the diaspora that the city's white elite were actively working to prevent the return of black residents; such anxiety largely has abated. Nagin also was facing a white opponent, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu.

"But when the faces are both African-American, it's much harder to pull that off," Howell said, adding that Carter could defend herself against such claims by pointing to her political pedigree: Her father, Ken Carter, was one of New Orleans' first black property assessors, and she is a long-standing standard-bearer of BOLD, the black political organization based in Central City.

"Nagin didn't have quite the anchor on his back that Jefferson does," pollster Bernie Pinsonat said.

Letten: New Orleans' Future Depends On Tackling Crime, Corruption (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

The city's survival depends on getting a handle on violent crime and corruption and creating opportunities for young people, a federal prosecutor said Wednesday. "And that's a heck of a tall order, but that's something we need to do," Jim Letten said.

Letten, U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana, spoke during a think-tank's briefing series. He was joined by state Supreme Court Justice Catherine Kimball in addressing the rebuilding of New Orleans' criminal justice system after Hurricane Katrina.

The system faces considerable challenges. For example, there's a backlog of court cases; the chief of trials for the Orleans public defender's office has asked for additional resources, saying constitutional rights of defendants are being violated; and a depleted police force has been dealing with violent crime.

Last month, a district court judge ordered that four inmates be released and their trials postponed until the defender's office can adequately represent them.

Kimball told the Bureau of Governmental Research breakfast there were problems with the system long before the August 2005 storm, particularly in how the city and state funded it. Court fines and fees have helped fund programs, but Katrina, which sharply reduced the city's population, exposed problems with relying on that, she said.

Over the last 14 years, the Supreme Court has funded "considerable programs," including juvenile justice programs, for New Orleans, because the city hasn't taken the initiative, she said. "How that goes about changing, I don't know."

Mayor Ray Nagin, in his 2007 budget proposal, listed public safety and bolstering the police department as priorities. A budget must be approved by Dec. 1.

Kimball and Letten, attending the breakfast meeting with members of the City Council and the police chief, said funding alone won't fix the problems the city faces. Katrina just laid bare problems that have existed in the community for years, Letten said. There are now concentrations of "disenfranchised" residents, and people with guns, in areas like New Orleans' Central City and Jefferson Parish, "rampantly killing each other," Letten said. Police are doing the best they can, he said.

"It's not going to be tomorrow that we solve this; it's not going to be next week or next year," said Letten, who serves on a task force on rebuilding the system with Kimball and others. But unless nonpolitical decisions are made - and money is put where it's needed - "we're not even going to get the ball rolling."

"The survival of this town depends on getting a handle on violent crime, corruption, so we can keep and attract industry - diversifying our economy and, for God's sake, building a decent school system so that kids who grow up in public housing, poor neighborhoods and Section 8 housing can get the opportunities they need to actually get jobs and not go into the drug trade," Letten said.

SOUTH-CENTRAL KENTUCKY BUREAU

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), November 9, 2006

FBI agents searched the offices of Knox County Judge-Executive Raymond C. Smith on Wednesday.

Bruce Murphy, Smith's deputy judge-executive, said four agents accompanied by a Kentucky State Police trooper served a search warrant at the office Wednesday morning.

The warrant sought audiotapes and other records concerning fiscal court meetings in 2004 and 2005 and documents related to four companies: Grade All Construction, Partin Construction, BKW Wood Products and Kentucky Phoenix, according to a copy Murphy released to the Herald-Leader.

Those four companies won contracts to provide goods or services to the county, Murphy said.

Smith had an ownership interest with his brother in at least one of the companies, BKW Wood Products. The company won a bid during Smith's term to provide equipment services to the county, Murphy said.

But Murphy said that when Smith took office, he essentially turned the company over to his brother. The warrant could indicate the FBI is investigating bids awarded by the county.

A spokesperson for the agency was not immediately available.

Murphy said there was nothing improper about the contracts related to the four companies. The companies won county business through a competitive, sealed bid process, the deputy judge-executive said.

Murphy said agents searched through records for two to three hours. Smith was not in at the time; they did not ask to see him and did not question anyone before leaving with a variety of records, Murphy said.

A state audit released this year raised questions about $2.7 million in county spending. Smith has said there is no money missing from the county and that it finished the fiscal year in June with a healthy surplus.

Smith, a Democrat, was beaten by a substantial margin in Tuesday's election by Republican J.M. Hall.

Bath Co. Judge Exec Indicted In Vote-Buying Scheme (WTVQ)

By Bennett Haeberle

WTVQ-TV, November 9, 2006

OWINGSVILLE, KY -- Bath County Judge Executive Walter B. Shrout has been indicted on charges he took part in a vote-buying scheme during this year's primary election.

In a federal indictment unsealed Wednesday, Shrout, 54, was charged with conspiracy, making a false statement to a federal agent and obstruction of justice.

Shrout now becomes the 10th person indicted in relation to the vote-buying scheme that started weeks before the May primary.

In the days leading up to the election, prosecutors allege Shrout gave several thousand dollars to five people so they could then use cash to pay would-be voters to vote for Shrout.

Among those given money were: Norman Lewis Crouch, William Mike Butcher, Anthony "Buck" White, Steven R. Crouch and Belinda Crouch. All five were indicted in July, and have since been arraigned on federal charges.

This latest indictment, dated Nov. 3, also states Shrout lied to an FBI investigator last month about being involved in the scheme and offering $100,000 to Steven R. Crouch and Butcher to "keep quiet about his involvement."

Shrout, an incumbent who won Tuesday's midterm election unopposed, defeated Mike Swartz in the May primary. Swartz was also among those indicted on vote fraud charges in July.

In a May interview with Action News 36, Walter Shrout defended some of those indicted, calling them "good people." He also denied having any involvement in the scheme. Calls to his office Wednesday went unreturned, and Shrout failed to show up for FEMA meeting with local administrators. He is scheduled to be arraigned later this month in U.S. District Court in Lexington.

Feds After Clout Sick List (CHIST)

By Fran Spielman And Tim Novak, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, November 9, 2006

A federal grand jury is demanding records from City Hall regarding injury claims of city workers, a move that comes two weeks after the Sun-Times reported Chicago patronage workers claim to be hurt at a rate that exceeds the nation's most dangerous jobs.

Grand jurors have issued a subpoena to the City Council Finance Committee, headed by Ald. Edward M. Burke, seeking an array of records on injured city workers, many who have been off work for years and collecting disability checks.

The subpoenas, according to City Hall sources, demanded that the city turn over:

• A list of all city workers who have been declared to be "permanently and totally disabled" -- a designation that entitles them to disability payments as long as they live, as well as other benefits, including a city pension.

• A copy of a Sept. 11, 2002, memo written by Burke's then-top administrator, Stephen Murray, who, the Sun-Times has reported, suggested several measures to ferret out fraudulent injury claims and cut the city's costs.

• Copies of all workplace-accident reports filed since Jan. 1, 2005.

• Copies of any audits and reviews of City Hall's workers' compensation program.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office declined to comment. A spokesman for Burke said the Finance Committee "will cooperate fully with any requests for documents and/or information."

The Sun-Times' "Clout's Sick List" investigation -- published Oct. 19, 20 and 22 -- reported that one in five patronage workers listed on the once-secret clout list kept by Mayor Daley's former patronage director had filed workers' compensation claims. That injury rate far outpaces those for any occupation tracked by the U.S. Department of Labor, including underground coal miners and foundry workers. Most of those patronage workers had filed at least two claims. Some had filed more than a dozen.

Able-bodied stay at homeThe city has spent more than $38.9 million to resolve 1,719 injury claims filed by those workers; another 708 claims are still pending.

Many of the records sought by the federal subpoenas also were sought by the Sun-Times under the Illinois Freedom of Information Act. But Burke's staff refused to release any records that identified injured city workers.

Under a city ordinance that dates to 1913, the Finance Committee has sole authority to settle injury claims filed by city of Chicago employees. Those claims typically are settled for less than $100,000, though the city never discloses those settlements.

The Sun-Times also reported that the city estimated 91 workers -- including relatives of public officials -- have been deemed able to return to work in less physically demanding jobs but remain off, collecting disability checks worth as much as $40,000 a year, because the Daley administration hasn't found them suitable jobs.

Malvo Apologizes At Md. Sentencing (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Sniper Lee Boyd Malvo offered a tearful apology yesterday to relatives of the six people he and his accomplice killed in Montgomery County, minutes before he was sentenced to six consecutive terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole.

"I'm truly sorry, grieved and ashamed of what I've done to the families and friends," Malvo said as he listed the names of the Montgomery victims he and John Allen Muhammad shot from afar with a powerful rifle in October 2002. "Each of you relive this every morning, every birthday, every anniversary, every time you look in your children's eyes."

A handful of relatives attended the afternoon hearing in Rockville, which marked the last chapter of the snipers' legal proceedings in Maryland.

Malvo said he was most haunted by the death of Ride On bus driver Conrad Johnson, 35, the sniper's last victim. According to Malvo's testimony, his death was the only fatal shooting in Maryland in which Malvo pulled the trigger.

"I thought of his sons, who just for once would like to play basketball with their father," Malvo said. "Just one more time see his face."

Sonia Wills, Johnson's mother, stood a few feet from Malvo in the well of the courtroom, looked into his eyes and spoke in a low, booming voice.

"I must say for the past four years I have hated you," Wills said. "Right now, I, Conrad's mother, forgive you. . . . I have to, my dear. I can't go on hating you. That won't bring Conrad back."

Victoria Snider, sister of sniper victim James L. "Sonny" Buchanan, 39, was more stern.

"I have watched Lee Boyd Malvo express enjoyment of killing, to feeling bad about it, to admitting killing my brother, Sonny, to denying it," she said. "I say to you, Mr. Malvo: You were old enough to know right from wrong."

The other four Montgomery victims were Lori Lewis Rivera, 25; Sarah Ramos, 34; Premkumar A. Walekar, 54; and James D. Martin, 55.

Prosecutors and Malvo's attorneys said Malvo, 21, has experienced a transformation during his months in Maryland. They said his remorse is genuine, and they commended him for cooperating with prosecutors in Muhammad's May trial in Montgomery, in which Malvo took the stand to offer the first public, firsthand account of the shootings.

"Before the Montgomery County trial of Mr. Muhammad, we certainly knew the what," Assistant State's Attorney Vivek Chopra said. "But it was only after Mr. Muhammad's testimony that we knew so much more about the how and the why."

Malvo testified that he fell under the spell of Muhammad as a young and vulnerable teenager who had all but been abandoned by his parents in Jamaica. The elder sniper took him on a cross-country trip in 2002 that began in Washington state, terrorized the District and its suburbs for three weeks in October and ended in suburban Maryland, where they were arrested. Malvo told law enforcement officials in Maryland this year that the pair shot 27 people, 17 of whom died.

Malvo has cooperated with law enforcement officials in recent months to close some of the unresolved cases in jurisdictions outside the Washington area. Last month, he met with detectives from Tucson, who offered him immunity from prosecution in exchange for a detailed account of the slaying of a man shot while playing golf in March 2002.

William C. Brennan, one of Malvo's attorneys, said yesterday that he had been contacted by authorities in another state where the pair are suspects in a homicide. He declined to identify the case but highlighted Malvo's continued willingness to cooperate with law enforcement officials.

Malvo and Muhammad were also convicted of murder in separate trials in Virginia in 2003. Muhammad, who is on death row in Virginia, acted as his own attorney during the month-long Maryland trial, was convicted of six counts of murder and was also given six consecutive life terms. Malvo was sentenced to life in prison in Virginia.

Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan praised Malvo for cooperating with authorities and for apologizing to victims' relatives. He told him that crossing paths with Muhammad had significantly worsened his already bleak prospects.

"You could have been somebody different. You could have been better," Ryan said. "What you are is a convicted murderer. You will think of that for the rest of your life. You knowingly, willfully and voluntarily participated in the cowardly murders of innocent, defenseless human beings."

PI Arrested On Charges Of Defrauding Top Litigation Firms (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, November 9, 2006

Federal law enforcement officials in New York have announced the arrest on wire fraud charges of a Montana private investigator who allegedly defrauded two of Manhattan's top litigation firms by promising to sell them "proof" of misconduct by opposing parties and counsel.

The criminal complaint filed Wednesday by the Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney's Office charged that Michael Lair had approached New York lawyers working on two high-profile cases and received more than $80,000 to provide information he ultimately failed to produce.

Lair, 46, is the president of Bozeman, Mont.-based consumerdefense.com Inc., a company that claims to investigate consumer complaints and conduct research in connection with fraud cases.

The complaint, sworn out by Special Agent B.J. Kang of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, did not identify any matters or lawyers by name, only describing one case as involving a large insurance company engaged in litigation with its former chairman and the other as involving a pharmaceutical company's suit against a hedge fund.

Sources familiar with both matters confirmed that the insurance company case was the dispute between AIG Inc. and its former chairman, Maurice R. Greenberg, and that the hedge fund matter was Biovail Corp.'s securities fraud suit against SAC Capital Management.

The lawyers who dealt with Lair included Robert G. Morvillo of Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason, Anello & Bohrer, which is one of a team of firms representing Greenberg, and Michael J. Bowe of Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman. Morvillo is one of the city's most well-known white-collar litigators and the Kasowitz firm, led by Marc E. Kasowitz, is also regarded as a top litigation shop.

In both cases, prosecutors allege Lair offered to sell one party sensitive information, then turned around and offered to sell the other side the information that their opponents had hired him to perform illegal and unethical acts.

The Morvillo firm paid Lair $75,000 on behalf of Greenberg, whose dispute with AIG centers on his efforts to place AIG clients with his C.V. Starr & Co. group of insurance brokerages. A source familiar with the matter said Lair had offered to provide information about alleged misconduct by PricewaterhouseCoopers, AIG's auditor, but had never provided any information.

According to the criminal complaint, Lair then approached lawyers for AIG and told them he had been hired by the Morvillo firm to hack into AIG's computers to obtain telephone and e-mail records.

The complaint states that a search of documents stored by Lair in Montana provided no evidence that any law firms contacted by Lair had requested he conduct any illegal or unethical conduct.

"On the contrary, the documents I reviewed demonstrated that Lair had reached out on numerous occasions to attorneys involved in highly publicized cases ... with a promise to provide them with existing incriminating evidence in exchange for money," Kang stated in the complaint.

The complaint also states that an individual who used to work for Lair told the FBI that Lair "spent time looking for reports concerning highly publicized cases on the Internet." He would then reportedly ask the companies involved to retain him but would never actually do any work.

Bowe of Kasowitz Benson said Wednesday that Lair had contacted him in March 2006, claiming to have information relevant to Biovail's suit, which charges that SAC Capital, a powerful hedge fund led by Steven A. Cohen, colluded with analysts to publish misleading reports that damaged the pharmaceutical company's stock. Bowe said the firm paid Lair less than $5,000 to cover travel expenses to New York but never received any information and ceased communications with him.

According to the complaint, Lair then tried in September to get SAC Capital's lawyers to pay $50,000 for the "information" that the Kasowitz firm had hired him to hack into computers at SAC Capital. By this time, the FBI had been alerted and Lair's communications with SAC Capital's lawyers were monitored.

Bowe said Wednesday it was not unusual for lawyers in high-profile cases to be approached by dubious individuals claiming to have information. Boies, Schiller & Flexner partner Nicholas A. Gravante echoed that sentiment in a statement issued on behalf of Greenberg's legal team.

"We are cooperating with the government's investigation." Gravante said. "Lair held himself out as an investigator who could help lawyers assemble facts necessary to defend their clients' interests. Although hiring investigative firms is routine practice in complex cases, in this case Lair failed to honor his obligations."

Both SAC Capital and AIG are represented by the firm of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison but lawyers at the firm declined to comment on the matter Wednesday.

Lair, who was expected to present himself today in federal court in Montana, could not be reached for comment. If convicted, he faces up to a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Ex-Penn Prof Charged With Child Porn (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

PHILADELPHIA — A former University of Pennsylvania business professor who was previously convicted in a teen sex sting was indicted Wednesday on charges he produced and distributed child pornography.

Lawrence Scott Ward, 64, was arrested in August as he returned from Brazil through Washington Dulles International Airport.

Federal authorities who searched his laptop computer said it contained a video of young children engaged in sexual activity. They also said they found videos showing the defendant involved in sex acts with teenage boys.

The three-count indictment charges that Ward produced, imported, and possessed child pornography. His arraignment was set for Thursday in Virginia.

Ward's attorney, Peter Greenspun, did not immediately return a telephone call seeking comment. He previously called the government's case "horribly weak."

Ward was convicted in 1999 of soliciting sex from a Pennsylvania state trooper posing as a 15-year-old male prostitute, a prosecutor said at Ward's recent bail hearing.

Mobsters Would Call Reality TV Show 'Throwing Up Gotti' (NYS)

By Jerry Capeci

New York Sun, November 9, 2006

It was the week before Christmas in 2004. There was food and wine on the table and an FBI bug hidden underneath. A trio of veteran wiseguys was trashing a reality TV show that struck close to their hearts, "Growing Up Gotti," the saga of John Gotti's racy, platinum blonde daughter, Victoria, and her three teenage sons, dubbed "Hotti Gottis" for their well-gelled good looks.

"It's a soap opera, and the kids look like girls," the host, Genovese capo Ciro Perrone, 85, thundered. He is owner of a popular Italian restaurant in Ozone Park, Don Peppe, where the men regularly gathered at a big round table in the back for dinner and discussion.

"It's one of the most disgusting, insulting shows" on television, the aging capo's longtime right-hand-man, John Yannucci, said, according to a report about the discussion written by FBI agent John Penza.

Colombo soldier Ralph Scopo, a close Howard Beach pal of the late Gambino boss, was "so embarrassed" for his late friend's family that he said he couldn't talk about it, Mr. Penza wrote in an affidavit that was filed last year with the federal judge who approved the bugging.

Worse, Scopo noted, the Gotti boys in the show were incomprehensible. "The kids can't even talk," he said.

In fact, the vocabulary and diction of sons John, Carmine, and Frank was so poor that A&E ultimately resorted to subtitles to help viewers figure out what they were saying.

The wiseguys, of course, weren't alone in their distaste. The conversation took place on December 14, two days after the New York Post's Phil Mushnick wrote in his "Prime Time" column that "you don't have to be Italian to be offended" by the crude, vulgar, and negative stereotypes that fueled "Growing Up Gotti."

Federal Grand Jury Charges Ex-Muvico Worker (MH)

By Patrick Danner

The Miami Herald, November 9, 2006

Fort Lauderdale-based Muvico Theaters' former information-technology director faces a federal charge of sabotaging the movie-chain's ticketing-sales system last spring on the opening weekend of Mission Impossible III.

Joseph Harlen Shook, 36, of Broward County, was charged in a one-count grand jury indictment of hacking Muvico's computer system to disrupt ticket sales in May -- which the company says cost it about $100,000.

Shook could face up to 10 years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000 if convicted. Shook couldn't be reached for comment.

Shook worked for Muvico for nearly three years, the last as its director of information technology. But Shook was dismissed in February as part of some cutbacks, according to Muvico spokesman John Spano.

"We're really happy that justice has been served," Spano said.

Shook made an initial appearance Wednesday in federal court but did not enter a plea and was released on $100,000 bail, the Associated Press reported.

Muvico had said its computer system was disrupted at 5:55 p.m. on May 5, a Friday, paralyzing the operations of the 233-screen chain. It was unable to sell tickets either online or by credit card at six theaters, according to the indictment.

AFFECTED THEATERS

The theaters affected were in Davie, Boca Raton, West Palm Beach, St. Petersburg, Tampa and Hanover, Md., the five-page indictment reads. The incident happened during what the chain says is its busiest time of the year.

Shook is accused of using a wireless-networking adapter to gain access to Muvico's computer system. The investigation was conducted by the FBI.

In an unrelated case, another former Muvico employee was arrested in December by the Broward Sheriff's Office on two felony counts of computer-related offenses against the company.

Spano said the former employee took a plea and is on probation.

RECENT TURMOIL

Muvico has faced considerable turmoil in recent months and has been at the center of lawsuits and countersuits. Its founder and chief executive, Hamid Hashemi, was fired in January. Hashemi and his wife then sued the privately held theater chain, claiming he was ousted in a power struggle with Muvico's new owners.

The company, however, said he was fired because of malfeasance.

In court documents, Muvico accused Hashemi of submitting personal expenses with no apparent business purpose, using company resources and funds for personal benefit and placing people on the payroll and health plan who didn't work for the company.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge: Group Can Subpoena White House (AP-Y)

AP, November 9, 2006

A federal magistrate judge has ruled that a reproductive rights group can seek White House e-mails and other documents as part of its lawsuit promoting broader access to the morning-after pill.

The ruling by Viktor Pohorelsky allows the Center for Reproductive Rights to subpoena more than three years of Plan B-related communications between the White House's domestic policy office and select Food and Drug Administration officials. The documents include e-mails, letters and records of conversations.

The group sued the FDA seeking to lift all age restrictions on nonprescription sales of the Plan B emergency contraceptive pills. It seeks the documents to determine whether the White House interfered with the FDA's handling of a request by manufacturer Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. to allow over-the-counter sales.

The ruling issued Monday but disclosed Wednesday rejected a government effort to block the group from trying to subpoena the records.

Pohorelsky also allowed the group to take testimony from Dr. Sandra Kweder, deputy director of the FDA's office of new drugs, and Jay Lefkowitz, a former White House domestic policy aide.

Former FDA Commissioner Mark McClellan said in an earlier deposition that he gave Lefkowitz "occasional updates" on Barr's Plan B application, according to a transcript released by the group.

In August, the FDA said it would let women 18 and older buy Plan B without a prescription, but younger women would still need a doctor's note. Barr expects pharmacies nationwide to begin selling the pills over the counter to adults by the middle of November.

The morning-after pill is a high dose of the most common ingredient in regular birth control pills. When taken within 72 hours of unprotected sex, the two-pill series can lower the risk of pregnancy by up to 89 percent.

High Court Weighs Ban On Late-Term Abortions (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- One day after voters in three states rejected ballot measures to restrict abortions, the Supreme Court took up the Bush administration's appeal to reinstate the first federal ban of a specific abortion procedure.

Three federal appeals courts struck down the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, finding it violated a five-to-four Supreme Court opinion in 2000 that invalidated a similar Nebraska law because it made no exception to preserve the woman's health. Solicitor General Paul Clement told the justices that Congress had avoided the flaws of the Nebraska statute, by making official findings that the procedure was never medically necessary and defining the procedure itself more specifically.

WSJ reporter Jess Bravin2 discusses arguments in today's Supreme Court hearing on partial birth abortions, including what are the issues in the case and the potential impact of Tuesday's elections. MORE

• Abortion Foes Face Pair of Big Tests3

11/8/06

• Plus, read the case docket4 in Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood and the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 20035, provided by FindLaw6.

But the biggest change may have been on the court, where antiabortion activists hope two Bush appointees will uphold restrictions on the procedure and, perhaps someday, an outright ban. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who voted with the majority in the 2000 Nebraska case, has since retired, and her successor, Justice Samuel Alito, brings a record of skepticism toward abortion-rights arguments. Justice Alito said nothing through two hours of arguments yesterday. The other Bush appointee, Chief Justice John Roberts, vigorously questioned lawyers for both sides, as he typically does.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, one of the dissenters in 2000, asked probing questions of both sides, suggesting concerns the federal law may overreach and prohibit procedures that could be medically necessary. That could portend another fractured court opinion.

Mr. Clement argued that the federal ban, signed by President Bush after two similar bills passed by a Republican-controlled Congress were vetoed by President Clinton, draws a "bright line" between lawful abortions, where fetal demise is induced in the uterus, and those where it takes place "when the living fetus is over halfway outside of the womb." Safe alternatives were always available, he said, so the measure would not deter a single abortion, but rather abolish an aberrant practice favored by a minority of physicians.

But those facts were disputed by several justices, who pointed out that lower courts, after exhaustive hearings, had established no medical consensus on the procedure and that some of Congress' findings were inaccurate.

Justice David Souter said the government's position required the court to overrule its 2000 opinion or overrule the lower courts' finding on the medical evidence, or conclude that when courts and Congress find different facts, Congress is right. "Which of the three do we take?" he asked.

"Well, we would urge you to take any one of them," Mr. Clement said.

With Tuesday's election results, the court may be the best opportunity for abortion foes to restrict the procedure. Voters in California and Oregon rejected measures requiring parental notification before pregnant minors could obtain abortions, while South Dakotans repealed a law the Legislature adopted that banned all abortions except when the woman's life is in jeopardy.

Justices Have Pointed Abortion Discourse (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Supreme Court justices Wednesday sharply questioned attorneys on both sides of the legal battle over what opponents call partial-birth abortions as the high court weighed whether to uphold Congress's ban on the procedure.

In an intense morning of arguments, lawyers for the Bush administration and supporters of abortion rights gave starkly contrasting views: A law passed by Congress labels it a gruesome and inhumane practice. Supporters argue that such abortions in the second trimester of pregnancy sometimes are the safest for women.

A man in the audience began shouting midway through the proceedings, disrupting the hearing briefly before police dragged him away.

Seven justices took part in questioning both sides about whether the court should defer to congressional findings that these abortions are never medically necessary. Abortion advocates disagree, saying there is strong medical evidence to the contrary.

Full ImageJustice Samuel Alito, hearing his first abortion cases since joing the court earlier this year, sat silently through two hours of arguments. Justice Clarence Thomas was sick and did not attend, Chief Justice John Roberts announced.

"We have no evidence in the record" as to how often such a situation arises? Roberts asked.

"No, your honor," replied attorney Priscilla Smith, who argued for striking down the federal law.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg questioned the rationale that abortion opponents are using in the case, pointing out that the assertion that partial-birth abortion is a particularly gruesome procedure also could apply to the most commonly used method of abortion in the second trimester.

"I don't think so, Justice Ginsburg," Solicitor General Paul Clement replied.

"I just don't think the record supports" that notion, Clement responded.

At issue is the fate of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, which Congress passed and President Bush signed into law in 2003.

Six federal courts on both coasts and in the Midwest have struck down the law as an impermissible restriction on a woman's constitutional right to an abortion that the Supreme Court established in its landmark Roe v. Wade ruling in 1973.

A day earlier, abortion was on several state ballots. In South Dakota, voters repealed a state law that virtually outlaws abortions, an issue that itself could end up before the court.

(AP) A line forms outside the Supreme Court in Washington, Wednesday, Nov. 8, 2006 where the court will...

Full ImageCalifornia and Oregon voters rejected measures that would have required that teenagers get their parents' consent before having an abortion.

A long line of people hoping for a seat inside stretched across the court's plaza hours before the session was to begin. Dozens of people camped through a rainy night in Washington to ensure their place near the head of the line.

Partial-birth abortion is not a medical term, but abortion opponents say it accurately describes "a rarely used and gruesome late-term abortion procedure that resembles infanticide," as Solicitor General Paul Clement said in court papers. Clement will argue the case for the administration.

Abortion-rights proponents dispute almost every aspect of the government's case, including the name for the procedure. They say the law has a much broader reach than the government claims and would threaten almost all abortions that take place after the third month of pregnancy.

Doctors most often refer to the procedure as a dilation and extraction or an intact dilation and evacuation abortion. It involves partially extracting a fetus from the uterus, then cutting or crushing its skull.

Full ImageThe procedure appears to take place most often in the middle third of pregnancy. There are a few thousand such abortions, according to rough estimates, out of more than 1.25 million abortions in the United States annually. Ninety percent of all abortions occur in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, and are not at issue.

By a 5-4 vote, the court invalidated a similar law in Nebraska in 2000 because it encompassed other abortion methods and did not contain an exception that would allow the procedure to preserve a woman's health, an underpinning of Supreme Court abortion rulings.

Two things have changed in the past six years, the composition of the court and Congress' involvement in the issue by tailoring a law to overcome the objections raised by justices in the Nebraska case.

Abortion opponents are optimistic the court will uphold the law because Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, part of the majority in the 2000 case, has retired and her place was taken by Justice Samuel Alito.

Bush appointed both Roberts and Alito, and most legal analysts believe that neither man will be especially supportive of abortion rights.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, the court's swing voter following O'Connor's departure, dissented so strongly in the Nebraska case that many court observers believe he is unlikely to switch sides.

The cases are Gonzales v. Carhart, 05-380, and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, 05-1382.

Justices Hear Arguments On Late-Term Abortion (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — There were moments on Wednesday, during Supreme Court arguments on a federal law that bans a disputed method of abortion, that the proceedings seemed more like a medical school seminar than an appellate argument.

Such familiar constitutional concepts as the right to privacy were not mentioned during the two hours, but the methods doctors use to dilate a pregnant woman’s cervix were discussed in detail, repeatedly.

What exactly was the procedure that the law, the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, sought to prohibit, the justices wanted to know. When, if ever, was the procedure necessary? What would be the impact of banning it? What alternatives were available to women seeking second-trimester abortions and to doctors performing them?

Among the justices most interested in the medical details was the one whom both sides consider most likely to be in a position to control the outcome, Anthony M. Kennedy.

Justice Kennedy's questioning suggested that he had not made up his mind, despite his strongly worded dissenting opinion when the court struck down Nebraska's version of the federal law six years ago, and despite his obvious distaste for the procedure at issue. Instead, his questions suggested that he remained open to persuasion that the law placed doctors in legal jeopardy and imposed an unconstitutional burden on their patients' right to terminate their pregnancies.

One example was his response to the assertion by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement that it was never necessary for doctors to use the banned procedure because a more common procedure, one not covered by the statute, "has been well tested and works every single time as a way to terminate the pregnancy."

Justice Kennedy responded: "Well, but there is a risk if the uterine wall is compromised by cancer or some forms of pre-eclampsia and it's very thin. There's a risk of being punctured."

His comment reflected arguments that the doctors challenging the law have made. They say that "partial-birth abortion" — known medically as both "intact dilation and evacuation" and "D and X," for dilation and extraction — is often safer because the removal of an intact fetus avoids injury to the uterus. The more common method of second-trimester abortion, in which the fetus is dismembered, can leave behind bone fragments.

Whether Justice Kennedy was eventually persuaded remained unclear. In some respects, the arguments were as interesting for what did not occur as for what did.

For example, no member of the court appeared particularly interested in the plaintiffs' effort to depict the federal law as a violation of the separation of powers and a threat to the "independence of the judiciary," as Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights, described it. Ms. Smith's point was that, since the court held in the Nebraska decision that a ban on the procedure must include a health exception, Congress should not be permitted to defy the court by failing to provide such an exception.

Ms. Smith represented doctors who successfully challenged the law in Federal District Court in Nebraska and before the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis. That case is Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380. Eve C. Gartner, a senior staff attorney at Planned Parenthood, represented the clinics that successfully challenged the law in the federal courts in California. That case is Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382. The Bush administration appealed the two rulings to the Supreme Court.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not ask any questions during the arguments. As the successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who voted with the 5-to-4 majority in the Nebraska case, Justice Alito is obviously in a position to play a central role. Justice Antonin Scalia, who can usually be counted on to carry the anti-abortion side of the argument, appeared unusually disengaged, limiting his intervention to a few comments.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., on the other hand, was active throughout the arguments. At times, he appeared to be trying to bolster the defense of the statute by the solicitor general. At other times, the chief justice appeared eager to find differences between the federal law and the Nebraska law. Differences in the way the state and federal laws defined the procedure could be the basis for a decision that upholds the federal law without disavowing a recent precedent.

Solicitor General Clement urged the justices to defer to the findings Congress made when it passed the law, including that the procedure is never medically necessary. "Those determinations should be upheld as long as they represent reasonable inferences based on substantial evidence in the Congressional record," Mr. Clement said, adding that "that standard is amply satisfied here."

Justice John Paul Stevens challenged the solicitor general. "Are not some of the findings by Congress clearly erroneous?" he asked. Justice Stevens gave the example of a finding that no medical schools provide instruction in the procedure, while in fact, a number of medical schools do teach it.

"I think the district court could effectively undermine that one finding," Mr. Clement conceded.

With the court's precedents requiring that abortion restrictions include an exception for medical necessity, the outcome of these cases may depend on how the majority defines necessity. There was considerable discussion of whether the procedure's safety advantage was "significant" or only "marginal" and there was a constitutional difference between the two.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who wrote the court's decision in the Nebraska case, asked whether the court might rule that the procedure could be used "only where appropriate medical opinion finds it necessary." Justice Breyer added: "Now, if Congress is right, there will be no such case, so it's no problem. But if Congress is wrong, then the doctor will be able to perform the procedure and Congress couldn't object."

No Pointers To Ruling In Abortion Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Two hours of oral argument on a federal "partial birth" abortion ban at the Supreme Court yesterday showed that the justices are intensely focused on the procedure's medical details and health implications -- but produced few clues as to how they might rule.

As expected, the court's four most liberal members, Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, sounded skeptical about the statute. Of the court's conservatives, only Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said much at all, asking questions that implied the law should be upheld.

That left plenty of time for Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, whom both sides in the case consider the likely swing vote, to listen to the lawyers and air his concerns -- though he did not tip his hand.

At one point, Kennedy, who dissented when the court struck down a similar state ban in 2000, repeated a concern he voiced in that case. "Your argument," he told Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for doctors challenging the law, "is that there is always a constitutional right to use what the physician thinks is the safest procedure."

But later, Kennedy expressed worry that the federal ban might leave some women at "risk if the uterine wall is compromised by cancer or some forms of preeclampsia," a dangerous spike in blood pressure.

Such health questions are central to the most important abortion case to reach the court in half a decade.

The federal law, passed by Congress and signed by President Bush in 2003, bans the procedure known medically as "intact dilation and extraction," which usually occurs in the second trimester of pregnancy. It generally involves the breech delivery of a fetus, followed by the collapsing of its skull to permit removal. The term "partial birth abortion" is preferred by opponents of the procedure.

The ban does not apply when a woman's life is at risk, but Congress made no exception to preserve a woman's health. Abortion rights advocates say this omission is unconstitutional under the 2000 Supreme Court ruling. All lower federal courts to consider the matter have agreed, so the law has not yet been enforced.

But Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, defending the law, told the court yesterday that Congress properly found that "partial birth abortions were never medically necessary, and that safe alternatives were always available such that no woman would be prevented from terminating her pregnancy."

As a result, he said, Congress had authority to ban what he called "a particularly gruesome procedure that blurred the line between abortion and infanticide."

That argument drew a sharp response from Stevens, who noted that the alternative procedure, dilation and evacuation, requires the dismemberment of the fetus before removal. "Congress has made the judgment that it is far preferable to ensure that fetal demise takes place before any delivery begins," Stevens noted sardonically. "That's the big issue."

"The basic point of this statute is to draw a bright line between a procedure that induces fetal demise in utero and one where the lethal act occurs when the child or the fetus, whichever you want to call it, is more than halfway outside of the mother's womb," Clement replied.

Clement said that Congress is entitled to legislate the distinction. "The one is abortion," he said. "The other is murder."

But Smith noted that there is no such bright line because doctors performing dilation and evacuation sometimes bring out a fetus up to the midsection while trying to dismember it in utero.

Depicting the federal ban as a direct challenge to the court's authority, Smith told the court, "The only course here that preserves independence of the judiciary, that exemplifies the importance of [settled precedent], not to mention the only course that will protect women from needless risks of uterine perforation, infertility, sepsis and hemorrhage, is to hold this act unconstitutional."

The most dramatic moment of the morning came moments later, at about 10:40 a.m., when a loud voice cried out from the back of the courtroom.

"Abortion is the shedding of innocent blood!" shouted a man later identified by the court as Rives Miller Grogan, 40, of Los Angeles. He was immediately tackled and dragged out by Supreme Court police, who charged him with violating a federal law against disrupting court sessions, as well as with offenses related to resisting arrest.

Grogan's protest, the first such incident in recent memory at the court, momentarily stunned the spectators and justices and interrupted Smith, who was explaining that Congress's findings that the procedure is never medically necessary were "simply unreasonable" and so thoroughly contradicted by medical experts as to carry no legal weight.

Roberts challenged that claim, asking Smith if the "marginal benefit in safety" from using the procedure is "enough to override the state's articulated interest?"

Smith responded that doctors have testified "that the reduction in risk" from using the procedure is "significant."

Kennedy had earlier asked Smith how often in practice such risks arose, but she conceded that there were no statistics.

As if to reinforce Kennedy's concern on that point, Roberts returned to it several times during the argument, telling Smith at one point that "we don't have any record evidence about how often the complications arise, so it's hard to get a handle on exactly what the difference is in terms of safety."

High Court Hears Cases On Ban Of Abortion Method (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Bush administration lawyer urged the Supreme Court on Wednesday to uphold the nation's first criminal ban on an abortion method, saying so-called partial-birth abortions are "too close to infanticide" and not a medical necessity.

Safe alternatives are always available, U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said in defending a law passed by Congress in 2003.

But two abortion-rights advocates argued that the ban, if put into effect, would unwisely limit the options of doctors who perform abortions in the second trimester and would expose some pregnant women to more dangerous surgery.

These doctors believe that the procedure medically known as dilation and extraction, or D&X — in which the fetus is removed intact — "reduces the risk of serious complications," including bleeding and infection in the uterus, said Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights in New York.

"What Congress has done here is take away from women the option of what may be the safest procedure for her," said Eve Gartner, a lawyer for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

The case could prove a turning point for the Supreme Court on abortion. With the arrival of President Bush's two conservative appointees, there appears to be a five-vote majority, including Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, to uphold stricter regulation of abortion.

Six years ago when the court struck down a Nebraska ban on the practice, Kennedy wrote an impassioned dissent, describing D&X as "abhorrent."

Abortion-rights advocates hope he will switch sides. But Wednesday, Kennedy suggested that the disputed procedure might be "purely elective and not medically necessary."

New Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. said nothing. But he and Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. have been counted as likely to uphold the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act.

The measure, a proud achievement of Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress, coincidentally came before the court the day after its prime sponsor Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) went down to defeat and the GOP lost control of Congress.

Most of the two-hour argument Wednesday was about the scope of the law, which would ban a procedure used only after the 16th week of pregnancy. Critics call it "partial-birth" abortion because doctors extract the living fetus partway from the uterus, then collapse its skull before pulling the fetus the rest of the way out.

Minimizing the law's impact, Clement described D&X as a "very aberrant, atypical procedure" and said a ban would affect "a very small minority of second-trimester abortions."

Most such abortions use "dilation and evacuation," or D&E, in which the fetus is dismembered in the uterus before it is removed.

Moreover, a doctor who planned to remove the fetus intact could "induce fetal demise at the outset" — injecting it with a drug to stop its heart — without violating the law, Clement said, because the fetus would emerge dead.

Some medical experts, however, say such injections pose too great a risk of exposing the woman to a deadly chemical.

Even if the law is upheld, Clement said, doctors can go to court and ask for an exception that "focuses on particular medical conditions" that call for the D&X procedure.

Several liberal justices objected during the argument to talk of "infanticide." They stressed that most second-trimester abortions involved fetuses that could not live on their own.

Some "are only 4 or 5 inches long. They are very different from fully formed babies," Justice John Paul Stevens said.

"So anything about infanticide, babies, all that, is just beside the point because what this bans is a method of abortion," added Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Clement refused to back down. Congress was interested in "maintaining a bright line between abortion and infanticide," he said.

Once a fetus emerged alive from the uterus, if it were killed, "I think we'd call that murder," he added.

The two lawyers arguing against the law sought to portray its reach as broad. They stressed that the ban does not use medical terms, such as D&X or D&E.

It could "place doctors at risk of prosecution" for D&E abortions if they removed a large part of the fetus, said Gartner, Planned Parenthood's lawyer. Rather than banning only one procedure, the law could ban the most common second-trimester procedure, she said.

Roberts disagreed. What counts is the doctor's intent, he said. A doctor who intends to do a D&E "wouldn't be covered by this law," he said.

Roberts conceded the D&X procedure might have "a marginal impact on safety" for patients, but he questioned whether that should be enough to strike down the entire law.

Smith replied that medical experts said the issue went well beyond marginal benefits.

"The reduction in risk is significant," she said, saying the D&X method "reduces the risk of serious complications, such as uterine perforation, which … lead to hysterectomies and infertility."

After Congress passed the law, judges in San Francisco, New York and Omaha barred it from taking effect. The Supreme Court heard the government's appeal in two cases Wednesday and will issue a ruling in several months.

Supreme Court Abortion Hearing Disrupted (SH)

By Hannah Guillaume

Scripps Howard, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A screaming man charged through the main doors of the Supreme Court's chambers during a hearing in a contentious abortion case Wednesday.

"Abortion is a sin," shouted the man, later identified by court officials as Rives Miller Grogan. Four court employees dragged him out of the courtroom.

Grogan's last known residence is in Los Angeles. He was taken to the U.S. Capitol Booking Center before being transported to D.C. Superior Court.

He was charged with creating a noise disturbance, resisting arrest and other related offenses, a Supreme Court spokesman said.

Some spectators left their seats and headed toward the door. None of the justices said anything about the disturbance. Such disturbances are rare in the well-guarded court chamber. Court regulars said the last one they remembered was in1983 when Hustler publisher Larry Flynt shouted obscenities during a hearing in his own case.

In less than a minute, the lawyer who had been speaking resumed her remarks, although the man's screams could still be heard in the hallway.

The court was hearing two abortion cases, Gonzales v. Carhart and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, both challenging the constitutionality of the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

Opponents argue the law is invalid because it does not allow an exemption to preserve a woman's health. It does contain an exemption to preserve a woman's life.

Justices Anthony Kennedy and Stephen Breyer asked the most questions during the two-hours of argument. Both asked about possible harm to women because of the lack of a health exemption.

Kennedy voted to uphold Nebraska's late term abortion law in 2000, even though it did not contain a health exemption. The court ruled the law unconstitutional for that reason. Kennedy is thought to be a likely swing vote in the cases argued Wednesday.

Since that decision, the court's frequent swing vote, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, has retired and two new conservative justices have joined the court.

Breyer asked technical questions about the procedure and the statute's language.

Kennedy said, "It doesn't make sense to say there is an alternative procedure if you can't get access to it."

Representing Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Solicitor General Paul Clement argued the law would not affect a woman's health or her right to choose an abortion.

Lawyers for Dr. Leroy Carhart and Planned Parenthood argued that banning "intact dilation and extraction" abortions will endanger women's lives and limit their ability to choose.

In adopting the law, Congress heard from medical experts and issued findings that a ban would not harm women's health.

Lawyer Eve Gartner, representing Planned Parenthood, said Congress' findings were inaccurate. She said women need to make decisions about procedures with their doctors, not with the slow-moving courts.

She and Carhart's lawyer listed health concerns not raised during congressional hearings, including death, kidney disease and liver disease.

Justice Clarence Thomas was not in court because he was ill, Chief Justice John Roberts said. Thomas is expected to vote in the case. A decision is expected by next summer.

Voting Booth Glitches Show Where Fixes Needed Ahead (USAT)

By Richard Wolf, Usa Today

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — As a dress rehearsal for the 2008 presidential election, Tuesday's experiences at the nation's 183,000 polling places succeeded by failing.

Where voters encountered balky equipment, it pointed up the need to examine paper trails and other methods for verifying their votes.

Where voters weren't helped by struggling poll workers, it illuminated the need for increased recruitment and better training.

And where they were misinformed or misdirected by automated "robocalls" and leaflets, it reignited calls for laws that would crack down on such practices.

All of those problems and more surfaced Tuesday in what state and federal officials said was a practice run for the 2008 election. And while none of the problems caused nearly as much trouble as the "hanging chads" of 2000, they laid bare the election system's growing pains.

"There continue to be deep concerns about the patterns of voting in our country," Chellie Pingree, president of the civic group Common Cause, said. "The level of problems that we heard about out there is still completely unacceptable."

A hotline run by Common Cause received 16,000 calls. Another headed by the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law got 20,000. The Justice Department received only about 250 calls and e-mails, down from 1,200 in 2004.

"There was nothing out of the ordinary," Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said. "They tended to be routine problems, and fairly isolated."

The 2002 Help America Vote Act authorized $3.9 billion in federal aid to states to overhaul their antiquated voting systems. Since then, most states have ditched punch-card, lever and paper voting methods in favor of electronic machines or those that scan paper ballots.

This was the first election in which all the mandates of the federal law came into play. That included states developing statewide databases to determine voters' eligibility. A number of states also enacted laws requiring certain types of identification, only to have courts overturn many of them.

The combination of new machines, new databases and new ID requirements, along with poll workers who average 72 years of age, was expected to lead to problems.

In turn, those problems were expected to show the way to reforms needed by 2008, when more than one in four election officials will be new to the job.

With Democrats coming to power in Congress, elections experts say the following changes should be debated, beginning with a December hearing of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission:

•Legislation sponsored by Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., that would impose harsh penalties on people who deceive voters. "We need to have clear laws that create some criminal penalty and perhaps fines for that type of behavior," says Jon Greenbaum of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

•Legislation sponsored by Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., that would mandate paper trails on electronic voting machines. Virginia, facing a recount in a Senate race that will determine which party controls the Senate, has no paper trails.

"You couldn't have a better example about why we need to do things differently," Pingree says.

•More money for states to purchase machines and train poll workers. About $800 million of the $3.9 billion authorized in 2002 never was appropriated. States "have spent their wad," said Kimball Brace of Election Data Services.

•Pushing more states to allow same-day voter registration. That would eliminate much of the need for provisional ballots, which often are not counted. Six states allow it now. Congress also could set standards for when those ballots should be counted.

•Standards for equitable distribution of voting machines, so that some voters don't wait for hours. Says Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the Election Assistance Commission: "It may be 2010 before we really see the full promise of all

Monitors Report Smooth Election (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess

Baton Rouge Advocate, November 9, 2006

OPELOUSAS — Poll watchers from the Justice Department and the NAACP reported a smooth election day in St. Landry Parish, despite concerns of voting irregularities in a close contest between a black female interim sheriff and her white male opponent.

Former State Police Trooper Bobby Guidroz won election over interim Sheriff Laura Balthazar on Tuesday with 20,210 votes, or 51 percent, according to complete but unofficial returns.

U.S. Attorney Donald Washington said Wednesday that the roughly 24 Justice Department monitors who roamed parish precincts Tuesday reported no issues with voter access or intimidation.

He said some routine election problems arose, such as a few names mistakenly left off voter rolls, but the issues were quickly resolved by the Clerk of Court's Office.

"It was quiet, and people who wanted to get out and vote got out and voted," said St. Landry Parish First Assistant District Attorney Frank Trosclair, whose office manned phones Tuesday to field election-day complaints.

Poll watchers for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Legal Defense and Education Fund also reported no problems.

Clifton Lemelle Sr., a retired educator from Eunice who helped organize the NAACP monitors, said he heard scattered complaints of people campaigning too close to the polls but no confirmed reports of intimidation.

or of voters being wrongly turned away from the polls.

Lemelle said he believed the biggest issue was the reaction of some parish officials last week to news that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People planned to monitor the elections.

Clerk of Court Charles Jagneaux, citing information he had received from state officials, initially said that the NAACP had no legal right to bring in poll watchers, which are generally allowed only as representatives of a candidate or a government agency.

The poll watchers were allowed in after the NAACP presented a court order in a lawsuit filed over voting rights in post-Katrina New Orleans that stipulates the organization can monitor elections in several parishes, including St. Landry.

Lemelle said the confusion most likely spurred a backlash vote.

"I think it inflamed the white voters, and it created a 1960s, 1970s climate of 'nobody from the North is going to tell us how to vote,'" Lemelle said.

Kristen Clarke-Avery, assistant counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, said the election monitors focused on Opelousas and Grand Coteau, where Friday night someone attempted to set fire to a 5-foot-tall wooden cross in front of town hall.

The incident remains under investigation.

"Although we did not encounter major defects in the process, the election makes clear that race is still a divisive issue," she said.

Touch-screen Voting Will Be Reviewed (SLPD)

By Stephen Deere, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 9, 2006

Now that the votes have been tallied, St. Louis County election officials and voter rights advocates will begin counting the number of problems voters had casting them.

High on the list of priorities: the county's touch-screen voting machines, which had their first major test on Tuesday.

John Diehl, chairman of the county's Election Board, said most problems with the machines were confined to 20 or fewer of the county's 450 polling sites.

Diehl, a Republican, admitted that lines were long in some places, but said it was mostly due to heavy voter turnout and a lengthy ballot.

As for the new equipment, he said the problems with the touch-screen machines happened when paper rolls jammed after poll workers had replaced them. The machines are equipped to print voters' choices on paper as the picks are made.

He said the turnout for the August primary, when the county introduced the touch screens, was so low comparatively that few polling places required paper-roll replacements.

"We had to change them three and four times, and we could see by two in the afternoon that calls multiplied about paper jams," he said. "That accounted for 90 percent of the issues we had to deal with."

But one voting rights advocate argued that problems were more widespread and were the result of poorly trained election judges and a lack of specialists to monitor the touch-screen machines.

"There wasn't enough (specialists) to meet the need," said Denise Lieberman, an attorney with the voter advocacy group Advancement Project and former legal director of the ACLU of Eastern Missouri. "The election judges simply didn't have the skills."

Diehl said the county had trained 200 poll workers to boot up and shut down the machines, as well as 25 specialists assigned to locations throughout the county and 28 pairs of roving specialists to respond to problems.

Both Diehl and Lieberman said they had yet to compile comprehensive lists of the problems and their locations.

DOJ_NMG_0092041

The midterm election marked sort of a role reversal for the county — where reports of voting problems have typically been uncommon — and the city of St. Louis, where elections have been marred by lawsuits and an inquiry from the U.S. Justice Department.

On Tuesday, the county also had some malfunctions with paper ballots.

Diehl said the long (19-inch) ballots stressed some optical scanners that read them.

In some cases, people feeding the ballots into the scanners tried forcing them and got error messages in response.

"That's just a training issue that we are going to have to go over with some of our poll judges," he said.

Lieberman said some people reported that when the scanners broke down, judges began stacking ballots in the open.

Diehl said he didn't know if the report was true, but said many of the Advancement Project's complaints during the day only added to the difficulties.

Tim O'Neil of the Post-Dispatch contributed to this report.

Secretary Of State To Take Over Supervision Of Boston Elections (BOS)

The Boston Globe, November 9, 2006

BOSTON --Secretary of State William Galvin said Wednesday he would take over the supervision of the city's election department after some precincts ran out of ballots during Tuesday's election, forcing voters to wait as police cruisers rushed to bring more.

"I can't have 'We'll try to do better next time.' That's not acceptable," Galvin said Wednesday. "What they did yesterday was put the rights of voters at risk and that's unacceptable."

Galvin said the law required him to determine a pattern of misconduct -- which he believes there is -- then create a solution to the problems.

"My view of the remedy is there has to be some supervision," he said. "I have no desire to micromanage the operations of the city of Boston. ... I'm interested in making sure that the basic function of the department is carried out."

Galvin said a similar move was made in Boston in the 1980s, when the Secretary of State's Office appointed a monitor to review, control and direct the department.

Jennifer Mehigan, a spokeswoman for Mayor Thomas Menino, said the city would cooperate with the state. Menino also is drawing from other sources to help fix election problems.

"He is speaking with different outside consultants," Mehigan said. "We're looking at the communication between the wardens and the city, the elections department and other procedures like that."

Galvin said late Tuesday he was considering the move, after being forced to tell Menino to send ballots in police cruisers to a half-dozen polling places where ballots ran low.

The mayor's office said problems began in the evening, when the after-work crowd was larger than expected, and city vehicles used to replenish ballot supplies ran into traffic. Menino said Wednesday that precincts were given enough ballots for 50 percent turnout, but some had turnouts that were higher.

He denied the shortages were in only poor or minority neighborhoods -- a contention made by some anxious voters waiting Tuesday.

Boston also had problems in September during the primary, when ballots in eight precincts were inadvertently uncounted.

The U.S. Justice Department also filed a lawsuit in July 2005, alleging that Boston's election practices discriminated against Hispanic and Asian voters. The department dropped the lawsuit later that year, when city officials agreed to provide voting materials in Chinese and Vietnamese and to allow federal observers to monitor polling places through 2008.

Heads May Roll Over Ballot Bungle (BOSH)

By Michele McPhee, Boston Herald Police Bureau Chief

Boston Herald, November 9, 2006

Mayor Thomas M. Menino said city staffers face “reassignment” as the state seeks legal oversight of Boston’s Elections Department after a ballot shortage forced police to make rush deliveries to angry voters at the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0092042

"I am very, very angry. This should not have happened," Menino told the Herald. "Will people be reassigned? It's possible. We certainly need a management plan for the Elections Department."

Secretary of State William Galvin told city officials he plans to utilize his legal right to manage the city Elections Department.

Meanwhile the mayor has said he will hire a consultant to "shake up" the department and file quarterly progress reports to Galvin.

The state printed more than 300,000 ballots for Hub voters, but just half those were delivered to polling locations, leaving largely minority strongholds such as East Boston, Hyde Park, Mattapan, Roxbury and Dorchester without enough ballots, infuriating voters who were forced to wait for hours to cast their ballots.

Some precinct wardens began handing English-speaking voters ballots printed in other languages, or told voters to leave their phone numbers and they would be called when there were ballots available. Officials estimate that 2.2 million people voted in Tuesday's election.

"How can we not be prepared for people who wanted to exercise their right to participate in democracy? We need to know what went on out there," City Councilor Felix Arroyo said.

Arroyo joined fellow councilors Sam Yoon, Chuck Turner and Charles Yancey in filing an order to hold a public hearing on election issues.

City Council President Michael F. Flaherty said he does not believe Elections Department officials engaged in malfeasance, but believes an investigation is warranted.

"The breakdown that occurred needs to be addressed to ensure the public's confidence in their election system. Voters are a precious commodity," he said.

This is the second voting snafu this year. Eight precinct wardens, who are paid $150 on Election Day, were fired after they were "too tired" to tally votes in the Senate race between incumbent Sen. Dianne Wilkerson and her challenger, Sonia Chang-Diaz, prompting a recount, Menino said.

In 2003, a lawsuit was filed about voting problems in the city, issues severe enough that the U.S. Justice Department is now supervising Boston elections.

Michigan Turns Back College Affirmative Action (WSJ)

By Suzanne Sataline And John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

In 2003, when the Supreme Court upheld affirmative action in college admissions, many observers felt that the issue had been settled for years to come.

Think again.

Voters in Michigan, where the state university successfully fought in that Supreme Court case to preserve minority preference, repudiated it in a ballot initiative Tuesday. An initiative passed by Michigan voters will ban affirmative action in admissions to public colleges and in government hiring. Currently, the University of Michigan and other selective public institutions in the state consider race as one of many factors in admissions decisions. The ban takes effect 45 days after the vote.

Ward Connerly, the California businessman behind the Michigan initiative, yesterday said he is exploring bringing similar proposals to other states, including Illinois, Missouri and Oregon. And next month, the Supreme Court will revisit the question of race-based enrollment, this time in the context of K-12 public-school assignments.

"If we can win in Michigan, a blue state with a Democratic governor...this initiative would pass" anywhere, said Mr. Connerly, a former University of California regent who led successful campaigns to ban racial preferences in college admissions in California and Washington. "If you give the American people a chance to decide whether they want everybody treated equal regardless of race, nine times out 10 they would vote for it."

Late yesterday, an affirmative-action group known as By Any Means Necessary filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan against Gov. Jennifer Granholm claiming that the ban is unconstitutional, said the group's attorney George B. Washington. A spokesman for the governor couldn't be reached to comment.

Affirmative-action supporters said the initiative will reduce black and Hispanic enrollment at the University of Michigan and Michigan State University and said they hope to challenge it in court. "We believe affirmative action is a positive tool for society," University of Michigan President Mary Sue Coleman said in an interview. Depending on the court's interpretation, she said, the initiative could stymie the university's efforts to attract more black students overall, and more women into science and engineering programs. She said the university will seek legal permission to judge current applicants under its old criteria, which take race into account.

John C. Brittain, chief counsel of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights under Law, a Washington, group that has defended affirmative action before the Supreme Court, called the initiative "a very dangerous step that turns back the clock on civil rights." He said he expected civil-rights lawyers to figure out ways to mount a constitutional attack on the initiative -- perhaps using the language of the U.S. Supreme Court's Michigan decision permitting affirmative action.

In its decision, the Supreme Court allowed colleges to use preferences, but didn't require that they do so, which left room for Michigan voters to impose a ban.

Polls had indicated that the vote on the initiative would be close. But Michigan voters on Tuesday approved the measure, called Proposal 2, by a margin of 58% to 42%, with 100% of precincts reporting.

"We won in places no one ever expected we'd win," said Doug Tietz, campaign manager for the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, the group that sponsored the referendum. Analysts said voters may have been reluctant to tell pollsters that they supported the initiative for fear of being tagged as racist by the state's academic, political and business establishment, which largely opposed it.

Linda Chavez, chairman of the Center for Equal Opportunity, a Sterling, Va., nonprofit that opposes racial preferences and campaigned for the initiative, said such initiatives are most successful in states like Michigan that have flagship public campuses where white applicants are angry about losing competitive spots.

The Michigan vote could also draw more attention to pending cases before the Supreme Court. It will hear arguments Dec. 4 on the constitutionality of using race as a factor in school assignments in Louisville, Ky., and Seattle. In both cases, white parents whose children were passed over for entry to sought-after public schools sued the school districts.

Mr. Tietz said his next target may be the college admissions preference sometimes referred to as "white affirmative action" -- the edge given to children of alumni. During the campaign, he said, his group was "forceful and straightforward" in opposing so-called legacy preference, while supporters of affirmative action dodged that issue.

He said he would "work hand-in-hand" with affirmative-action supporters to end legacy preference. "My kids someday will not need a legacy boost," said Mr. Tietz, an alumnus of the University of Michigan, which considers legacy status in admissions decisions. "I want them to work hard and earn their spot, so no one will say, 'You got in because of your dad.'"

Black Firefighter Settles Suit Over Racial Prank (LAT)

By Sandy Banks, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

A black firefighter who was served dog food in his dinner by fellow firefighters at the Westchester station will receive $2.7 million.

A black firefighter who was served dog food in his spaghetti by fellow firefighters will be paid more than $2.7 million to settle a lawsuit alleging racial harassment within the Los Angeles Fire Department.

The award, approved on an 11-1 vote Wednesday by the Los Angeles City Council, is the latest in a recent string of settlements of lawsuits by firefighters claiming discrimination and harassment and retaliation against those who complain.

It is believed to be the largest payout for misconduct in the department's history, which was long considered among the nation's finest, but has often been the target of complaints about hostility toward African American and female firefighters.

Firefighter Tennie Pierce, 51, alleged in his lawsuit that Firefighter Jorge Arevalo mixed canned dog food into Pierce's dinner at their Westchester station two years ago; that Capt. John Tohill purchased the dog food; and that Capt. Chris Burton knew about the prank but didn't warn Pierce. All three men were present when Pierce ate the dog food.

Pierce "took a large bite, at which time he noticed the other firefighters were laughing and making noises," the lawsuit says. He took a second bite, then demanded to know what was in his food, "but no one would tell him." Pierce then left the kitchen "with his co-workers laughing at him."

A Fire Department investigation suggested the incident was intended to "humble" Pierce — who stands 6 feet 5 — after his team won a fire station volleyball game. A lawyer for one of the defendants initially called the incident "a good-natured prank … [not] in any way motivated by race."

But a UC Santa Cruz professor who was hired by Pierce's attorney to review department records of discrimination complaints said the prank was clearly intended to "humiliate and dehumanize" Pierce.

"The association of a black man and dog food resonates with the deep historical roots of slavery and the corresponding dehumanization," said sociologist David Wellman, co-author of "Whitewashing Race: Colorblind Policies in a Color Conscious America."

"It's not just silly stuff. It's racially motivated…. The organization labels it as macho, 'boys will be boys' behavior. I think it's more about keeping blacks out by making their lives so miserable that they don't want to stay."

In addition to the three firefighters, the lawsuit named the city as a defendant because the fire captains allegedly allowed a hostile workplace to exist in violation of department policies forbidding harassment. The two captains were given one month off without pay as punishment. Arevalo was ordered off work for three days without pay. As part of the settlement, they were dismissed from the lawsuit, so they are not liable financially.

Fire Chief William Bamattre admitted the incident was "intolerable" and violates department "guidelines on what's professional performance.... That type of harassment or prank or whatever you call it is not consistent with what the public expects from the Fire Department, the confidence the public has in us."

But Councilman Dennis Zine, a police officer for 38 years and the lone vote against the settlement, said he thought the $2.7-million award was "outrageous for something that caused no serious injury, no permanent harm…. "

"That's not to say it was right, not to justify what they did. But $2.7 million?…. I don't think it was a racial deal. It was a prank that turned sour, but did it go bad to the point that he's harmed for life? That it should cost the taxpayers $2.7 million?"

In his lawsuit, Pierce said that for more than a year after the October 2004 incident he was subjected to "verbal slurs, insults [and] derogatory remarks" — including taunting by firefighters "barking like dogs [and] asking him how dog food tasted" — in the presence of supervisors.

In addition to the payout, the settlement provides for Pierce to remain on fully-paid administrative leave until April, when he reaches his 20-year service anniversary. Then he can retire with an annual pension amounting to half of his salary for life.

Pierce was out of town and could not be reached for comment Wednesday. But his attorney, Genie Harrison, said the incident — and the unwillingness of other firefighters at the table to intervene — was a "shocking betrayal" for Pierce, who grew up in South Los Angeles.

"He was targeted by people he considered brothers and then was mercilessly harassed out of the job that meant so much to him," Harrison said. "Now he's calling for the public's help to change the working environment for African Americans who remain on the department."

The department hired its first black firefighter in 1897, but for almost 60 years blacks were assigned only to segregated stations in black neighborhoods. As the city's black population grew, all-black crews began displacing white firefighters, who often responded with animosity. In 1936, white firefighters at a Central Avenue station who were forced to move to accommodate a black crew responded by trashing the station with garbage and human waste.

In the 1940s, pressure mounted to integrate the force. But then-Chief John H. Alderson declared integration a "social experiment" and refused; 90% of white firefighters joined a fund-raising campaign to support him. Those who expressed a willingness to live and work alongside blacks were ostracized by peers and often disciplined for insubordination.

The city's fire stations were officially integrated in 1956, but blacks were denied kitchen privileges and subjected to such vicious hazing that off-duty black firefighters began patrolling integrated stations, some carrying guns.

In 1974, the department entered into a federal consent decree that required half of all new recruits to be black, Latino or Asian American. The decree was lifted in 2001, but some blame it for lowering morale and stoking resentment among white male firefighters who considered it reverse discrimination and complained that it allowed the hiring of unqualified minorities.

Today the 3,600-member department is 53% white, 29% Latino, 12% black and 5% Asian American. Women make up 2.7% of the department.

In 1994, complaints of discrimination reached such a fever pitch, the City Council ordered an audit of the department and held hearings that led to the resignation of Chief Donald Manning. The audit found that women and minorities were frozen out of management positions and often drummed out of the department as rookies.

An audit earlier this year by City Controller Laura Chick revealed similar findings. Among black firefighters, 87% said they had experienced or witnessed discrimination.

Some firefighters say pranks are part of the firehouse culture and not directed specifically at blacks. But black firefighters report much of the teasing they experience involves racial slurs, offensive comments or pranks aimed at humiliation.

"Blacks have experienced this for over 300 years," sociologist Wellman said. "They have a gyroscope that picks up hostile stuff that somebody else would not see as hostile.

"Culture becomes very important," he said. "In the black community people come together and talk about the way they've been treated. They run it up the flagpole … 'Tell me if I'm off the wall here.'

"Their group picks it up and your group doesn't because their group has a history that yours doesn't share."

Stun Guns Avert Trouble, Harford Police Say (BSUN)

By Justin Fenton, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, November 9, 2006

From a suicidal teenager to a suspected car thief who flees on foot, some people who have refused to cooperate with Harford County police have been getting a wake-up call -- the 50,000-volt variety.

The Harford County Sheriff's Office is believed to be among the first police agencies in Maryland to issue Taser stun guns to its deputies, who have used the devices to stop people who flee or refuse to comply with orders, and for the mentally ill who become violent.

The agency has been issuing stun guns to patrol deputies since last year, and they have used them on at least 28 occasions since January. One incident involved a 50-year-old schizophrenic woman who had barricaded herself in a closet and was shocked with a stun gun because a deputy feared she could get to weapons in another room.

The agency says the devices, which have been criticized for causing fatalities, have been most effective as a deterrent to violence and limit injuries to suspects and officers. A spokesman said assaults on officers were down.

"It is far more useful than engaging someone in hand-to-hand combat or taking action with a baton," said Robert B. Thomas, a spokesman for the agency.

The agency first purchased stun guns in 2002 and has been phasing them into the arsenal of weapons used by all patrol deputies. Harford is not alone -- more than 7,000 of the 18,000 police agencies in the United States use the weapons, according to a March report by Amnesty International, and 1,700 police departments have purchased them for every officer.

With increased use, however, has come greater scrutiny. Amnesty International said there had been at least 156 deaths across the country related to police stun guns in the past five years, and dozens of excessive-force lawsuits have been brought by people who say they were injured by officers.

"The good part about having all officers equipped is that when they encounter a threat, they don't have to call for assistance or wait for a SWAT team to arrive," said Doug Ward, associate director of the Johns Hopkins University's Division of Public Safety Leadership. "The downside is that they tend to find ways to use them, and there are horror stories from across the country where people encounter medical issues after getting [stunned] multiple times."

Other area jurisdictions are considering purchasing stun guns or are using them on a limited basis. The Anne Arundel County Council approved the use of the weapons in the spring, and police there are researching the technology.

Baltimore County officers are testing 10 of the devices on the streets and have used them more than two dozen times since April, said Maj. Mark Warren, who spent six months as a fellow at the Police Executive Research Forum in Washington studying stun-gun policies across the country.

In Harford County, Sheriff R. Thomas Golding has authorized deputies to use the devices for the past two years. Deputies take an eight-hour training course and are issued the devices along with their service weapons. The agency, which has about 130 patrol deputies, has 149 stun guns in use, and 32 more have been ordered.

Reports on 12 incidents that were provided to The Sun showed that the stun guns were used primarily in domestic situations, two of which did not result in arrests. The most recent incident in which a stun gun was used occurred during the drunken-driving arrest of a 38-year-old woman who had driven her car into a utility pole and fought four deputies as they tried to arrest her.

In another incident, Columbus Mosby, 51, of Edgewood said he could feel the electricity coursing through him when deputies used a stun gun on him in August. He had questioned why his 15-year-old was in handcuffs after receiving a littering citation. Mosby was arrested after he ignored an officer's command to keep quiet.

The shock "lifted me to the tip of my toes, and my wife was telling me, 'Just lay down' -- I couldn't even lay down on the ground," Mosby said. He was shocked again when he didn't lie down, and he said the stun gun left a small scar on his back where the darts landed.

When shocked with the devices, suspects lose control of their muscles and collapse. The effects usually last long enough for an officer to put handcuffs on a suspect, although some recover quickly and could continue to resist. The Taser X26 model, which Harford deputies use, shoots barbed darts attached to wires that pass electricity into a person's body.

Mosby disputes a report of the incident in which he was involved, which says he swung at an officer, and he adds that he was unarmed. "I don't understand it," he said. "I wasn't fighting them."

The agency's policy on when to use Tasers and stun devices does not describe the circumstances in which they should be used, saying only that they "may be utilized as an alternative to lethal force and shall be maintained consistent with the manufacturer's training and recommendations."

When a stun gun is used, the deputy must fill out a use-of-force report, which is reviewed by a six-member committee.

Golding said the devices have helped deputies avert dangerous situations many times.

"We've heard a lot of stories where, when the deputy pulls that out and [aims it at] the individual, they become compliant," Golding said. "When you have that, it's served its purpose."

A research arm of the Justice Department is conducting a two-year study of cases in which a suspect died after being subdued with a stun gun. The National Institute of Justice said there have been more than 180 deaths in the past 10 years, with most occurring since 2000.

The Police Executive Research Forum studied 96 stun gun-related deaths between 1999 and 2005. In four out of five cases, the person had taken some type of drug, which might have contributed to the deaths.

"We think they're very good when used properly," said Joshua Ederheimer, director of the forum's Center on Force and Accountability. "They appear to have a minimal effect in the overwhelming majority of uses."

Despite his work researching and developing guidelines with the research forum, Warren, the major with the Baltimore County Police Department, said his agency wants to continue to study how stun guns are used by its officers before issuing them.

"We're hoping we can gain a full understanding of the practical positives and negatives," Warren said. "It's easy to say on paper how others do it and what we expect, but you need to determine the impact on your particular department or community. A trial program will help us deal with those issues."

Business May Face Democrats' Scrutiny (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

Democrats are expected to turn a harsher light on business. A call for a delay in an FCC vote on a big merger might be the start.

WASHINGTON - John Dingell, the incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Wednesday that he wants the Federal Communications Commission to delay its vote on the AT&T Inc. acquisition of BellSouth Corp.

Dingell, saying the combination raises a "significant antitrust question," sent a letter to the FCC asking that it hold off on the vote until after the new Congress convenes in January. The agency has delayed a vote on the merger three times.

Dingell's request might be an opening shot in the House Democrats' new oversight of big business. California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who is in line to become speaker, has promised to fight early on in the next Congress to lower the price of prescription drugs available through Medicare. Efforts to curb military spending are also likely, political and financial analysts said, after an election whose outcome was influenced in large part by voters' dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq.

But with the two parties stalemated in the Senate, where it usually takes 60 votes to pass major legislation, the pharmaceutical and defense industries might find themselves beset more by unwelcome rhetoric in Congress than any changes in law.

Few substantial changes in corporate America are expected to result from Democratic-led initiatives during the next two years -- with the exception of a proposed increase in the minimum wage that might get substantial Republican support.

The long-term outlook for the biotechnology and homeland security businesses might benefit, analysts said, from anticipated Democratic efforts to promote stem-cell research and inspect more cargo containers at ports. And the alternative energy sector could also get a boost.

Yet despite the Democrats' victories, the Dow Jones industrials rose 19.77, or 0.16 percent, to 12,176.54. The blue chips closed above the intraday record of 12,167.02 set on Oct. 26. The Standard & Poor's 500 index was up 2.88, or 0.21 percent, at 1,385.72, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 9.06, or 0.38 percent, to 2,384.94.

Liz Claiborne To Buy Kate Spade For $124M (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Liz Claiborne Inc., moving to expand its reach into luxury department stores, Wednesday said it agreed to acquire privately held Kate Spade LLC, a maker of high-end fashion accessories, for $124 million (â‚¬97 million) in cash.

The deal, expected to close late this year, includes an undisclosed amount of assumed debt.

New York-based Kate Spade, which makes the kate spade and Jack Spade brands, had net sales of about $84 million (â‚¬65.75 million) for the year ended July 30. Its product line includes handbags, small leather goods, accessories, luggage and baby products.

Kate Spade sells in U.S. department stores, including Neiman Marcus, Saks Fifth Avenue, Nordstrom, and Bloomingdale's, as well as 19 Kate Spade stores, four Kate Spade outlets and one Jack Spade store.

Kate Spade also has distributors in Asia and licensing agreements for shoes, eyewear, tabletop and paper products.

Despite having more than $5 billion (â‚¬3.9 billion) in annual sales and more than 40 brands in its stable, Liz Claiborne, also based in New York, so far has been a limited player in handbags and accessories. Its brands include Ellen Tracy, Dana Buchman, Lucky Brand, and Juicy Couture.

Neiman Marcus Group Inc., which owned a majority stake in Kate Spade, put the company on the market in September 2005.

In morning trading, shares of Liz Claiborne edged up 7 cents to $42.12 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Spanish Utility Approaches Scottish Power For Deal (WSJ)

By Jason Singer In London And Keith Johnson In Madrid

DOJ_NMG_0092048

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

The latest effort by a European energy giant to strike a major deal -- Iberdrola SA's preliminary approach to Scottish Power PLC -- signals that utilities believe they need to be larger to survive in a future dominated by the search for newer and cleaner ways of producing energy.

Iberdrola of Spain made an approach to Scottish Power, which has a market value of £10.9 billion ($20.8 billion), as a prelude to a possible offer, according to people close to the situation. Scottish Power said in a statement that its board "has received an approach which may or may not lead to an offer being made." It added that the board would study any offer at the appropriate time.

An Iberdrola spokesman said the company "has not presented any offer." At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Scottish Power's American depositary receipts were up 14% to $58.37.

A potential deal would mark the latest in a series of deals and attempted acquisitions involving some of Europe's biggest electricity producers in Spain, France, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom. The consolidation comes as European companies from several industries have been linking up across national boundaries. The willingness of banks to finance big deals and the end of a long period of restructuring at many companies have made the current wave of mergers and acquisitions among the busiest Europe has seen.

The fit with Scottish Power, which has a dozen onshore wind farms in the U.K., could be good for Iberdrola, which has significant interests in hydro and wind power, at a time when utilities are scrambling to meet stringent European emissions regulations and environmental targets. Renewable energies, which enjoy price supports in nearly every European country, also offer better-than-average returns for power companies. Scotland is one of Europe's windiest locales, and Scottish Power's modest wind-farm development would leave scope for Iberdrola to install bigger turbines as well as offshore wind farms, which offer greater economies of scale.

Another possible attraction for Iberdrola is the potential to be a part of a new generation of nuclear-power plants in the U.K. While Scottish Power has no nuclear profile, Iberdrola could use its U.K. base as a platform for expanding its nuclear operations. Iberdrola operates all or part of six nuclear plants in Spain.

Scottish Power's retail arm has more than 5.2 million U.K. customers. It also operates electricity generation, natural-gas storage facilities and energy-management activities in the U.K., U.S. and Canada. In the year ended March 31, it had profit of £1.54 billion on revenue of £5.45 billion. Scottish Power was the subject of takeover offers from E.On AG of Germany last year but rebuffed them.

Iberdrola could be seeking a defensive move to safeguard it from a hostile approach. Iberdrola was part of a failed bid by Gas Natural SDG SA in September 2005 for Endesa SA. In that deal, Iberdrola had agreed to purchase some of Endesa's power-generating assets that would have been hived off by Gas Natural if its bid was successful.

Spanish builder Actividades de Construccion y Servicios SA, which owns a 35% stake in Spanish utility Union Fenosa SA, acquired a 10% stake in Iberdrola late last month. Bankers and analysts said the sudden share-buying swoop was designed to facilitate the merger of Fenosa and Iberdrola and create a new national champion in electricity.

Judge Sends Hub Officer In Drug Case Back To Jail (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 9, 2006

Says he violated bail conditions

To be released on bail last month, Boston police Officer Carlos A. Pizarro agreed to extraordinarily strict conditions: a search of his home, no cellphone, no computer, house arrest, and only preapproved visitors.

His wife promised to alert the court if Pizarro violated any conditions.

Yesterday, a federal judge put Pizarro, 36, back behind bars after ruling that he had immediately broken the rules. Pizarro, one of three officers facing federal cocaine and heroin charges in one of the biggest corruption cases in the department's history, was ordered held without bail until the case is resolved.

US District Judge William G. Young found that Pizarro violated his bail conditions by agreeing to let the government search his Dorchester home for contraband before he was released, then quickly calling his wife to "change the situation in that house."

On Sept. 22, after Pizarro agreed to the search during a bail hearing, he telephoned his wife from the Barnstable County jail and warned her to toss certain items, including "little pink things" and "a brown little bottle."

Prosecutors allege that Pizarro, who knew jail calls are monitored, used code words to warn his wife to get rid of illegal drugs.

Pizarro told his wife, Michele Joyce , that she was "not all set" for the search and warned her to throw out "the little pink things," according to a transcript of the telephone call that was filed in federal court. Prosecutors allege Pizarro was talking about steroids.

He also made reference to a "hospital thing," which prosecutors allege was a syringe, and to "a brown little bottle," which the government believes meant injectable testosterone.

Pizarro's lawyers, however, disputed the government's contention that Pizarro was talking about illegal drugs. They say he was talking about sex-enhancing drugs, including Viagra, and other prescription drugs during the call. At one point, he told his wife to save something he'd left in his top dresser drawer because he'd need it when he came home.

"It would be pure speculation to try to figure out from the transcript what he was talking about, and there's certainly no evidence of contraband," said Jeffrey Denner , one of Pizarro's lawyers.

Denner said Pizarro had also warned his wife during the call that he had lawfully-owned guns in the house, which she should turn over to the police. Denner said a transcript of that portion of the call wasn't filed with the court.

Prosecutors suggested that the judge ask Pizarro's wife about what she had allegedly removed from the home.

Young apparently decided he had heard enough and opted not to question her.

Young said he had warned Pizarro before releasing him on bail Oct. 11 that "I would police the bail restrictions strictly."

He ordered Pizarro, who was seated in the courtroom, taken into custody immediately, saying that while prosecutors and defense lawyers may argue over what Pizarro was talking about during the recorded call, it was undisputed that the officer "called his wife to dispose of something."

Pizarro, a 10-year department veteran, was arrested July 20 in Miami on charges that he and two other officers, Roberto Pulido and Nelson Carrasquillo , protected 100 kilograms of cocaine while it was being trucked to Boston in June by undercover FBI agents posing as drug dealers. Pulido, 41, a 10-year veteran of the force, and Carrasquillo, a seven-year veteran, are also charged with protecting an earlier shipment of 40 kilograms of cocaine.

Carrasquillo is free on bail. Pulido, the alleged ringleader of the group, has been ordered jailed without bail pending trial.

An FBI affidavit filed in the case alleges that Pulido was involved in a wide array of crimes, including identity theft, steroid trafficking, and protecting illegal after-hours parties where uniformed officers mingled with drug dealers and prostitutes.

Judge Tosses Cop Back In Jail For Call About Hard Evidence (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, November 9, 2006

The dirty laundry of an alleged dirty cop spilled out in federal court yesterday when Boston patrolman Carlos Pizarro raised sexual impairment as his defense for a damning call to his wife.

A furious U.S. District Court Judge William G. Young yesterday yanked Pizarro's house-arrest privileges and sent him back to the slammer after learning Pizarro was recorded on a prison phone allegedly instructing his wife, Michele Joyce, to destroy criminal evidence in their Dorchester home.

The 20-minute call was placed on Sept. 22 from the Barnstable House of Correction just three hours after Pizarro - who was busted by the FBI in July with fellow officers Roberto Pulido and Nelson Carrasquillo - learned authorities would search his home prior to his Oct. 11 pre-trial release.

"He called his wife and told her to dispose of something," Young said. "One can draw inferences from those undisputed facts."

But Pizarro's lawyer, Jeffrey Denner, argued the disgraced officer knew he was being recorded and, when speaking in code to Joyce, was referring to natural and doctor-prescribed remedies for "sexual issues" he was embarrassed about.

"He did not want to bring it up over the telephone," said Denner, who declined to explain those "issues" to the Herald.

Prosecutors, according to court documents, believe Pizarro and Joyce were actually discussing getting rid of steroids and testosterone shots.

Pizarro directs Joyce to a "rack of clothes," "little pink things" and the "top drawer in my dresser," according to a transcript of the conversation.

"Did you throw them out?" he asks her at one point.

"No," Joyce answers.

"Those are, save 'em, because I'm gonna nail someone and be home with you," Pizarro said in what prosecutors suspect is a nod to Viagra.

Joyce laughs. "Oh, that's good," she said. "No, hopefully you won't have a hard time. My God, at least once anyways!"

Joyce wept uncontrollably after her husband was remanded back into custody.

Pizarro, Pulido and Carrasquillo are alleged to have hired themselves out as muscle for cocaine shipments and to have hosted orgies with hookers, among other betrayals of their badges.

Operation 'Burn Down' Leads To Charges Against 17 (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

Chicago police and the FBI arrested and charged 17 people in a Wests Side gang roundup Wednesday.

Following an investigation by the Joint Task Force on Gangs, FBI special agents and Police narcotics investigators arrested 11 suspected members and associates of the Satan Disciples, according to an FBI release.

After over two years of investigation, Operation "Burn Down" led to charges against 17 suspects including four who were already in local custody on unrelated charges. "Burn Down," which began in September 2004, included undercover operations to purchase drugs and court-authorized electronic surveillance of phones used by one or more of the defendants, the release said.

The suspects were charged in criminal complaints filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Chicago with numerous felony counts of conspiracy and possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute, the release said.

Of the 17 charged, 15 were arrested, including suspects ranging in age from 19 to 45. Charges were also filed against two suspects, now the subject of a nationwide manhunt -- Charles Spauding, aka "Wedo," 25; and Celeste Melendez, 20, both with a last know address of 1718 W. 33rd Pl. in Chicago, the release said.

Among those arrested were the defacto head of the Chicago chapter of the Satan Disciples, Kenneth Gayton, the release said. He is accused of overseeing an operation that controlled distribution of both powder and crack cocaine in and around the Southwest Side, primarily in the vicinity of 18th Street and California Avenue, and 42nd Street and Campbell, the release said.

One of the city's oldest street gangs, the Satan Disciples were formed in the 1960's, with widespread presence in Chicago, northwest Indiana and southern Wisconsin and factions in Texas, Oklahoma and Florida.

All of the suspects in custody are being held at the Metropolitan Correctional Center until scheduled appearance before Magistrate Judge Michael Mason in U.S. District Court on Thursday.

If convicted of the charges, those in custody face a possible life sentence in prison.

Anti-gang Sweep Snares 19 On Drug, Weapons Charges (COLDISP)

By Kevin Kidder

Columbus Dispatch, November 9, 2006

Multi-agency force fans out in search for 63 suspects

Nineteen suspected gang members from across Columbus were arrested yesterday, as police conducted a methodical sweep as part of the mayor's anti-gang initiative, officials announced.

They were some of the 63 suspects that police, the DEA, the U.S. marshal's office and parole officers were searching for last night, said Columbus police Sgt. Chantay Boxill.

Those arrested yesterday were mainly wanted for drug or weapons charges and had been identified by police as members of gangs that did business on the South Side, though they live all over the Columbus area, she said.

All those arrested were in the Franklin County jail at Jackson Pike last night, she said.

Mayor Michael B. Coleman joined police for several hours yesterday as they rounded up the suspects.

"This is an ongoing effort," Coleman said. "It's the worst of the worst, or some of the worst of the worst."

Coleman had been hoping that one particular gang member — whom he wouldn't name — would be arrested. "I describe him as an animal," he said. That man wasn't in custody as of late last night.

"The message is, we will not accept gang violence in the city of Columbus. I can't tolerate this," the mayor said.

Police hoped for more arrests last night and the sweep likely is to continue through this weekend, Boxill said.

The anti-gang initiative was inaugurated by Coleman in 2005 to combat gang-related violence. Scores of gang members have been arrested since then.

It features a three-pronged approach: Police crack down on crime in the targeted neighborhood, other city agencies descend on the neighborhood to clean it up and social-service agencies work to help youths find alternatives to gangs, Coleman has said.

Trial For Newport Alderman Gets Underway (NEWPIND)

By Melissa Lore, Independent Reporter

Newport Independent, November 9, 2006

"Now, the rest of the story," Newport Alderman Pinky McFarlin's attorney said Monday afternoon, quoting Paul Harvey, to begin his opening statements. McFarlin's trial began Monday after jury selection was completed.

Prosecutor Anne Gardner's opening statements explained that McFarlin is charged with selling Xanax and crack cocaine on 20 different dates to an informant from May through November of 2004. Evidence expected to be introduced will include tape recordings of conversations held between the informant and the defendant in the defendant's home.

Gardner told the jury that they would hear several drug terms and conversations in which McFarlin would say "bringing the game to town," referring to bringing drugs to Newport. She said that there would be conversations in which McFarlin would educate the informant about how to hide crack cocaine and when not to take money because it could be "federali money."

Witnesses expected to testify against McFarlin will include an expert witness for the DEA, who took the stand Monday afternoon to explain the procedure for the use of an informant; a Fred's pharmacist; a bondswoman; and Lucas Hardaway, McFarlin's nephew.

McFarlin's attorney, Melvin Thompson, told the jury that the defendant was enticed by the drug task force. He continued by giving a brief history of McFarlin's life and various injuries he has sustained by working that require him to regularly use pain killers Lortab and Lorcet, prescribed by doctors, adding that, after the birth of his daughter, McFarlin realized he was addicted to the drugs and admitted himself into a drug rehab program for three or four months, which resulted in his staying clean and sober for three or four years.

"It was fairly common knowledge he was addicted," Thompson said, offering that others in the community knew that McFarlin was in pain and would offer their own pain medication to help him get relief.

The attorney continued the scenario by explaining McFarlin's relationship with the informant, Debra Johnson, who came to him for legal help and discovered that he was using pain killers on a regular basis and wanted to swap the hydrocodones she had for a neck injury.

Thompson finished his statements by telling the jury that the DTF knew Johnson was selling drugs to McFarlin. "The government played on his addiction."

Missoula County Approves Marijuana Initiative (MIS)

By Tristan Scott

Missoulian, November 8, 2006

A ballot measure recommending Missoula County law enforcement officials make adult marijuana offenses their lowest priority passed Tuesday night.

The measure, dubbed Initiative 2, won the support of 22,502 Missoula voters, or 53 percent. Opponents of the initiative totaled 19,565, or 46 percent, and included some of Missoula County's top law enforcement officials.

The initiative will make marijuana crimes the single lowest priority for Missoula County authorities, but won't include marijuana sales or drug use by minors as low-priority offenses.

In no way will Tuesday's passage of Initiative 2 legalize the drug, according to Angela Goodhope, a spokeswoman with Citizens for Responsible Crime Policy, the group that proposed the measure and landed it on the ballot.

Proponents of the initiative, sponsored by Citizens for Responsible Crime Policy, say Initiative 2 strives to place increased emphasis on crimes that threaten people's lives and property and on other, more pressing drug issues. The proposal calls for a Community Oversight Committee that would consist of community members, criminal defense attorneys and a drug rehabilitation counselor who would investigate marijuana arrests and produce a report on the initiative's effects seven months after its passage.

"We are very pleased that Missoula voters approved a clearer, safer and smarter crime policy," Goodhope said.

Police Chief Rusty Wickman and Sheriff Mike McMeekin have publicly voiced their concern about the initiative, saying they worry federal dollars could be yanked from Missoula's drug enforcement programs in retaliation to the measure.

Goodhope said all evidence suggested the contrary, pointing to Seattle's passage of a similar measure several years ago as evidence.

In Missoula, like Seattle, the measure strives to place increased emphasis on crimes that threaten people's lives and property and on other, more pressing drug issues.

"None of the negative outcomes our opponents predicted will come true," Goodhope said. "We know

Missoula OKs Initiative Relaxing Enforcement Of Marijuana Laws (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

MISSOULA (AP) — An initiative that makes enforcing marijuana offenses against adults the lowest priority for Missoula County law enforcement passed Tuesday night.

Initiative 2 won the support of 22,502 Missoula voters, or 53 percent. Opponents totaled 19,565, or 46 percent, and included some of the county's top law enforcement officials.

The measure leans on local law enforcement to make ''citations, arrests, property seizures and prosecutions for adult marijuana offenses Missoula County's lowest law enforcement priority.''

It does not include marijuana sales or drug use by minors as low-priority offenses. And in no way will it legalize the drug, said Angela Goodhope, a spokeswoman for Citizens for Responsible Crime Policy, the group that proposed the measure and landed it on the ballot.

Proponents say Initiative 2 strives to place increased emphasis on crimes that threaten people's lives and property and on other, more pressing drug issues.

''We are very pleased that Missoula voters approved a clearer, safer and smarter crime policy,'' Goodhope said.

The proposal calls for a Community Oversight Committee — consisting of community members, criminal defense attorneys and a drug rehabilitation counselor — to investigate marijuana arrests and produce a report on the initiative's effects seven months after its passage

Police Chief Rusty Wickman and Sheriff Mike McMeekin have publicly voiced their concern about the initiative, saying they worry the measure's passage could lead to the loss of federal dollars from Missoula's drug enforcement programs.

Goodhope said all evidence points to the contrary, citing a similar measure that passed in Seattle several years ago.

''None of the negative outcomes our opponents predicted will come true,'' Goodhope said. ''We know that for a fact.''

Voters Take On Pot, Sick Pay, Minimum Wage And Healthcare (LAT)

By Lee Romney And Steve Chawkins , Times Staff Writers, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092053

Voters on Tuesday weighed in on a vast array of local issues, with three cities leaning toward relaxed marijuana enforcement and San Francisco on the verge of becoming the first U.S. city to require all employers — regardless of size — to provide paid sick leave.

In San Francisco and Berkeley, voters were voicing their disapproval of the current administration in measures calling for the impeachment of President George W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney on grounds including warrantless spying and what were presented as other wartime civil rights violations.

In returns from Santa Monica, Santa Barbara and Santa Cruz, voters were siding with proposals requiring local police to make marijuana arrests their lowest priority. Financed largely by Ohio insurance magnate Peter Lewis, the measures were opposed by many police officers, who described the issues as unnecessary and a possible obstacle to investigating major crimes.

"I think voters here have sent a really clear message — that the war on drugs has failed and it's time for a new approach," said Lara Cassell, an organizer of the effort in Santa Barbara.

In San Francisco and Santa Cruz, worker advocates pushed measures that alarmed small business owners. The San Francisco sick leave measure — which would apply even to part-time and temporary help — was placed on the ballot on the last possible day by four county supervisors and is backed by the group Young Workers United. As the evening wore on, the measure appeared to be headed for victory, to the chagrin of some business groups.

"For this to end up on the ballot, let alone passing without any public comment, without any discussion, is more than unfortunate. It's outrageous," said San Francisco Chamber of Commerce President Steve Falk. "This amounts to a 3.5% increase in costs for all businesses that don't provide sick days now, without any discussion of alternatives."

Voters in Santa Cruz, meanwhile, seemed doubtful about a citywide boost in the minimum wage, to $9.25, with automatic yearly increases. San Francisco, Santa Fe, N.M., and Washington, D.C., have similar citywide minimums, and proponent Nora Hochman said Santa Cruz needs one because it has "Burger King wage levels" with some of the steepest housing and gas prices in the country.

"My nickname is Nora 'You're ruining Santa Cruz' Hochman," she said. "The perception is business is going to fail wholesale. Well, that hasn't happened in any other community, and it's not going to happen here."

Also in Santa Cruz, voters were picking sides in a nasty town versus gown dispute, with the city seeking to curtail campus growth. On Tuesday, they appeared to heavily favor a measure barring the city from providing services to UC Santa Cruz until the university agrees to offset environmental strains.

Development measures in San Luis Obispo and Santa Clara counties also were bitterly debated before Tuesday's election. In San Luis Obispo County, voters were on the way to approving a long-debated shopping center that was designed to placate environmentalists with a butterfly preserve, an organic farm and more.

In Santa Clara County, a measure that would restrict development on ranchland and open hillsides was trailing late in the evening. Proponents called it a key to smart-growth policies, while opponents saw it as an attack on private property rights.

In several areas across the state, rural hospitals captured the attention of voters.

Nowhere was the situation as stark as in Trinity County, where officials had said that if two tax measures failed, they would be forced to begin shutting down the public hospital Wednesday.

That would have left no emergency room in the remote county, hours from the nearest hospital. On Tuesday night, the measures were approved by a wide margin.

"It's a huge thing for the community," said County Administrator Larry Layton, who said layoff notices had already been drafted. "They got what they need to keep the hospital in continuous operation."

In Mendocino County, voters were asked to choose between the recently deceased longtime incumbent, Norm Vroman, and his challenger, attorney Meredith Lintott. If Vroman wins, the Board of Supervisors will appoint a successor. Meanwhile, the acting district attorney has gone to court seeking a special election.

No matter the outcome, the 1st District Court of Appeal has ordered the results sealed, for now.

Many Local Measures Approved (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Martha Groves, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

Santa Monica residents vote for clean beaches, clean government. Pasadenans opt to strengthen campaign finance reforms.

Voters in several Los Angeles County cities approved a slew of local ballot measures in Tuesday's election, addressing issues ranging from political reform and street parking to preserving open space and clean beaches.

Nearly a dozen municipalities put a total of 18 measures on local ballots.

Claremont voters approved Measure S, a $12.5-million bond measure to purchase and preserve a 183-acre parcel of open space that has long been a favorite of hikers and nature lovers in eastern Los Angeles County.

Residents had rejected an earlier attempt by city officials to pass a special assessment to buy the land, known as Johnson's Pasture. On Tuesday, the bond measure, backed by the mayor and three City Council members, passed with 70% of the vote.

To the west, Pasadena voters approved clarifications to a 2001 City Charter reform intended to tighten campaign contributions. Measure B, which passed on a 61% to 39% vote, would ban those bidding for city contracts worth more than $25,000 from making political contributions and give county prosecutors power to call witnesses and bring charges in political corruption cases.

More important, the vote settles a bitter legal fight led by the Pasadena City Council, which argued that political reforms passed in 2001 were unclear and overly burdensome.

Those casting ballots in Pasadena were far less kind to Measure A, which proposed allowing the National Football League to renovate the landmark Rose Bowl for use by a pro football team. Voters threw the measure for a big loss, defeating it 72% to 28%.

In Santa Monica, voters defeated an effort to alter one of the nation's toughest clean-government laws, which bans politicians from taking campaign cash or employment from anyone doing business with the city.

With all of the votes counted, 53% of the city's voters rejected Proposition W, which the City Council had backed. The measure would have overturned the Oaks Amendment, passed in 2000.

"At the end of a very long ballot, the public rejected undue influence by developers and other special interests in local government," said Carmen Balber of Election Watchdog, a political action committee sponsored by the Campaign for Consumer Rights.

An overwhelming majority — 71% — voted for Proposition U, which gives the Santa Monica city manager the power to hire and fire city department heads without having to get approval from boards and commissions. In doing so, Santa Monica followed such cities as Beverly Hills, Burbank, Culver City and Long Beach, which have exempted department heads from Civil Service employment rules in an effort to make government more responsive.

Two-thirds of voters favored Proposition V, which would levy a parcel tax for cleaning up heavily polluted beaches and Santa Monica Bay.

And a resounding 65% of voters approved Proposition Y, which would make the personal use of marijuana by adults on private property the city's lowest police enforcement priority. Santa Monicans for Sensible Marijuana Policy had said the measure would send a message to Sacramento and Washington that voters want more common-sense marijuana laws.

Inglewood residents turned away a proposed 0.5% increase in the city sales tax to raise money for police and emergency services.

Lakewood voters overwhelmingly approved two measures to keep their streets clear by making it illegal to park a recreational vehicle or trailer on a public street without a permit.

And in Westlake Village, 55% of voters rejected a measure to amend the city's general plan to develop 22 acres of private land into a retail complex anchored by a home improvement store.

Voters Not High On Pot Amendment (GJS)

Grand Junction Sentinel, November 8, 2006

Colorado voters have pitched Amendment 44 aside like an assortment of stems and seeds found at the bottom of an empty bag of weed.

Tuesday's election results showed that the amendment failed by a wide margin statewide. Across Colorado 688,987 or 60.7 percent voted against the amendment, compared to 445,280 votes or 39.3 percent, in favor.

In Mesa County, voters turned the amendment down by an even greater margin. Results were 31,637 votes or 68.2 percent against Amendment 44 and 14,240 or 30.7 percent in favor.

The amendment would have decriminalized possession of less than one ounce of marijuana by adults over the age of 21. Currently state law makes possession of an ounce or less of pot a class 2 petty offense punishable by a fine of up to $100.

Though David Cox of Palisade and Rex Newkirk of Grand Junction are among the minority of voters in this year's election, they say they will continue breaking the law partaking of the green herb where and when they choose.

For them the amendment was never about personal use, it was about reforming a system.

"The idea of this wasn't to change our personal lives, but to dismantle a criminal infrastructure by moving toward regulation," said Cox, a member of SAFER Colorado, the organization that got Amendment 44 onto this year's ballot.

"I never expected it to pass the first time," he said. "Everyone who was working on this was hoping it would pass, but anyone who is realistic knew it wouldn't."

Cox, 25, says he has been smoking pot for the last seven years. But it wasn't always that way.

"My mom caught me trying to smoke marijuana when I was 12," said Cox, who works on his father's peach farm in Palisade. "And she put a stop to it."

It wasn't until six years later that he got high.

"It was the most terrifying experience I ever had," Cox said. "I could tell that this substance was a strong step away from reality."

Then, sometime before graduating from the University of Colorado at Boulder with a bachelor's degree in electrical engineering, he got stoned again.

"We had a fantastic time, a phenomenal time," he said.

Now Cox, will smoke up to four times in a week, but never to excess, he said.

"I got too many dreams. I got too many other things to do with my life then get high all day," Cox said.

Newkirk, 51, is the owner of a tower painting company, ABC Tower Services, said he has been smoking since the eighth grade. "Marijuana is not a drug; it's an herb, a plant," Newkirk said shortly before torching a bowl of weed at Lincoln Park.

He got his start smoking marijuana when he and a friend scored some bud and smoked it off the top of an empty can of chewing tobacco, he said. Newkirk says these days an ounce of weed, which costs him $25, will last a week or two. Nearly everyone he knows smokes marijuana.

"At least 85 percent of them smoke marijuana," Newkirk said. "I meet very few people who don't smoke marijuana."

But there are people who begin smoking and find the smoke too thick to handle. Those are the people Carol Mulligan, co-owner of Inner Journey Counseling in Grand Junction, sees daily. She said the use of marijuana pulls people into social circles they might not otherwise be involved with, because in order to buy marijuana, you have to visit a criminal.

"It could be putting you into that lifestyle," she said. "It could be the start of experimenting with other drugs and into another lifestyle."

But that is why people like Cox and Newkirk say it is time to legalize marijuana.

Decriminalizing marijuana and making it available to purchase legally could break up existing social circles. It could eliminate the "us vs. them" feeling experienced by those who regularly break the law to buy and smoke marijuana, Cox and Newkirk said.

"I like policemen; I fear bad laws," Newkirk said. "This is all about liberty."

Voters Decide On Ballot Initiatives, Proposals On Social Issues (WINS)

DOJ_NMG_0092056

WINS Radio, November 8, 2006

NEW YORK (1010 WINS) -- The House, Senate and Gubernatorial races were not the only choices facing voters Tuesday.

A score of initiatives, proposals and amendments appeared on ballots in 37 states, including gay marriage bans, gay marriage definitions, marijuana legalization and animal rights.

South Dakota voters Tuesday rejected a sweeping abortion ban that would outlaw the procedure under almost any circumstances, effectively blocking a challenge to Roe v. Wade.

Earlier this year the state legislature in South Dakota voted to pass a similar measure, which would ban abortion even of pregnancies resulting from incest or rape, except if the mother's life was at stake, but opponents of the ban pushed to allow South Dakotans to decide the measure at the voting booth instead. The measure was struck down 56 percent to 44 percent. It would have been the toughest abortion law in the nation, allowing the procedure only to save a pregnant woman's life.

In Arizona alone, voters were met with 19 separate measures, more than any other state.

Arizona voted against gestation crates for pigs and sheep, which some say are too small for pregnant animals to turn around. Michigan voted to ban any hunt of the state's "bird of peace," the mourning dove.

Michigan residents also voted to bar affirmative action with respect to employment in public institutions such as education.

Arizona voters approved four proposals that arose out of frustration over the influx of illegal immigrants: one measure makes English the state's official language, while another expands the list of government benefits denied to illegal immigrants.

Voters weren't keen about another, more quirky Arizona measure: They defeated a proposal that would have awarded $1 million to a randomly selected voter in each general election.

Arizona also bucked a strong national trend by refusing to change its constitution to define marriage as a one-man, one-woman institution. The measure also would have forbidden civil unions and domestic partnerships.

A total of eight states voted on amendments to ban gay marriage: Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin approved them. Similar amendments have passed previously in all 20 states to consider them.

In Colorado specifically, voters supported the definition of marriage into the state's constitution by a wide margin. Many votes from Colorado counties have yet to be counted, but according to the Denver Post so far Wednesday many suburban Colorado areas outside Denver opposed giving same-sex couples the same rights as heterosexual married couples, like legal rights for inheritance and medical purposes. Denver itself has yet to be counted.

Minimum wage increase proposals varied. In Ohio the increase would raise the minimum wage of $5.15 an hour to $6.85 an hour, with an annual cost of living increase.

Nevada decided Tuesday they didn't want legalized marijuana sold at state-sanctioned pot shops and approved constitutional amendments raising Nevada's minimum wage and curbing government seizures of private property.

The question to legalize adult possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana and require the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale failed 58 percent to 42 percent.

The setting of Nevada's minimum wage at $1 above the federal standard was given final approval. It previously had been well-received by Nevandans in 2004.

Nevadans also appeared to favor the more restrictive of measures to limit exposure to secondhand smoke.

The questions on secondhand smoke both sought to restrict smoking in public places, but to varying degrees. With about half the votes tallied, the lesser of the two options was narrowly failing, while more restrictive, which imposes tougher limits on secondhand smoke, was passing.

A question on the Nevada ballot requiring lawmakers to fund education before other state budgets, also was favored in partial returns.

The Missouri stem cell measure passed by a narrow margin. It had become a key factor in the state's crucial Senate race, won by Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill, who supported it, over incumbent Republican Jim Talent, who opposed it.

In Ohio and Arizona, anti-smoking activists won showdowns with R.J. Reynolds Tobacco company. Voters in each state approved a tough ban on smoking in public places and rejected rival, Reynolds-backed measures that would have exempted bars. Voters in Arizona and South Dakota approved increases in tobacco taxes, while similar proposals were voted down in Missouri and California.

Colorado voters joined Nevada in rejecting measures that would have legalized possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by anyone 21 and older. South Dakotans voted down a proposal that would have allowed marijuana use for some medical purposes. A winning measure in Rhode Island will restore voting rights to felons on probation and parole.

Elsewhere, land use was a hot issue, part of a backlash against a 2005 Supreme Court ruling allowing the city of New London, Conn., to buy up homes to make way for a private commercial development.

The concept of "eminent domain" was prevalent on ballots in Florida, Georgia, Arizona, California, South Carolina, Oregon, Arizona, North Dakota, Michigan and New Hampshire. Voters approved measures in all these states to restrict the government's power to use eminent domain to seize privately owned land for other private development.

California rejected the restriction on eminent domain. Arizona's winning measure went beyond the others, requiring state and local authorities to compensate property owners if land-use regulations lowered the value of their property: Idaho rejected a similar measure.

South Dakota voters defeated a measure that would have made their state the first to strip immunity from judges, exposing them to the possibility of lawsuits. In Maine, Nebraska and Oregon, voters defeated measures that would cap increases in state spending.

Pennsylvania voters gave the state the go-ahead to borrow $20 million so that nearly 33,000 veterans in the state who participated in the Persian Gulf War could collect one-time payments up to $525.

In Alaska, voters rejected a proposal to tax North Slope oil companies $1 billion a year until a natural gas pipeline is built. The tax would have been levied against the leaseholders of the North Slope's 35 trillion cubic feet of natural gas reserves until the gas starts flowing to market. Opponents of the measure said the tax would have killed the $25 billion pipeline project; proponents said it was the only way to force oil companies to commit to building a pipeline.

Nevadans: Say No To Pot, Raise Minimum Wage, Restrict Smoking (AP)

AP, November 8, 2006

RENO, Nev. (AP) - Nevadans on Tuesday rejected selling legalized marijuana at state-sanctioned pot shops, approved the tougher of two competing anti-smoking measures, raised the minimum wage and took steps to curb government seizures of private property.

At the same time, voters denied a measure twice approved by the Legislature to pay lawmakers for every day they work, instead of capping salaries at the current 60-day limit.

Question 7, to legalize adult possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana and require the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale failed, 56 percent to 44 percent.

The dueling anti-smoking initiatives had different outcomes.

Polls showed early support for both anti-smoking measures slipping as Election Day approached, and proponents acknowledged voters seemed confused by similar ballot language.

Question 4, a business-backed initiative called the Responsibly Protect Nevadans from Second-Hand Smoke Act, would have imposed minimal restrictions on smoking in areas of bars and restaurants that allow children. It failed 52 percent to 48 percent.

Instead voters approved the Clean Indoor Air Act backed by public health groups. It bans smoking in any bars that serve meals, as well as in slot machine sections of grocery and convenience stores, video arcades, shopping malls, school grounds and day-care centers. Question 5, which still permits smoking in gambling areas of casinos, was approved 54 percent to 46 percent.

Voters gave final approval to setting Nevada's minimum wage $1 above the federal standard, currently $5.15 an hour, with 69 percent voting yes and 31 percent voting no. The measure, which provides an exemption for employers to offer health insurance, passed by a similar margin in 2004.

It also includes automatic cost-of-living increases based on inflation, capped at 3 percent a year, unless the federal government raises its minimum wage - something that hasn't happened since 1997.

A measure placing restrictions on government use of eminent domain was approved 63 percent to 37 percent. It will appear again on the ballot in 2008.

Another constitutional amendment requiring lawmakers to fund education before other state budgets also received final voter approval, 55 percent to 45 percent.

Two other proposed constitutional amendments passed by the 2003 and 2005 legislatures were put to voters and rejected.

One allowing state lawmakers to call themselves into special session failed 52 percent to 48 percent. Another reducing the size of the Board of Regents and changing how they are selected was narrowly defeated, 51 percent to 49 percent.

Voters also overwhelming amended the state's sales tax to exempt farm machinery while expanding exemptions for the trade-in value of used vehicles. That measure passed 69 percent to 31 percent.

While other states and local governments have decriminalized possession of small amounts of marijuana, the Nevada measure sponsored by the Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana went further. It directed the state Department of Taxation to set up procedures to license and regulate pot growers, distributors and retailers.

Backers argued law enforcement spends too much time and money arresting small-time dope smokers, and that legalizing marijuana would not only raise tax dollars for the state, but free officers to concentrate on more violent crimes.

Critics - including law enforcement, civic groups and the nation's drug czar - countered that marijuana is a gateway drug that could lead to harsher substances and negate anti-drug efforts.

Regardless, they argued that possession, sale and cultivation would still be illegal under federal law and likely not be tolerated by federal authorities.

Voters Say No To Legalizing Marijuana, Yes To Hiking Minimum Wage And Eminent Domain (EN)

Ely News, November 8, 2006

Nevada voters were just saying no to legalizing marijuana, welcoming a hike in the state's minimum wage and keeping alive eminent domain reform, among other decisions on ballot initiatives on Tuesday's ballot.

With at least 1,620 of 1,913 precincts statewide reporting, Question 7, which would have allowed Nevada residents 21 years of age or older to possess an ounce of marijuana or less, was being rejected by 56 percent of voters. Only 44 percent were in support.

Las Vegas police Lt. Stan Olsen, who oversees legislative affairs for the department and who worked against Question 7, said the measure, the latest in a string of failed efforts to legalize the drug here, was pushed by outsiders rather than Nevadans.

"They were trying to use us as a social experiment, as lab rats. Voters are engaged. They're bright. This was a bad bill of goods, and they knew it," Olsen said. "The voters didn't want it. The community didn't want it. There's nothing good that can come out of legalizing marijuana."

Despite the apparent loss, backers of the measure were heartened by the turnout in favor of the measure.

"This will be the all-time biggest vote for ending marijuana prohibition in the history of this country," said Neal Levine, Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana campaign manager. "This is an enormous amount of progress. Unfortunately, we fell a little bit short."

Levine said his group would continue its efforts to win over Silver State voters and "it is a 100 percent certainty this will be back on the ballot" in 2008 or 2010.

Outside a Henderson polling place, Jim Taylor, a 50-year-old Henderson Republican, said he was strongly against Question 7.

"They want to legalize marijuana, but I think that's not a solution, it actually makes more of a problem," he said.

But 25-year-old Larry McKenzie, a Henderson voter who described himself as independent, said he wanted the measure to pass.

DOJ_NMG_0092059

"They waste so much time arresting people who smoke weed when they could invest that cop time and jail space in worse crimes," McKenzie said. "I have friends who are potheads. They're not going to change, and they're not hurting anybody. My friends are very harmless."

Voters were backing Question 6, which would raise the minimum wage by $1 an hour, to $6.15, on Jan. 1. Those in favor of passage led those against, 69 percent to 31 percent.

Question 6 also would automatically tie future increases to changes in the consumer price index.

"People know you can't live off of the minimum wage, much less eat off the minimum wage," said Danny Thompson, executive secretary-treasurer of the Nevada AFL-CIO labor union, which supported the measure. "That's reflected in the (voting) numbers."

Thompson believes the increase is modest, and "is not going to destroy any businesses. It's not going to drive people out of Nevada."

Even though voters were supporting Question 2 by a 62 percent to 38 percent margin, the measure restricting how and when local and state governments can forcibly seize private land using eminent domain won't become law anytime soon.

The measure -- also known as the People's Initiative to Stop the Taking of Our Land, or PISTOL -- is a proposed constitutional amendment and, as such, must pass voter muster again in 2008 before it can take effect.

"The people know we need to have some kind of harness put on government to make sure there are not these technical ways to use eminent domain and take people's property," said Don Chairez, a PISTOL backer. "The people really feel we can't trust the politicians" to fix the problem.

Nonetheless, Clark County Commissioner Bruce Woodbury, who headed the PISTOL opposition and also chairs the Regional Transportation Commission, is urging the 2007 Legislature to enact its own eminent domain restrictions prior to the 2008 vote, in hopes of nixing the need for PISTOL.

Both Woodbury and Chairez said they are amenable to discussions on how to rewrite law to match PISTOL's intent while addressing governmental concerns that PISTOL would cripple public works projects. That doesn't mean Chairez is willing to sacrifice PISTOL, though.

"The bottom line is, we need PISTOL as a safety valve," Chairez said.

In other ballot questions Tuesday, voters were in support of Question 1, which would require the Legislature to fund public education before other state programs. The measure, which would go into effect in time for the 2007 Legislature, led with 55 percent of the vote, with 45 percent against.

Question 8, which would end sales taxes on the value of a trade-in when buying a vehicle at an auto dealership, was winning by a wide margin, 69 percent to 31 percent. It would also exempt farm equipment from sales tax.

Question 11, which would lift pay limits on legislators, was opposed by 70 percent of voters. Only 30 percent supported the idea of paying legislators for up to 120 days worked, rather than capping pay at the regular session's 60-day limit.

Voters were tightly split on Question 10, which would allow the Legislature to call itself into special session. It was being rejected by 52 percent of voters, with 48 percent behind it. Currently, only the governor can call a special session.

Question 9, which would shrink the size of the state's Board of Regents that oversees state colleges and allow the governor to appoint some of its members, also was closely contested, with 51 percent against and 49 percent in favor.

Lyon Says No To Stricter Smoking Laws, Legal Marijuana (RGJ)

Reno Gazette Journal, November 8, 2006

With Lyon's polls closed and votes tallied late Tuesday night, questions Nos. 4 and 5, regarding creation of stricter smoking bans in various public places were both voted down on the County level alongside Question No. 7 regarding legalization and regulation of one ounce or less of marijuana.

In Lyon, Question No. 4 was answered with 57.60% "no" (42.40% "yes") while Question No. 5's margin was slimmer with 51.23% "no" (48.77% "yes"). Question No. 7 stood at 59.01% "no" and 40.99% "yes".

As of 11:20 p.m., with all but three counties reporting numbers and nearly all reporting at 100 percent, related questions on the state level were looking favorable for approval to Question No. 5 and close but not as favorable for No. 4. Also No. 7 was leaning toward "no" by nearly 10 percent

All Lyon precincts had reported in and votes counted near 11 p.m. with ballot questions in tow. Other Lyon-specific ballot questions and results are as follows:

-Question No. 14: Regarding authorization to issue general obligation school bonds to finance construction, improvement and equipping of school facilities; Yes (59.17%) No (40.83%)

-Question No. 15: Regarding the Lyon County Board of Commissioners adopting an ordinance to increase sales tax in Lyon one quarter of one percent; Yes (44.28%) No (55.72%)

-Question No. 16 regarding formation of a mosquito abatement general improvement district within Smith Valley; Yes (50.34%) No (49.66%)

Results for remaining ballot questions, as reported in Lyon County, are as follows:

-Question No. 1: Regarding the State Legislature funding public schools before any other item in the State budget; Yes (45.23%) No (54.77%)

-Question No. 2: Regarding property valuation in eminent domain cases; Yes (60.32%) No (39.68%)

-Question No. 6: Regarding increase of minimum wage; Yes (63.70%) No (36.30%)

Voters Reject Eight Of Eleven Issues (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

SIOUX FALLS (AP) -- Whatever the reason -- too many issues, too long, too confusing -- South Dakota voters rejected eight of the 11 issues on Tuesday's general election ballot.

The one that attracted the most attention was the referral of the 2006 state law that would have banned all abortions. That law was rejected 55 percent to 45 percent.

Other measures that failed would have repealed video lottery, legalized medical marijuana, changed how property taxes are assessed, allowed people to sue judges, opened up legislative hearings, lowered the tax on cell phones, and required school to start after Aug. 31.

Ballot measures that passed Tuesday raise the tax on cigarettes, limit the use of state aircraft and change the state constitution to ban gay marriage.

Dale Baker, 77, a retired mechanic from Burke, said he prepared for the long ballot by studying a sample ballot and the attorney general's explanation of the measures before voting on Tuesday.

The same with Ron Kjellson, 70, of Watertown. He read newspaper stories about the long list of ballot measures before deciding how to vote.

"I made a little cheat sheet for myself and listed out everything I wanted to do," he said.

VIDEO LOTTERY

For the fourth time since it began 17 years ago, South Dakota voters said they want to keep the state-sanctioned video lottery -- and the millions of dollars it raises.

This time, the measure passed 67 percent to 33 percent.

Video lottery supporters said dumping the games would cut $112 million a year from the state budget, creating a financial crisis for state government and jeopardizing state funding of schools.

Martha Berry, a 70-year-old retiree from Box Elder, said she voted to keep the games because they have benefited more than they have harmed. She said removing the funding source could have forced legislators to implement an income tax.

"Income tax wouldn't affect us, basically, but I see young couples that can't afford another tax," she said.

Berry said she thinks more of the proceeds should go to education.

SUING JUDGES

A constitutional amendment that opponents said would create chaos in the courthouses and halls of local government was soundly defeated.

A ballot issue that would have let people seek criminal charges or file lawsuits against judges and other government officials they believe have violated their rights failed 89 percent to 11 percent.

Supporters said it would apply only to judges. But opponents said it would include members of school boards, county commissions and city councils because those officials sometimes make decisions of a judicial nature.

Cathy Bultsma, 62, of Platte, said she voted against the amendment because she believes it would have provided too many opportunities for people unhappy with court decisions to make trouble.

GAY MARRIAGE

South Dakota's constitution will be getting new language that says only a marriage between a man and a woman is valid.

The amendment, which passed voters 52 percent to 48 percent, invalidates civil unions, domestic partnerships or other "quasi-marital" relationships in South Dakota.

A gay marriage ban already is in state law, but proponents of the amendment said putting it in the constitution makes it harder for judges to mess with it.

MEDICAL MARIJUANA

South Dakotans have rejected a proposed law that would have let some people smoke marijuana to provide relief from pain.

Supporters of the proposal wanted South Dakota to become the 12th state to allow some medical patients to smoke marijuana.

But it was defeated 52 percent to 48 percent.

Law officers said allowing medical marijuana would send a mixed message to children concerning drug use.

PROPERTY TAXES

A plan to change the way homes and other real estate are assessed for tax purposes was defeated Tuesday.

Opponents of Amendment D garnered 80 percent, while the plan received 20 percent support.

The plan would have used the sales price of each piece of real estate as its assessed value in the future.

State Sen. Bill Napoli of Rapid City, who promoted the amendment, had said the measure would prevent large increases in assessments that are caused when similar property is sold for inflated prices.

CELL PHONES

An attempt to repeal a 4 percent tax on the gross receipts of cellular telephone companies went begging Tuesday.

Opponents of the repeal outnumbered supporters 61 percent to 39 percent.

Verizon Wireless forced the public vote after losing a court challenge of the gross receipts tax.

The 2003 Legislature passed the tax to help balance South Dakota's budget, with the state getting 60 percent and counties 40 percent. Lawmakers at the time said it was fair because other kinds of phone companies already pay property taxes or a gross receipts tax.

Ron Kjellson said he voted against the proposal, partly because it was pushed by an out-of-state company. "I don't think they're being taxed unfairly," he said.

OTHERS

-- South Dakota schools will not be forced to wait until at least Aug. 31 to start classes. Voters defeated Initiated Measure 3 by a margin of 57 percent to 43 percent.

-- State-owned aircraft should be limited to official business, voters decided. Initiated Measure 5 passed 55 percent to 45 percent.

-- The state tax on cigarettes will nearly triple, thanks to approval of Initiated Measure 2. The tobacco tax increase had 61 percent support to 39 percent opposition. The state tax on cigarettes goes to $1.53 a pack.

-- A special commission's recommendations dealing with the Legislature was defeated 68 percent to 32 percent.

Liberal Activists Hail Referendum Votes On Abortion, Gays (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

Democratic social values prevailed in many state elections, as voters rejected pro-life measures on abortion, passed a measure supporting embryonic stem-cell research and, for the first time, defeated a measure to restrict marriage to one man-one woman unions.

"Women voters cleaned house. Women are fed up" with Iraq policy, the "so-called economic recovery" and the "relentless efforts to limit women's reproductive rights," the liberal National Organization for Women said.

"American voters sent a clear message yesterday that the era of gay-bashing to win elections is over, as voters flatly rejected anti-gay and divisive candidates," said Joe Solmonese, president of Human Rights Campaign, which spent $5 million on election-related activities.

The elections show "that supporting fairness for gay and lesbian families is not a liability, while aligning with the extreme Christian right is," said the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force (NGLTF), which is meeting this week with 2,000 homosexual rights activists in Kansas City, Mo., to review the elections and plan strategies.

Referring to the defeat of Arizona's Proposition 107, which would have defined marriage as only the union of one man and one woman, NGLTF leader Matt Foreman said the marriage issue "just doesn't have the juice it had just two years ago."

"People are getting sick of it," he said.

Tuesday wasn't a full sweep for liberal social issues -- measures to legalize marijuana failed in three states, a well-funded Colorado measure to create a domestic-partner system didn't survive and seven state marriage amendments passed.

Still, the results were sobering to leaders of social conservatives.

"The values voters of 2004 could be called the integrity voters of 2006," Family Research Council President Tony Perkins said. "The message is that values are not just something you talk about at election time. Values should guide public policies and personal conduct. This should be a clear message to both parties that values voters vote values, not party.

"That revelation may be an inescapable reality for Republicans, but it should serve as a warning to the many Democrats who leveraged the values gap by running as pro-life, pro-family candidates," Mr. Perkins added. "Those integrity voters will be back at the polls in two short years."

Among the Democrat victories were passage of a Missouri measure to allow embryonic stem-cell research and defeats of "parent notification" abortion measures in California and Oregon and a ban on abortions in South Dakota. In Kansas, voters also failed to re-elect Attorney General Phill Kline, who has been in a court battle to obtain 90 abortion records as evidence of illegal late-term abortions, child rape and other crimes. Democrat Paul Morrison said Tuesday he will look at Mr. Kline's evidence, but he is expected to drop the case.

Winners & Losers (USAT)

USA Today, November 9, 2006

There's more to the election results than just Democrats winning and Republicans losing.

Thumbs up

Uncertainty: Once again, Americans woke up the day after an election with key races still undecided.

Vice President Cheney: He spent Election Day in South Dakota, hunting for the first time since he accidentally shot a companion in February. This time, there were no reports of injuries.

Sen. Barack Obama: The Illinois Democrat wasn't on Tuesday's ballot, but he barnstormed the country to help candidates, published a best-selling book, landed on the covers of Time and Newsweek— and mentioned that he just might run for president in 2008.

Sen. Joe Lieberman: This year's Comeback Kid, he won another term in Connecticut as an independent after losing the Democratic primary.

Michael J. Fox: The actor, who has Parkinson's disease, campaigned for candidates who support stem-cell research and was accused of exaggerating his symptoms by conservative radio host Rush Limbaugh. Candidates backed by Fox in Missouri, Wisconsin and Maryland won, and Missouri voters approved protections on the research.

YouTube: The video-sharing Internet site was the place to debut campaign ads this year. A clip of Sen. George Allen, R-Va., calling a rival's volunteer "macaca" was viewed almost 300,000 times.

Presidential vetoes: President Bush vetoed just one bill in his first six years. Democrats' new clout on Capitol Hill means he might be wielding his veto pen more often.

Howard Dean: The Democratic Party chairman feuded with top Democrats in Congress over his plan to send cash to states where his party typically doesn't win much. It paid off with victories in red states such as Montana and Colorado.

Voting and drinking: Oklahoma voters approved a referendum allowing liquor stores to stay open on Election Day; they had been limited to sales from 7-9 p.m. only.

Dead candidates: In Texas, Republican state Rep. Glenda Dawson died two months ago but easily defeated Democratic challenger Anthony Dinovo. In South Dakota, Democrat Marie Steichen, also dead for two months, defeated incumbent Republican county commissioner Merlin Feistner.

Thumbs down

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld: Somebody in the administration had to take a hit in the wake of Tuesday's Democratic wins, although one might wonder if things would have turned out better for Bush if Rumsfeld had left a week earlier.

The Bush dynasty: George H.W. Bush is happily retired; George W. Bush can't run again; term limits precluded brother Jeb from another campaign for Florida governor. When will George P. Bush, 30, Jeb's son and the likeliest candidate from the next generation, be ready?

Karl Rove: The "architect" of Bush's campaigns predicted GOP victories on Tuesday and was wrong. So much for his hopes of a permanent Republican majority.

Conspiracy theorists: Warnings that voting machines were rigged to favor Republicans didn't pan out.

Washington Redskins fans: Former quarterback Heath Shuler, reviled during his 1990s tenure as a Redskin, heads back to town after winning a North Carolina seat in the House of Representatives. Shuler, a Democrat, was 4-15 in games he played in three losing seasons with the Redskins.

Sen. John Kerry: The Massachusetts Democrat's botched joke implying that the uneducated end up in Iraq might have reminded people why they didn't vote for him two years ago.

Famous voters: Chelsea Clinton, South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, Republican Congressman Steve Chabot of Ohio and Missouri Secretary of State Robin Carnahan all had problems when they tried to vote.

Potheads: Voters in Colorado and Nevada rejected proposals to legalize adult possession of up to an ounce of marijuana. South Dakotans voted against medical use of marijuana.

Claim Under Marijuana Act Denied (WPI)

By Richard Hanners

Whitefish Pilot, November 8, 2006

A Kalispell man who claimed protection under the state's Medical Marijuana Act after he was caught smoking marijuana at a downtown Whitefish bar will have his day in court later this month.

But he may have to seek another line of defense or appeal to a higher court, now that Whitefish City Court Judge Bradley Johnson has denied the man's motion to dismiss the charge based on the act.

According to court records, on Sept. 8, Flathead County sheriff's deputy Travis Bruyer observed Lucas Venters, 23, of Kalispell, on the upstairs deck at Flanagan's Central Station lighting marijuana in a glass pipe. Venters then allegedly passed the pipe on to Andrew Nuckles, who then allegedly passed it on to Christopher Brann, both of Kalispell.

Bruyer reported that he seized the pipe and a container of marijuana from Venters. Venters told Bruyer his possession and use of marijuana was allowed under the state's Medical Marijuana Act. He was charged with possession of dangerous drugs and drug paraphernalia.

Nuckles and Brann were charged with misdemeanor possession of dangerous drugs. They received deferred sentences in Whitefish City Court and paid a $100 fine.

In a two-page document submitted to city court, Venters claims to have a "debilitating medical condition." He said he has been "in pain every day for the past 10 years due to my spinal, thoracic and neck injuries/conditions," and that he has severe or persistent muscle spasms.

"These spasms limit what type of work I can do, and what types of recreational activities/sports I can participate in," he said. "Some days, just bending my neck downward to tie my shoes, etc. causes my back to spasm quite painfully."

Venters claimed that state law allows individuals who suffer from a debilitating medical condition to smoke marijuana, and "that even if a user is not registered with the state Department of Public Health and Human Services, a medical defense may be raised under the Montana Medical Marijuana Act."

In his brief in opposition to Venters' motion to dismiss, Whitefish city prosecutor Clif Hayden set aside the possibility that federal law may preempt the state's Medical Marijuana Act in order to address Venters' case.

Hayden argued that Venters' conduct "does not fall within the parameters of the act" because he did not possess a registry identification card from the Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services.

Such a card may be obtained through application by providing the department with a written certification that the person is a qualifying patient; the name, address and date of birth of the qualifying patient; the name, address and phone number of the qualifying patient's physician; and the appropriate fee, Hayden said.

"According to the MMMA definitions, 'qualifying patient' means a person who has been diagnosed with a debilitating condition by a physician," he said. "In other words, you need an opinion from a licensed physician to register."

Hayden noted that according to the MMMA, evidence must be presented "that a physician has made a determination that the benefits of use of marijuana outweigh the potential harms for a given patient."

"In this case, the defendant offers nothing but his own analysis of how his alleged symptom fits the MMMA definitions," Hayden said. "He has offered no medical evidence, physician's opinion or otherwise that the benefits outweigh the potential harmful effects."

Johnson ruled on Venters' motion on Oct. 25, saying Venters "failed to assert facts that are vital to claiming protected status under the act."

"Recognizing the scrutiny that the act will invite from both state and federal authorities, the standard may require strict compliance by anyone attempting to invoke the act as a shield to prosecution," Johnson said.

Johnson agreed with Hayden that Venters had failed to satisfy the criteria of the act by not being officially designated as a qualifying patient. But Johnson went further, noting how Venters shared his pipe with two others on Flanagan's deck.

"Assuming that the defendant contends that his open smoking of marijuana was within the scope of 'medical use' as defined within section 50-46-102(5), his 'sharing' of his personal-use medical marijuana with others would tend to negate the limited protection granted by the legislature," Johnson said. "His actions would exceed the purpose of merely alleviating his personal symptoms or effects of his debilitating medical condition. Such activity would encompass criminal conduct not protected by the statutes."

Lawndale To Initiate Ban Of Marijuana Dispensaries (TORDB)

By Shirley Hsu

Torrence (CA) Daily Breeze, November 9, 2006

Leaders reject a recommendation to allow but regulate facilities that distribute pot for medicinal purposes.

Lawndale City Council members this week quickly shot down a proposal to regulate medical marijuana dispensaries in the city, opting instead to direct staff to look into banning the establishments altogether.

Without much discussion on the topic, the City Council voted unanimously Monday to reject the recommendation from the Planning Commission that it adopt the ordinance regulating dispensaries, praised by one medical marijuana advocate for being the most comprehensive set of regulations he had ever seen.

"This ordinance covers everything," said Chris Fusco, a field coordinator for medical marijuana advocacy group Americans for Safe Access, before the council's decision. "I think it perfectly addresses the concerns of the community and the needs of medical cannabis patients."

The ordinance would have required dispensaries not be located within 600 feet of schools, playgrounds, parks, churches and similar community centers; that they close before 7 p.m.; that they not allow minors without a parent; and that they have security guards to patrol the dispensary and a two-block radius surrounding it. Patrons must immediately leave the site and not consume medical marijuana until they return home.

Councilman Larry Rudolph made the motion to reject the ordinance and instead look into a ban.

"I don't think it's appropriate anywhere," he said, adding that because other South Bay cities have banned them, Lawndale would become a magnet for dispensaries. He said he believed drugs would get in the hands of children and that it was too easy to get a doctor's recommendation.

"Until the court sorts this one out, I don't want one here," he said, referring to the conflict between state law, which permits usage of the drug by "seriously ill" patients with doctors' recommendations, and federal law, which classifies the drug as a controlled substance.

Dispensaries have recently met with a cold reception in the South Bay, with Torrance, Gardena, Hawthorne, Hermosa Beach, Lomita, Rancho Palos Verdes and Redondo Beach issuing temporary or permanent bans. Lawndale in June enacted a temporary ban on the establishments.

The regulations Lawndale rejected would have prohibited alcohol, allowed the distribution of plant cuttings, and limited the amount of marijuana provided to individuals to amounts consistent with state law, a provision Fusco said showed foresight. Many of the regulations were similar to those approved in May by Los Angeles County supervisors for unincorporated areas of the county.

Two Lawndale residents spoke in opposition of marijuana dispensaries, and two others spoke in support.

DOJ_NMG_0092066

Bob Burrill of San Pedro, who with his wife had hoped to open a dispensary in Lawndale, said on-site consumption is necessary for employees and volunteers because many are patients themselves.

ATF Arrests Arkansas Man For Possessing Illegal Guns (NAMN)

By Trish Mehaffey

Northwest Arkansas Morning News, November 9, 2006

FAYETTEVILLE -- A Fayetteville militia member was arrested Wednesday by teams of special agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and other federal and state agencies and local police in connection with illegal firearms.

Fayetteville police Lt. Mike Reynolds said 14 search warrants were executed Wednesday in Fort Smith and Fayetteville and one of the warrants was for a lieutenant commander of the Militia of Washington County, Hollis "Wayne" Fincher, of 16085 East Black Oak Road.

"We assisted ATF and several other agencies in arresting Fincher. I don't believe he has a criminal history with us. That's all I can tell you," Reynolds said.

Washington County Sheriff Tim Helder said he couldn't comment on the arrest or Fincher.

Fincher was arrested without incident at his residence, according to an ATF news release.

Senior ATF Special Agent Austin R. Banks said he was restricted to releasing anything beyond the news release. He did confirm Fincher has no criminal record and he was the only person arrested.

The arrest and search warrants were the result of an eight-month investigation relating to the unlawful manufacture, possession and transfer of machine guns, Banks said.

A machine gun that can fire 550 rounds a minute and assorted 9 mm Sten submachine guns are stored in the Washington County militia's concrete and steel vault, according to information gathered from an interview conducted by The Morning News in March. Each weapon is stamped with the word "non-commercial" to prove the group holds the arms for militia purchases only and not for trade or sale.

Owners of automatic weapons must pay $200 to license each automatic weapon they own. Militia members avoided that by re-building government-destroyed automatic weapons for their own use, Paul Smith, militia commander said in March.

Fincher said in the March interview he believes Americans should proudly uphold the right to bear arms, stand up for land rights and not always accept the federal government as the supreme law of the land.

"What we've got to do today is hold our ground," Fincher said in March.

According to the militia's Web site, the headquarters is down the road from Fincher's address at 15566 E. Black Oak Road. The militia was formed July 4, 1994.

Thirteen additional federal search warrants were executed at different places in the Fort Smith-Fayetteville area, Banks said. The warrants are under seal at the direction of the U.S. Attorney for the Western Judicial District of Arkansas. All evidence seized during the execution of the warrants will be submitted to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the preparation of indictments in this investigation.

ATF, FBI, Washington County Sheriff's Department, Fayetteville Police Department, Springdale Police Department, Arkansas State Police, Arkansas State Bomb Squad and the Madison County Sheriff's Department all participated in the investigation.

The investigation was conducted under Project Safe Neighborhoods, the U.S. Department of Justice initiative that combines federal, state and local resources to combat violent gun crime. The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Arkansas will prosecute the case.

IMMIGRATION:

Va. Case Highlights Fraudulent Marriages (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

DOJ_NMG_0092067

USA Today, November 9, 2006

A Virginia man's guilty plea Wednesday to arranging sham marriages between U.S. citizens and Ghanaian immigrants reflects the government's increased focus on marriage fraud.

Eric Amoah, 42, a pharmacy technician from Ghana, was one of 22 people charged in the Washington, D.C., area two months ago with participating in a marriage and immigration fraud scheme. His sentence is pending.

Similar busts have occurred in the past year in California, New York and Utah. An investigation is underway in Gwinnett County, Ga., where two men are charged with bigamy for marrying at least 13 African women.

"We're definitely seeing more organizations" involved in marriage fraud, says James Spero, head of the Identity and Benefits Fraud Unit at U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). "We're stepping up our efforts."

Sham marriages for immigrants seeking citizenship have long been a problem. A marriage license can be the quickest way to gain the temporary legal status conferred by a green card, the title of a 1990 movie about two people who enter into such a marriage of convenience only to — surprise — fall in love.

Since 9/11, marriage fraud has taken on more serious implications. Half of 36 foreign-born suspected terrorists who were in the USA from the early 1990s to 2004 gained legal status by marrying Americans — 10 of them through sham marriages — according to the Center for Immigration Studies, which promotes tighter immigration controls.

Janice Kephart, former counsel to the 9/11 Commission, which produced the center's research, says the government is not doing enough to crack down on marriage fraud.

"They simply don't have the resources," Kephart says. She says U.S. officials go after ringleaders of schemes more than the immigrants who marry.

Alfred Robertson, the attorney representing Amoah, agrees that immigration laws need better enforcement. He says immigration officials lack funding to hire enough agents to investigate applications for legal status.

Spero says ICE is working with other agencies in 11 new task forces and has increased the number of identity and benefit fraud cases it is investigating, from 2,300 in fiscal 2004 to 3,434 in fiscal 2006, including about 700 involving marriage fraud.

Spero says some U.S. citizens are duped into marrying an immigrant who simply wants a green card. Others, he says, commit a felony, punishable by jail time and a $250,000 fine, by knowingly entering into a sham marriage.

He says organizations typically charge $2,500 to $6,000 to arrange a marriage. Amassing evidence that a couple has taken the next steps toward permanent residency or citizenship, such as living together, costs more. On the West Coast, he says, one full-service scheme charged $60,000.

Robertson says Amoah, who married a U.S. citizen himself, helped arranged 75 to 300 marriages, most of which were fraudulent. "He knew what he was doing was wrong," Robertson says, adding that Amoah faces possible deportation.

'No' To Immigration Hard-liners (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

ARIZONA HELD A referendum on immigration policy Tuesday. The winner was John McCain.

McCain, the state's senior senator, wasn't actually on the ballot. Rather, candidates across the state campaigned for or against an idea that McCain and a few other Arizonans in Congress have championed: a comprehensive approach to immigration reform that provides more visas for guest workers, modifies the path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country and improves border security.

Critics of this approach, including Republican candidates for governor, attorney general and two of Arizona's eight House seats, argued instead for sealing the borders and enforcing current immigration laws. They all were defeated, despite the frustration and anger expressed by many Arizonans about the torrent of border jumpers.

Those emotions were evident in the overwhelming support Tuesday for ballot initiatives to deny bail, curtail subsidies for education and childcare, limit civil damage awards for illegal immigrants and make English the state's official language. Voters backed all these proposals, reflecting a widespread belief that illegal immigrants impose a variety of burdens on taxpayers.

Nevertheless, voters in the state demanded a more nuanced and pragmatic solution than that being offered by the most virulently anti-illegal immigration candidates. The best illustrations came in the races for two House seats, one representing the sparsely populated border counties in southeastern Arizona and the other representing some upscale suburbs east of Phoenix. A six-term Republican incumbent, J.D. Hayworth, and a former Republican state representative, Randy Graf — both known for their firebrand stances on border security — lost to Democrats Harry Mitchell and Gabrielle Giffords, who had aligned themselves on immigration with McCain.

Graf was trying to win the seat occupied by retiring Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe, a longtime advocate for comprehensive reform. While McCain and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) were steering their plan through the Senate, Kolbe and colleague Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) were trying to push a similar approach through the House, with significant Democratic support. But they were rebuffed by Republican leaders who wanted to use immigration as a campaign issue — in particular, by slamming Democrats for supporting "amnesty" and being soft on border security.

Now McCain and Flake may get their way. With Democrats in control of the House next year, the prospects for a comprehensive overhaul have improved dramatically. In fact, President Bush (who also supports that approach) singled out immigration Wednesday as an issue ripe for bipartisanship. The voters of Arizona have pushed a comprehensive solution one step closer to reality.

TAX:

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Democrats have pledged "fiscal discipline," starting with pay-as-you-go rules to prohibit the House from approving new spending or tax measures unless the costs are offset by tax increases or spending cuts.

"There's not going to be, frankly, room for some grand new adventure in federal spending," said Rep. Earl Pomeroy (D-N.D.), a member of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Still, there's plenty on the Democratic wish list, starting with relief for the growing number of middle-class families hit by the alternative minimum tax, which jacks up their tax bills. Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), likely to be the next Ways and Means chairman, said yesterday that "tackling this very complex problem would be a good test of bipartisanship."

Rangel said he would not roll back tax cuts that President Bush won from the Republican Congress. But budget experts predict that Democrats will revisit at least some of them, such as lower rates for the richest Americans, lower rates on capital gains and dividends, and partial repeal of the estate tax, to pay for other priorities.

On the growing costs of programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, Rangel said he would work with the administration. But political analysts say reform of those programs is unlikely until after the 2008 presidential election.

Ways And Means To A Position Of Power (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, November 9, 2006

NEW YORK — Three days after waging a war of words with Vice President Cheney last week, Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., swept into the Manhattan offices of powerhouse law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld.

Fresh from an MSNBC interview that reprised the battle — Cheney declared Rangel “doesn't understand how the economy works,” prompting Rangel to call Cheney a “son of a bitch” — the raspy-voiced Democrat launched into a less visible, yet even more pointed response.

Rangel, hand-shaking and hugging his way through dozens of lawyers and executives, was one of the political stars of a private gathering that raised thousands of dollars for Tim Mahoney, the Florida Democrat who captured disgraced GOP Rep. Mark Foley's seat in Tuesday's midterm elections.

By raising money for Mahoney — and distributing more than $500,000 to more than 80 congressional Democrats in this year's races — Rangel helped his party regain control of the House and prepared to grasp the elusive prize that prompted Cheney's taunt: chairmanship of the powerful Ways and Means Committee.

Only six New Yorkers have held the post; the last, Daniel Reed, more than 50 years ago. Rangel gives no sign he's any more awed by becoming the House point man on all tax and finance legislation than he is of taking on Cheney — or President Bush.

He made just one concession Wednesday at a celebratory news conference, saying he should have confronted Cheney privately. But he couldn't resist a final dig.

"Mr. Cheney enjoys an office on the second floor of the House of Representatives that historically has been designated for the Ways and Means Committee chairman," said Rangel with a smile, as supporters laughed and clapped. "I talked with (expected new House Speaker) Nancy Pelosi this morning, and I'm trying to find some way to be gentle as I restore the dignity to that office."

Although he's known as warm and witty, even with most opponents, the 76-year-old Korean War veteran has relished political combat since first elected to the House in 1970. As Robert Greenstein, executive director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities puts it, "He has a backbone of steel for the things he believes in."

Yet, surprisingly for some who have tangled with the pugnacious Harlem Democrat, his priority list starts with at least a promise of bipartisanship.

"I enjoy working together with Republicans," said Rangel, seated in his congressional Cadillac en route to the Mahoney fundraiser. "I enjoy a finished legislative product that you can get on the floor in a civil way and say, 'We worked on this together.' I think that's what the Congress is all about."

That cooperation was lost during the Republican Party's 12-year control of the House, says Rangel, describing a political wandering-in-the-desert, when it wasn't odd for Ways and Means Democrats to learn about the committee's plans only after final decisions had been made. Rangel says his predecessor, retiring GOP Rep. William Thomas of California, never spoke to him about U.S. trade legislation apart from bills the New Yorker championed.

One of Rangel's first moves will be to reach out to the panel's GOP members in the style of former Rep. Dan Rostenkowski when the Illinois Democrat chaired Ways and Means before losing his seat in a corruption scandal.

"I'm hoping to take the full committee on retreat out of Washington, out of the District anyway, for two or three days, with (Bush) administration people and other economists and see whether we can find some basic agreement, perhaps with low-hanging fruit, so that we can learn to work together," says Rangel.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson and other administration officials have signaled tentative plans to attend, Rangel said. The agenda, he said, would include non-controversial legislation backed by both parties, including extension of the research and development tax credit for businesses and the college tuition tax deduction for families.

What Rangel says he won't consider is the package of Bush tax cuts set to expire in 2010. Cheney used the looming expiration and Rangel's well-known disdain for many administration tax policies in a bid to rally Republican Party faithful in the midterm elections.

"At 76 years old, I don't buy green bananas. What the hell do I know (about what) the economy's going to look like in 2010?" Rangel asks. "Why should I make a commitment to extend these tax cuts when the expiration date was put on there by the Republicans?"

Nonetheless, he makes clear he won't pick a fight by trying to repeal the tax cuts, either. "I think it's bad tax policy and bad politics to do that."

Bill Miller, vice president for congressional affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which has often backed the GOP White House and Congress, welcomes that view. "The rhetoric that has come from Congressman Rangel has been encouraging," he said. "The Republican Congress has been very good to the business community. But at the end of the day, you need bipartisanship to get anything done."

At least at first glance, Rangel wouldn't necessarily seem to be a model for political evenhandedness.

He's used his National Leadership Political Action Committee to collect millions of dollars, largely from Democratic Party donors. By virtue of holding a safe political seat — he first met his unsuccessful 2006 GOP challenger, Edward Daniels, at a candidate forum last week — Rangel has been able to distribute the funds to congressional Democratic candidates across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0092070

At least one of Rangel's PAC donors appeared to benefit from giving: New York attorney Melvyn Weiss, whose law firm was renowned for filing securities class-action lawsuits. A federal indictment filed this year accused the firm of paying kickbacks to clients who served as plaintiffs in class-action cases.

Federal Election Commission records show Weiss gave $4,200 to Rangel's re-election campaign in March and $5,000 to his National Leadership PAC in September. In June, Rangel was one of four House members who issued a statement that described the indictment as part of "the Justice Department's crusade against trial lawyers."

Separately, some GOP-oriented lobbyists this year got calls seeking donations to Rangel's PAC, a move that conservative columnist Robert Novak reported was interpreted by some "as a requirement for a ticket to enter" the office of the incoming Ways and Means chairman.

Rangel has not commented publicly on Weiss' contributions. As for the lobbyist calls, he said he has never required donations from those seeking access to him, "nor has there ever been a suggestion that my conduct has been influenced by any contributions."

Greenstein characterized the newly re-elected 19-term Democrat as far too pragmatic to practice bare-knuckle politics as Ways and Means chairman.

"Charles Rangel hasn't waited all this time to play games. He wants to get some things done," says Greenstein, predicting that the new chairman "would probably be less sharply partisan" than his GOP predecessor.

Asked how his style would differ, Rangel said: "I don't have the option that Chairman Thomas has, that is, just to look for a majority. Democrats wouldn't allow me to do it. I wouldn't want to do it. And anything we did do wouldn't pass the Senate, and the president would veto."

After holding the committee retreat, Rangel said, he hopes to begin seeking common ground with Republicans on more contentious tax and finance issues he considers important. At the top of the list are an increase in the federal minimum wage and relief from the Alternative Minimum Tax for millions of middle-class and upper-income Americans for whom the levy means higher federal tax bills. "While it's expensive to do, I think it's one thing that we agree on that should be done," said Rangel.

He also hopes to become what he terms the "new best friend" of the traditionally GOP-backing business community by considering industry tax credits and international trade legislation, while also re-examining tax incentives that encourage some businesses to operate offshore.

Rangel said he has already talked to some manufacturing industry leaders about foreign nations that subsidize their businesses with education, training and health care assistance, "while we allow the private sector, without federal assistance, to do it" alone.

"It doesn't make economic sense," said Rangel, adding that he has encouraged business leaders to submit federal aid proposals.

Rangel acknowledges he's given some thought to a potential goal raised by Miller: major financial legislation that would enable the new chairman to put a "stamp" on Ways and Means.

He cautions it's too early for such plans, but readily allows that a federal financing plan to guarantee Social Security "would be a great coup."

"A great tax reform bill that would simplify the system would be a chairman's goal," Rangel adds. "Medicare, I don't even know where to start with that, but having discussions would be a great beginning."

With Dems In Control: Gridlock Or Change? (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats' stunning electoral gains will broaden the economic agenda beyond President Bush's focus on tax cuts to more populist debates over income inequality, globalization, budget deficits and health care coverage, among other issues.

But the big question is whether Democratic control of the House — and possibly the Senate — will result in substantive change or merely political stalemate and posturing for the next presidential election.

"The theme for the next two years is showcase '08," says Dan Mica, a former GOP congressman who heads the Credit Union National Association. "America thinks the elections were over yesterday, but we just had a … break from commercials."

The first hint of what the Democratic gains mean could come this month when Congress reconvenes, still under GOP control, for a lame-duck session to wrap up spending bills and other legislation. Given the election shock, Republicans could just do the minimum and go home, Mica says.

The Democratic push begins next year with an agenda that includes proposals to raise the minimum wage, eliminate some tax breaks for oil companies and let the government negotiate prices under the Medicare prescription-drug program. Democrats will also try to find other bipartisan measures to pass, such as extending a business research tax credit.

Because Democrats don't have a veto-proof majority in the House, or the 60 votes needed to limit Senate debate, some observers predict gridlock. Robert Van Batenburg of Louis Capital Markets notes impasse means less spending and is generally bullish for bonds.

Business groups, such as the Business Roundtable and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, urged the two parties to work together to address economic issues. Democrats promised Wednesday to reach out to Republicans, and Bush also vowed bipartisanship. That could be short-lived.

"There's a chance to get some things done, but they'd have to be done quickly," says Nigel Gault of Global Insight. "The closer we get to the elections, the less likely it is."

Even if passing laws is difficult, Democrats still have plenty of power to shape the agenda.

Democrats can affect the economy by declining to schedule votes on pending trade deals or expiring Bush tax cuts. There are also must-pass measures to fund the government and the war in Iraq, where Bush has less flexibility. Those bills could be a vehicle for adding other Democratic priorities.

Some observers say politicians do not have the luxury of dithering, given high trade and budget deficits and a low savings rate.

"There are times when government can, indeed, get in the way. But there are also circumstances which demand leadership and decisive policy actions. This is one of those times," says Stephen Roach of Morgan Stanley.

What Business Should Expect In Next Congress Minimum-Wage Increase, Drug Prices Top The Agenda; New Hurdles For Free Trade (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell, Brody Mullins, James R. Hagerty, Anna Wilde Mathews, Laura Meckler And Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats' election victory Tuesday ended a six-year partnership between a business-friendly White House and Congress that enacted free-trade agreements, cut taxes on corporations and investors and -- with the significant exception of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-reform bill -- avoided new regulations.

Now, the question is how far the Democrats, tempered by a Republican president and a closely divided Senate, can push the pendulum in the other direction.

The party has yet to spell out its entire legislative agenda, but its leaders are talking about quickly boosting the minimum wage, seeking to curb executive pay and pushing for higher taxes on business, particularly oil companies. Many stocks, especially health-care shares, took a hit early yesterday as investors weighed the new political uncertainties, but the market went on to finish higher (see related article1.)

Rep. Charles Rangel, the New York Democrat who is expected to become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, cites "ending tax shelters for companies that move American jobs overseas" as one of his main objectives. He is also expected to complicate the White House's efforts to further liberalize trade by demanding strong protections for labor in any trade deals.

California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the probable new speaker of the House, has already called for ending "tax giveaways" to oil companies, negotiating with pharmaceutical companies for better drug prices for federal health programs and rolling back tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans.

Many political observers, however, doubt the Democrats can gain traction on more than a few of these issues, especially with business groups and their political allies keen to avoid losing any ground on trade and taxes.

Raising the minimum wage is one fight the Democrats are expected to win. That would be a victory for organized labor, which has pushed for an increase for years, but a defeat for the restaurant and retail industries and small-business owners, who argue it would hurt the economy by forcing them to hire fewer workers.

Mrs. Pelosi has promised to bring legislation to the floor within the first 24 hours of the new Congress to boost the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15. The idea is popular with voters: Six states overwhelmingly passed ballot initiatives Tuesday to raise the minimum wage and tie future increases to inflation. Republicans may feel hard-pressed to oppose the move.

At a news conference yesterday, President Bush cited the minimum wage as "an area where we can ... find common ground."

On the trade front, businesses face the growing threat of protectionism. Several victorious Democrats campaigned as trade skeptics, arguing that U.S. manufacturers are being battered unfairly by companies in China and other low-wage countries with weaker environmental and labor protections. Trade watchers on both sides of the issue say President Bush will have a tough time winning a free hand from Congress to negotiate trade accords. The president's "fast track" authority -- under which Congress has to vote up or down on trade agreements, forgoing amendments -- expires in July, and a Democrat-led House is less likely to grant him such sweeping powers again.

Leo Gerard, president of the United Steelworkers union, told reporters yesterday that the coming showdown over Mr. Bush's fast-track authority is "the first battle that we're going to win."

U.S. trading partners are reluctant to negotiate new trade accords if they think Congress will change the terms before ratifying them, and the current Doha round of global trade talks is already considered to be in deep trouble. European Commission President José Manuel Barroso appealed yesterday to the new U.S. Congress to help revive the stalled talks.

The trade debate is particularly heated when it comes to China, with its fast-growing export industries. Lawmakers could take steps to press China to improve its enforcement of intellectual-property rights and other trade rules. Yesterday, Mr. Rangel, the New York Democrat, said the U.S. needs to "be angry as hell and try to protect American industry....We have to protect American jobs and American manufacturers."

Robert Portman, the former U.S. Trade Representative who now heads the White House budget office, says the Democrats could create "a real nervousness among people who invest in and look at our economy closely. The trade dynamic has been very good. Export-driven growth is important, and if we're not knocking down barriers to trade that's a concern."

Democratic control of the House also will end the Republican Party's drive to lower taxes and could frustrate President Bush's hopes of extending the reduced 15% tax rates on capital gains and dividends, which expire in 2010. Republicans' decade-long push to scrap estate taxes is also likely to be halted.

Democrats are expected to support some tax sweeteners for business, such as the research and development tax credit. Mr. Rangel also said one of his priorities is to ease the burden of the so-called alternative minimum tax, which is designed to keep wealthy taxpayers from taking so many deductions and credits they escape taxes altogether. Easing the burden of the AMT, which has begun to ensnare many middle-class families, could cost the government $1 trillion over 10 years, and many policy watchers expect Democrats to rescind tax breaks for corporations and the wealthy to help offset any tax cuts or new spending.

At the same time, Democrats have vowed to force pharmaceutical companies to charge less for drugs sold to Medicare beneficiaries -- an idea strongly opposed by the drug industry. Mrs. Pelosi is expected to push a bill to allow direct price negotiations between the government and the drug industry. Though such a measure might not clear the Senate or the White House, it could give Democrats traction to advance other ways of driving down drug prices, such as widening the availability of imported drugs.

Drug prices are also likely to be a major focus for investigations, reports and hearings by the new Democratic House committee chairmen, particularly California Rep. Henry Waxman, who will head the House Government Reform Committee. A favorite drug-industry benefit -- six months of exclusive marketing of medications in return for studies on their effects in children -- is up for renewal and likely to draw scrutiny from Mr. Waxman and others. In an interview, Mr. Waxman says his priorities will include "reducing the price of prescription drugs."

Similarly, investors who own stock in student-loan providers like Sallie Mae worry about Democratic campaign promises to significantly reduce student-loan interest rates and speculation that they'll promote the William D. Ford Federal Direct Loan Program, in which students borrow directly from the federal government, rather than banks. That direct-lending program competes with the other federal student-loan program, Federal Family Education Loan Program, in which students borrow through a middleman such as Sallie Mae. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, shares of SLM Corp. -- better known as Sallie Mae -- were down 4.8% at $47.21.

The Democrat takeover of the House is expected to put outsize executive pay back in the spotlight, with a push toward giving shareholders a vote to approve pay packages. Massachusetts Democrat Barney Frank, who is expected to head the House Financial Services Committee, says he will hold hearings on executive pay and plans to move forward on a bill he introduced last year.

However, Mr. Frank and other Democrats have been receptive to business efforts to review the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law and to have regulators adjust some of the more controversial provisions. Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, has spoken recently about curbing some aspects of the law, which he says is driving business away from U.S. financial markets.

Mr. Frank also has a strong interest in affordable housing and his chairmanship could shift the odds in the three-year-old struggle to tighten regulation of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The Bush administration's efforts to persuade Congress to force the companies to slash their mortgage holdings had already sputtered before the election, and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has been looking for possible compromises. Now almost any legislative language to rein in the two companies may be politically impossible to sell.

Fannie and Freddie shares gained 2.9% and 2%, respectively, to $61.25 and $71.23 yesterday in 4 p.m. Big Board trading.

Still, Mr. Frank is expected to push hard for the legislation to require Fannie and Freddie to use more of their resources for financing loans to low-income people. That may hurt the companies' profitability. And both parties still want to create a more powerful regulatory agency to oversee Fannie and Freddie in light of their violations of accounting rules in recent years.

Another industry that could both benefit and suffer from the Democratic takeover of the House is the auto industry. Democrats are likely to push for greater use of alternative fuels, which could hurt or help Detroit depending on how legislation is structured. The industry is sharply opposed to tougher fuel economy standards supported by Democrats. But domestic auto makers are bullish on the potential for ethanol to partly replace oil as a transportation fuel and would support efforts to build the ethanol infrastructure and production capacity.

More perilous for the industry is Democratic interest in addressing climate change by limiting carbon dioxide emissions. Automobiles are among the worst offenders, and car companies could be hurt by new taxes or regulations aimed at limiting carbon emissions.

President Bush is said to be interested in climate change as well, and he has repeatedly spoken in favor of alternative fuels, making them an area where potential exists for successful legislation.

What The New Congress Will Mean For Business (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Democrats wasted no time yesterday proclaiming a new era in Washington, pledging to put middle-class economic issues at the top of their agenda. They promised fresh scrutiny of drug prices, corporate profits, international trade and more.

While President Bush and Democratic leaders pledged to cooperate, the presumptive chairmen of key House committees laid out plans to challenge the president on many issues important to business interests.

For instance, an exuberant Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) rattled off a to-do list for the powerful Energy and Commerce Committee, including regulating dietary supplements, promoting electric cars and examining drug-safety procedures at the Food and Drug Administration. "We'll kill the closest snake first," he said when asked about his priorities.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) said he would act quickly as Ways and Means chairman to authorize Medicare to haggle with drug companies over prices. Asked about White House opposition, Rangel wondered whether the president "has any idea of how frustrated the voters were and how much he was responsible for that frustration."

Analysts say that Democrats may find chastened Republicans receptive to some ideas, such as raising the minimum wage, but that compromise will be tough on many issues.

"There's nothing more important on either party's mind than winning the presidency in 2008," said Mark Weinberger, a partner at Ernst & Young LLP and a former Bush Treasury official. "The window for bipartisan cooperation is very small."

Business Prepares For Heightened Scrutiny (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington And Christopher Bowe And Ben White

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Democratic victories in the US mid-term elections set the stage for heightened congressional scrutiny of pharmaceutical companies, oil and gas groups and government contractors such as Halliburton.

Shares in Merck, Schering-Plough and other big drugmakers fell on Wednesday in response to the polls, but the overall stock market rose, reflecting an emerging consensus among lobbyists that Democrats would take a selective approach in pushing for regulatory changes.

During the campaign, Democrats signalled their desire to reform Medicare, the US healthcare programme for the elderly, by pushing legislation that would give the government – as opposed to private insurers – the power to set drug prices, potentially adding pressure to the cornerstone of industry profitability.

Democrats will also strongly support alternative fuel at the expense of oil and gas companies, whose record profits and tax breaks will be scrutinised.

Government contractors such as Halliburton and Bechtel are also likely to come under fire for their work in Iraq, which has cost billions in taxpayer dollars. But the election of a significant number of moderate “pro-growth” Democrats mean that the party’s approach will be measured.

Although the incoming leaders of some of the most important committees in the House of Representatives and, potentially, the Senate – people such as John Dingell, Barney Frank, and Charles Rangel – represent the liberal wing of the Democratic party, most business lobbyists say they believe the lawmakers will espouse a “reasonable” agenda.

In part that is because left-leaning lawmakers will be reined in by moderates and because any sweeping legislative reform aimed at business could face a veto by President George W. Bush.

The lack of anxiety among some business lobbyists about the election results also reflects that, apart from a few industries that could be a target for congressional investigations, many companies, particularly on Wall Street, have strengthened their ties to Democrats in anticipation of a swing in control.

Such veteran lawmakers as Mr Frank and Mr Rangel are viewed as liberal lions, but also pragmatists who will seek out compromises to pass incremental reform. Charles Schumer, the New York senator who led his party’s campaign to recapture the Senate, and Senator Hillary Clinton, also have long-standing ties to Wall Street.

“A growth-oriented agenda is now a core Democratic party tenant,” said Blair Effron, a Democratic donor and partner at Centerview Partners, a financial advisory firm.

Mr Frank, the incoming chairman of the influential House financial services committee, appeared on Wednesday to give a nod to investment banks that are hopeful Democrats will support modest revisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, by emphasising his willingness to dilute some provisions in the corporate reform bill.

“I can promise you that this time next year, Section 404 will be much less of a burden without diminishing its central purpose of avoiding abuses,” he said in a speech in Boston, referring to a controversial provision that requires companies to disclose the adequacy of their internal financial controls.

The Democratic leadership has also struck a broad-brush deal with Republicans on trade liberalisation in an effort to establish the party’s bipartisan credentials.

Big Pharma Catches A Chill, Fearing Democrats' Prescriptions On Pricing (WSJ)

By Avery Johnson And Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Fears that Democrats will tackle drug pricing have investors reconsidering the pricing of drug stocks, too.

Shares of major pharmaceutical companies slipped yesterday amid concerns that Democrats will push for changes that could cut prices paid under Medicare for some medications, among other things. Still, analysts cautioned that Democratic control of the House of Representatives is unlikely to bring much immediate change for the industry. For one thing, many proposals on the Democrats' agenda could face a veto from a Bush White House, if they make it that far.

Even as the Dow Jones Industrial Average hit a record, the Dow Jones Wilshire U.S. Pharmaceuticals Index fell 1.7%, a reversal from the upward trend that has lifted the group about 17% in the past 12 months. Merck shares fell 3.4%, Schering-Plough lost 2.5% and Pfizer dropped 1.6%. (Options on drug stocks also stir. See article.1)

Also weighing on drug stocks was Merck's disclosure Tuesday that U.S. and Canadian authorities are requesting an additional $5.58 billion in taxes and interest going back to 1993. GlaxoSmithKline, the British pharmaceuticals company, agreed to settle a similar dispute with the Internal Revenue Service two months ago, which cost it roughly $3.1 billion.

Analysts stress that the major challenge to the industry isn't Washington rhetoric but issues that drug makers have struggled with for years -- few new drugs in the pipelines and threats from generic competitors. Although Big Pharma hasn't freed itself from those concerns, signs of progress have driven drug stocks' strong performance so far this year.

At least some drug companies appear to be refilling their pipelines with products that can take the place of blockbusters that will lose patent protection and taking other steps to ameliorate the situation. Merck, Schering-Plough and Pfizer are in varying stages of aggressive restructuring programs. Merck has had five new drugs approved this year alone.

The rumblings in Washington may be a short-term distraction. "We continue to view a potential recovery in the sector's pipeline as a more important long-term value driver" than the elections, Banc of America Securities analyst Chris Schott wrote in a recent note to clients. "We see many near-term positive pipeline catalysts."

Catherine Arnold, a pharmaceutical analyst at Credit Suisse, says next year's earnings look to benefit from favorable comparisons to this year, which saw profits hit by generic competition, and by increased benefits from cost-cutting programs. But she is neutral on drug stocks, noting that clouds loom with a presidential election in 2008 and potentially lower prices.

Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California, who is expected to become speaker of the House, has said Democrats will introduce legislation allowing the government to negotiate directly with drug companies to secure better prices for medications offered to senior citizens under Medicare. Democrats also have backed making generic drugs more accessible and expanding the ability to import cheaper drugs from overseas.

Democrats' new dominance in the House -- and possibly the Senate -- could bolster drug-safety efforts at the Food and Drug Administration. Democrats have a chance to put their stamp on critical legislation that must be renewed next year, including FDA user fees and the law that gives drug companies extended protection against generic competition if they study the use of their medications in children. Democrats will be able to launch and lead investigations and oversight hearings that will likely focus on drug pricing and safety.

Rep. Henry Waxman of California, who will now be chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, has introduced a bill to create a pathway for generic versions of biotech drugs. Though the complexity of the issue makes quick legislative changes unlikely, it will likely find more traction with Democrats in charge. Democrats are also eyeing other moves, including boosting funding for the FDA's generics-drug office. They may also look to discourage some tactics that the branded drug makers use to protect their turf, such as deals for so-called "authorized generics."

"There's no question that the world just changed for us, but it's not a big surprise, and no one's panicking," said Ken Johnson, senior vice president at the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the industry trade group. He vowed to redouble public-relations efforts leading up to the 2008 presidential election, which he called "even more important" than most elections for the drug industry.

Implementation of the Medicare prescription-drug benefit shored up drug-company revenues during a research and development drought, and fed healthy profits, especially toward the end of this year. Industry executives say the Medicare drug benefit has served patients well, with high satisfaction and lower costs than originally forecast. "The free market has created competition and prices are going in the right direction," said Tony Zook, president and chief executive of AstraZeneca's North American unit.

Analysts said yesterday's stock-price declines reflected a psychological defeat for the drug companies rather than anything immediate that could affect their businesses. "The stocks are reacting to the perception that Democrats are in charge, and Democrats are mean to the drug industry," said Richard Evans, a pharmaceutical analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein & Co.

Some on Wall Street are concerned about whether the election results foretell a Republican loss in 2008. "If this is an indictment of the Republicans, then it does not give the industry a warm-and-fuzzy feeling for the presidential election in 2008," said Barbara Ryan, a pharmaceutical analyst at Deutsche Bank.

In the near-term, Democrats are likely to support new powers for the FDA. A senior Democratic House staffer with experience in health care says Democratic lawmakers are likely to be "very receptive to the recommendations" in a recent report from the Institute of Medicine, an independent research organization that advises the federal government. Changes called for in the report include restrictions on direct-to-consumer advertising for the first two years a drug is on the market.

New Congress Expected To Scrutinize Government Management (column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

The new Congress will take a more skeptical view of the Bush administration's approach to managing the federal government, in particular efforts to contract out federal jobs and link employee pay raises more closely to job performance.

Those were the post-election predictions offered by a number of public policy experts, union leaders and Democrats yesterday.

Policy analysts said they expected that the Democratic takeover of the House and possible capture of the Senate would lead to more-rigorous oversight to root out waste, fraud and abuse in government. Federal union leaders saw the election results as an opportunity to roll back some of the administration's workforce initiatives.

Key members of Congress from both parties traditionally put aside partisan differences and work closely with one another on civil-service issues. More than likely, the same House and Senate members will continue to cooperate on issues important to federal employees, such as pay, benefits and retirement.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) is in line to take the chair of the House Government Reform Committee, replacing Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.). Before the election, Waxman said his priorities would be to tighten restrictions on lobbyists, clean up federal contracting, improve whistle-blower protections for federal employees and reduce cronyism in political appointments.

Some employee groups said yesterday that they expect to see Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) serve as a bridge between Waxman and Davis on federal employee issues. Van Hollen said he "would be happy to work with both of them," adding that he hopes to find "some long-term resolution" that ends annual legislative fights over contracting out of federal work.

Outsourcing efforts "have demoralized people throughout the federal workforce," Van Hollen said. "The amount of time, energy and anxiety spent going through this process has far outweighed any benefit."

If the Senate changes party control, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, a career Democrat who won as an independent, seems likely to take the helm of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

The committee is chaired by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), and she and Lieberman have enjoyed a collegial relationship on a number of issues, including how to restructure the Federal Emergency Management Agency after the administration's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina.

The shift to a divided government could make it difficult for either side to launch initiatives that directly affect federal employees, analysts said.

"Federal employees should expect that things will go slow on the president's agenda, and they have gotten a two-year break in the action," said Paul C. Light , a New York University professor who studies public-service issues.

George Nesterczuk , a Republican policy adviser on civil-service issues, said the election results would not stop the White House from continuing with its management changes inside agencies. Still, he added, "Quite frankly, I don't see much happening in the next two years."

Robert M. Levi , director of government relations at the National Association of Postmasters, noted that a number of moderate Republicans lost Tuesday, raising the prospect that the next Congress may be more interested in fiscal discipline.

"When the House considers whether it wants to reduce the budget deficit, what are they going to look at, and how are federal and postal employees going to be impacted by the desire to reduce the budget deficit?" Levi asked.

But congressional aides said Washington area advocates for federal employees will resist any deficit solutions that carve into federal benefits.

Those members include Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who may be the next majority leader of the House, Reps. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), Van Hollen and Davis and Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.).

John Gage , president of the American Federation of Government Employees, and Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said they would redouble efforts to block contracting plans at agencies where they represent workers.

Gage and Ron Ault , president of the Metal Trades Department, AFL-CIO, said defense unions will lobby the next Congress to repeal the new National Security Personnel System, which overhauls pay and workplace rules for Defense Department civilians.

"We need to kill NSPS once and for all," Ault wrote to union leaders yesterday.

Light and others said they doubted Congress would abolish a personnel system only two years after authorizing its creation. But Light said the election means the NSPS will continue "at a much slower pace" and under more rigorous oversight by Congress.

Power Cleaning (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Revenge belongs to the Democrats on Capitol Hill, not that they'd ever take advantage of such a thing. They say they're going to be fair. And nice.

But on the off chance that they might desire just an itty bit of payback, things could get interesting in the House over the next two years. There are a lot of things a newly anointed majority party can do to annoy a minority party, and plenty of reasons they'd want to -- particularly if they've been under the other party's thumb for 12 long years.

Perhaps we shouldn't call this revenge. Perhaps this is just what a party in power does. Dogs chase squirrels, and the majority party in the U.S. House gets to throw its weight around a little.

Here's Dick Armey describing it. Armey, of course, was a big wheel in the Republican leadership the last time this happened, in 1994, when the Republicans won the House after 40 years of being out of power. They were primed for retribution. They had suffered the Democrats' abuse. But Armey doesn't call it abuse. He calls it "good-natured stuff."

For example, the time in the late '80s when Armey asked House Speaker Jim Wright if he could have a small vacant space that was just sitting there, next to Armey's office, and the speaker acted surprised that any such empty room existed, and promised he'd look into it, and a few days later some Democrat started moving his belongings into that space? That, says Armey, was "kind of funny."

It was in this spirit of joviality, once the Republicans took over, that Armey went to the new speaker, Newt Gingrich, and suggested that the Texas Democrats who had been gathering weekly to lunch, year after year, in the speaker's dining room should be assigned a more fitting space.

Perhaps something in the basement.

"Newt thought I was being mean," Armey says. But it wasn't meanness. "This is Tevye in 'Fiddler on the Roof.' It's tradition."Cellar Dwellers

Tradition!

"The first thing you've got to learn is that from now on, you don't get upstairs," says former Democratic congressman and former West Virginia governor Bob Wise, recalling how some of the meeting rooms for Democrats were downgraded when the Republicans took over after '94. Members' personal offices are doled out on a seniority basis, but control over many other rooms falls to the majority.

No more "charming" meeting rooms with "ornate paneling," Wise says. Hello, "sterile white walls." During the first months of the Republican takeover, Wise wrote a piece called "Diary of a Congressman" for Washington Monthly. Here's the entry for Feb. 22, 1995: "The President comes to the Hill. Republicans give us a basement room. Classy."

It's just no fun being the minority party. Not when you've gotten used to the feeling of power. Suddenly, Cabinet officials who once conferred with you are now calling someone in the other party. Now, you call a news conference and no one comes.

"Twelve years later, all of my former staffers still call it the Great Depression," says Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.). "You're in the majority, you have the gavel, the staff's much larger than the minority's, you control the agenda and then the next day . . ."

The next day, the gavel disappears in a puff of smoke. (Okay, not really. You get to hold on to it till January. Cradle it in your arms, if it helps you feel better.)

"Quite often, the minority is given much less useful work space," says Scott Lilly, who used to be the Democratic staff director on the House Appropriations Committee. Minority committee staff may find themselves in a cramped, windowless office, far from that beautiful view of Rayburn Park. Far from everything, really.

Office space may seem petty, but it counts for a lot. It is both a practical and a psychic burden when an office manager's space is so small she can't even push her chair back to stand up. After the '94 elections, a Republican congressional aide bought her colleagues tape measures in anticipation of their new, grander offices. The Republicans were tasked with figuring out just what property, exactly, they were now in charge of doling out.

"That cracked us up," Armey says. "In one case, we found a whole building we didn't know we owned."Arrogance or Gamesmanship?

Revenge is in the eye of the beholder. It may be that power is innately corrupting, or perhaps it only appears that way from the outside. It may also be -- and this is key -- that the things a party must do to pass legislation and stay in power are inherently unpleasant for the other party. In any case, it turns out that Democrats and Republicans have something in common. They both think the other guys are arrogant when they're in charge.

"They had been pretty arrogant about their use of power," former congressman Bob Walker (R-Pa.) says about the Democrats.

They had "an arrogant disregard for the House as an institution," former congressman Martin Frost (D-Tex.) says about the Republicans.

The House under a Democratic majority was at times "run like an old Southern plantation," says Thomas E. Mann, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution. He says the Democrats saw themselves as a permanent majority, and could be stingy and abusive. One Republican staffer said in '94 that the Democrats had treated his party like "scullery maids." Former Democratic speaker Tip O'Neill was suspected of deliberately mispronouncing certain Republicans' names. Republicans took to calling the institution an "imperial Congress."

As for the just-demoted Republican majority, Mann says, they abused the rules to keep the Democrats from being heard or from participating in the crafting of legislation. He and Norman J. Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute have written a book called "The Broken Branch," about the intense partisanship they say the Democratic majority started and the Republican majority continued and, in some cases, made worse. They and others list practices such as closed-door sessions that shut Democrats out of negotiations, "closed rules" that don't permit members to offer amendments to legislation, and the majority party's practice of holding votes open past the traditional 15-minute period to persuade more members to vote its way.

When the Republicans came to power after '94, they promised they would not try to get "even," promised they would be more fair and magnanimous than the Democrats had been.

Recent highlights from a most unhappy union:

2003: A session on pension legislation devolves into name-calling when Democrats say they haven't had enough time to read a substitute measure. Republican Bill Thomas, chairman of Ways and Means, refuses to delay a vote. Democrats march out to a nearby House library. Thomas calls the cops to evict them.

Nancy Pelosi, who is primed to become the new speaker once the Democrats take over in January, has been promising a new era of civility and bipartisanship in the House. Those good intentions will presumably be the angel on her shoulder. On her other shoulder, however, there may be temptation . . .

"It's in our mutual political interest to try to work out a bipartisan agreement on legislation," says Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), who is slated to become the new chairman of Ways and Means. "It's up to me and the Democratic leadership to convince those new Democrats who don't know what it's like to legislate that if they want to get even they can never get anything done."

"I think there are going to be two strains of thought in the caucus," says former representative Vic Fazio (D-Calif.). "One will be 'Let's get the bastards.' And the other will be . . . 'Why don't we try to get this place more livable, more workable?' "

Fazio says he thinks Pelosi is sincere when she says she wants to make things better. On the other hand, "should the Republicans go into a kamikaze mode trying to exploit every opportunity . . . who knows how long the Democratic patience will last?"

That incident in 1995 when Armey managed to get the Texas Democrats banished from the speaker's dining room? It turns out Gingrich relented in the end, according to Texas Democrat Gene Green, who says several Democrats appealed to the new speaker. Green himself made an appeal. Back then, he was a relative newbie, a "low person on the totem pole," but one day circumstances conspired to allow him to talk to Gingrich.

"He and I were in the men's restroom on the second floor," Green says. "And I said, 'Mr. Speaker, what's the problem with the Texas Democrats having the speaker's dining room?' And he said, 'I have no idea.' "

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

The New House Majority Offers Bipartisanship -- And An Ambitious Agenda (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Congressional Democrats savoring their return to power pledged yesterday to work closely with President Bush on a legislative agenda but demanded a change in course on Iraq and new directions on policies such as the minimum wage and stem cell research.

Democrats were on the verge of capturing the Senate last night to go along with the House majority they won on Tuesday. In Virginia, former Navy secretary James Webb appeared to have defeated incumbent George Allen (R) in the last remaining Senate race, although Allen had yet to say whether he would ask for a recount.

In the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who is poised to succeed J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) as speaker, promised swift action early next year on a Democratic package that includes an increase of $2.10 an hour in the minimum wage, full implementation of the recommendations of the bipartisan Sept. 11, 2001, commission, and making some college tuition payments tax-deductible.

Pelosi said she will not heed the calls of some activists on the left to explore impeaching the president. But with subpoena power and committee chairmanships, Democrats will ensure that Bush's anti-terrorism and war policies receive tough scrutiny in the last two years of his presidency. "Democrats are not about getting even; Democrats are about getting results," Pelosi said at a news conference. "I have said before and I say again, impeachment is off the table."

Voters on Tuesday handed Democrats control of the House for the first time since 1994, giving the party a gain of 28 to 30 seats. In January, Pelosi will become the first female House speaker. Hastert, the longest-serving Republican speaker, announced he will step aside and let a new generation of party leaders emerge after this week's losses.

Montana Democrat Jon Tester was declared the winner yesterday in his race with Conrad Burns, the fifth incumbent Republican to fall in the Senate. Democrats need to pick up six seats to gain the majority. As for the Virginia race, with Webb leading by 6,697 votes, even Senate Republican aides were quietly saying their majority was over.

In morning phone calls, Bush congratulated Pelosi, the House minority leader, and Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), and invited them to a White House lunch today. Bush and Pelosi pledged to put behind them a bitter campaign, in which the president had asserted that a Democratic victory would be a victory for terrorists and Pelosi repeatedly questioned his competence.

"I've been around politics a long time," Bush told reporters. "I understand when campaigns end and when the governing begins."

But policy clashes are inevitable. Control of both houses of Congress would ramp up pressure on Democrats to turn their calls for change into quick legislative accomplishments.

Beyond the Democrats' planned 100-hour blitz to pass most of their legislative agenda, Pelosi reiterated her pledge to restore fiscal discipline to Congress. That could pit her promises of federal largesse against Democratic desires not to roll back the president's tax cuts before their scheduled 2011 expiration dates. She also vowed to enact far-reaching controls on lobbying and ethics that Republican leaders promised this year but did not deliver.

The Democrats' victories also spell trouble for Senate confirmation of interim U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton and greatly complicate Bush's efforts to appoint conservatives to the federal bench. The administration is virtually certain to face greater congressional scrutiny -- and possibly new legislative restrictions -- on warrantless wiretaps, trade pacts, interrogation techniques for detainees and other controversial policies.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said in an interview on Washington Post Radio (WTWP-FM) that Bush will be "reacting to subpoenas flying, investigations."

"If we tended to underinvestigate, I think you'll see Democrats tend to overinvestigate," Davis said.

Tuesday's election results could be a boon for backers of wide-ranging changes to U.S. immigration laws, one of the few areas in which Bush differed with House Republicans and sided with a bipartisan Senate approach. The GOP-controlled House had insisted on dealing only with measures calling for tougher border and workplace enforcement, rejecting calls by Bush and the Senate for an expanded guest-worker program and possible pathways to legal status for millions of illegal immigrants. A Pelosi-led House is far more likely to embrace some or all of the Bush-Senate approach, lawmakers said.

"A great deal will depend on whether the president is committed to getting this done," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), a champion of the broader immigration rewrite, said in an interview. He said Republicans have overestimated the appeal of a punitive approach to immigration problems, noting the defeat of Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.) -- a chief proponent of deportations and border crackdowns.

Yesterday, Bush said of comprehensive changes to immigration laws: "I think we have a good chance. . . . It's an important issue, and I hope we can get something done on it."

Among the many possible clashes between Bush and the new Congress is the question of whether to permit federal funding for research involving new lines of embryonic stem cells. Bush used his only veto this year to block such legislation, which passed both houses comfortably but not by the two-thirds majority needed to override a veto. The new Democratic-controlled House would appear to remain short of a two-thirds majority favoring more embryonic stem cell research, but the revised political dynamics might force the administration to reconsider its position.

And there will be investigations and hearings, especially into the conduct of the war in Iraq and waste in contracting. Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) said yesterday the first move he will make as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee will be the reestablishment of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations, abandoned by Republicans when they took the majority.

More than anything else, public unhappiness over the Iraq war powered the Democrats' success Tuesday, according to exit polls, but it was unclear yesterday how much the new Congress will or can do about the conflict. Reid called on Bush to "convene a summit of congressional leaders" to discuss the war. "We've got to work together to change direction in Iraq," he said.

But before such tasks can be tackled, both parties will have to decide who will lead them in a transformed Congress. Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the House minority whip, launched his battle for the post of majority leader yesterday against Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who became a hero to many liberal Democrats with his early calls for a withdrawal from Iraq.

Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said he would announce today whether he will challenge House Democratic Caucus Chairman James E. Clyburn (S.C.) for the post of House majority whip. If he does, that race would pit the person who can claim a large share of the credit for Tuesday's electoral victories against the only African American in Democratic leadership.

Meanwhile, Hastert, who has been criticized by some for not intervening in the Mark Foley page scandal, announced he will not seek the position of House minority leader next year.

In his wake, a scramble began immediately. Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) will square off with conservative Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who took a shot at the current leadership in a letter to colleagues saying that "we did not just lose our Majority -- We lost our way. We are in the wilderness because we walked away from the limited government principles that minted the Republican Congress." Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.), chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, said he may also run.

In Montana, Tester, the state Senate president, held a lead of 2,847 votes -- or 0.7 percent -- over Burns, a three-term senator. Tester declared victory yesterday morning. Burns did not concede, saying, "There is no need to rush to a conclusion when the voters are this close."

"Senator Burns's campaign will do what they think is right when they think it is right," Tester told reporters in Great Falls, Mont. "And I am okay with that. We won this thing."

A spokesman for Secretary of State Brad Johnson, a Republican, said all votes had been counted, except for about 1,000 provisional ballots and an unknown number of military ballots from overseas that could still arrive. The spokesman, Bowen Greenwood, said it is unlikely but not impossible those uncounted votes could bring Burns within a 0.5 percent margin -- approximately 2,000 votes -- and thus allow him to ask for a recount.

Democrats Looking Ahead To January (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 9, 2006

Restored to power, congressional Democrats pledged Wednesday to press for a new course in Iraq and move promptly to raise the minimum wage. "We will not disappoint" the American people, said Rep. Nancy Pelosi, speaker-in-waiting.

At a news conference in the Capitol, Pelosi pledged that Democrats will make the next Congress "the most honest, ethical and open" one in history.

She made her comments with the extent of the Democrats' triumph in Tuesday's midterm elections still unclear.

Several House races remained too close to call, and the size of the new Democratic majority seemed likely to grow by a few seats. The battle for Senate control hinged on the outcome of a tight Virginia election. There, Democrat Jim Webb led Republican Sen. George Allen by more than 7,000 votes as state election officials canvassed the returns.

Pelosi and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada both said they would work with President Bush in a bipartisan manner, and made the same commitment with respect to congressional Republicans.

"If Democrats go in and seek retribution, we lose," agreed Sen.-elect Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, who defeated two-term Sen. Mike DeWine.

At the same time, Democrats made clear they intend to use their power.

Several Democrats suggested during the day that Bush meet with leaders to conduct a high-level review of the war in Iraq, a conflict that is unpopular with the public and that polls said had contributed to the Republicans' electoral defeats.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., in line to take back the chairmanship of one powerful committee, told reporters he wants the Federal Communications Commission to hold off on its vote on AT&T Inc.'s proposed acquisition of BellSouth Corp.

Dingell said the acquisition raises a "significant antitrust question," and sent a letter to the FCC asking that it hold off on the vote until after the new Congress convenes in January.

"I think it would be in their interest, I think it would be in the interest of the committee and I think it would be in the interest of the public," he said.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., in line to head the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, declined to discuss possible tax increases or changes in Medicare in an interview with reporters.

He said his top priority was to close the tax gap — referring to money that taxpayers owe the government but do not pay. "My only fear is that Republicans might call this an increase in taxes," he said.

He also criticized an IRS program that makes use of private tax collectors rather than government employees to seek taxes owed. "I think it is terrible for taxpayers to believe they are going to be hounded by the same kind of debt collectors," he added.

The minimum wage increase is one of a handful of measures Pelosi had promised to bring to the floor of the House in the first 100 hours it is in session under Democratic control next January.

Republican congressional leaders have maneuvered successfully to block passage of a minimum wage increase in recent years, but voters in six states approved ballot measures on Tuesday mandating raises. "When Washington doesn't act, then America does," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., who would become chairman of the committee with jurisdiction over the issue if his party wins the Senate.

The current federal minimum wage is $5.15 an hour. Legislation backed by Democrats in the House and Senate would increase it to $7.25 in three steps, although Pelosi has not yet said precisely what bill she intends to bring to a vote.

Pelosi, following up on a campaign promise, said Democrats would seek passage of several bills in the first days of the new session.

In addition to the minimum wage hike, Democrats will push to implement the recommendations of the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 and a reduction in the interest rate on student loans. Other items include legislation to promote energy independence, allow expanded stem cell research with federal funds and a call for lower drug prices under the Medicare prescription drug program.

Apart from a legislative agenda, Democrats awoke to a leadership election. While Pelosi's selection as speaker is unlikely to be contested, two senior Democrats maneuvered for election as majority leader.

Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland is the second-ranking member of the leadership, and said as the election returns were counted on Tuesday night that he would run for leader. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a prominent critic of the war, said he, too, will run.

Murtha is close to Pelosi, while Hoyer and she have clashed in the past. Pelosi sidestepped a question during the day when asked whether she would intervene in the race.

If Democrats were dividing up the spoils of victory, Republicans were sorting out their own future.

Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., announced he will not run for party leader when the new Congress convenes under Democratic control. That leaves Ohio Rep. John Boehner, the current majority leader, and Indiana Rep. Mike Pence, a prominent conservative, as rivals for the post. Rep. Joe Barton of Texas is another potential contender.

Hastert said he intends to remain in Congress, but other Republicans suggested that may not last long, adding that Bush may want to make the Illinois Republican an ambassador.

Pelosi Promises To Be A Bipartisan House Speaker (MERCN)

By Margaret Talev And William Douglas

The San Jose Mercury News, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - Nancy Pelosi, who's expected to be the next speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, signaled Wednesday that she intends to steer a centrist course and work across party lines with President Bush to shape policy on Iraq, energy, Social Security and immigration.

Pelosi acknowledged that her party's return to the House majority after a dozen years in exile occurred largely because at least nine fairly conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats won Republican seats. The liberal-tilting House Democratic caucus must accommodate them - and the centrist voters they represent - she conceded.

"Impeachment is off the table," she declared, spiking one dream that many liberal activists cherished. "Democrats are not about getting even . . . This election is about the future, not about the Republicans."

Pelosi's great challenge is to keep her party's liberal and more conservative wings united behind achievements that win the respect of voters in the presidential election year 2008, especially the great centrist bloc that abandoned Republicans across the country Tuesday. If Democrats pursue an excessively partisan agenda over the next two years, President Bush can block them with his veto, and centrist swing voters could be repelled by Democratic partisanship just as they apparently were by Republicans this year.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., who's likely to become Senate majority leader, echoed Pelosi's conciliatory tone. "We are not going to treat the Republicans like they've treated us," he said. Reid will become majority leader if Democrat James Webb's 7,000-vote lead over Republican Sen. George Allen in Virginia survives an expected recount.

Al From, the founder of the Democratic Leadership Council, the centrist wing of the Democratic Party, said that between now and 2008, "if Democrats act as problem solvers, not polarizers, that future will be very bright."

Pelosi, a 66-year-old San Francisco liberal who'll be the first female House speaker in history, used her first post-election news conference to quell speculation about how she intends to govern her fractious caucus.

Even as she pledged bipartisanship however, she challenged Bush to "signal an openness to new, fresh ideas," especially on Iraq, by dumping Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a move that, as it turned out, the president announced an hour later.

Pelosi also reiterated the Democrats' consensus agenda for the 110th Congress, which convenes in January:

_Raising the minimum wage.

_Repealing oil company subsidies.

_Expanding stem cell research.

_Allowing the federal government to negotiate lower prices from pharmaceutical companies for Medicare and Medicaid beneficiaries.

_Reducing college loan rates.

_Adopting the 9-11 commission's anti-terrorism recommendations.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., the chairman of the Republican National Congressional Committee, who narrowly survived a stiff re-election challenge, said that while he was willing to work with Democrats in theory, "I never saw many opportunities to count Democratic votes that wanted to come in partnership with us." He predicted that Democrats would try to raise taxes and Republicans would fight such efforts and quickly regain a majority.

"We're going to take a two-year hiatus," Reynolds said.

"She has to figure out how to tear down a wall that exists between the Republican and Democratic parties," said Rep. Allen Boyd, D-Fla. "That's the failure of the Republican Party in the last 12 years . . . They've really tried to govern and had their speaker try to be a speaker of the Republican Party and not the whole House and not for all Americans. And you see what's happening."

Scott Lilly, a veteran House Democratic staffer who's now at the Center for American Progress, a liberal research center, said House Democrats must resist the impulse to pursue big ambitions such as a comprehensive health-care plan or an education overhaul.

"There's an appetite for major health-care reform, in doing something substantial in elementary and secondary education," he said. "That's not going to happen. The president would veto a number of those things."

Pat Toomey, the president for the Club for Growth, a pro-business conservative group, predicts that Pelosi "is going to find it hard to hold that caucus together. It is an ideologically very diverse caucus and the extremes are very, very far apart. I think she's gonna find she's got a tough job ahead."

Pelosi, who's now the House Democratic leader, and Reid, who's now Senate minority leader, are expected to win the top leadership posts in caucus elections next week.

New Democrats Pose Challenge (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

DOJ_NMG_0092084

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — Carol Shea-Porter is a New Hampshire social worker who campaigned on the cheap and ran hard against the war in Iraq. Heath Shuler is a North Carolina football star who is pro-gun and anti-abortion. Jerry McNerney is a California alternative-energy entrepreneur with a doctorate in mathematics.

Together they are part of the new mosaic of the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives — incoming lawmakers who will make a diverse group of political officeholders even more eclectic. While much of the focus in the campaign was on the more moderate tendencies of Democratic contenders, the scope of Tuesday's Democratic surge makes for a more complex picture and a broader mix of ideologies.

"Every type of Democrat won last night, Northeastern, Midwestern, Southern, Texan, Western, liberal, moderate, conservative and many whose ideology defies easy description and should be best described just as a Democrat," said Simon Rosenberg, head of the New Democrat Network, an advocacy group.

The results of some close races remained in question Wednesday but Democratic officials said they thought they would be seating at least 28 new members, bringing the party's totals to at least 230 in the 435-member House. They are still trying to get a handle on exactly who some of these people are, but it is clear they present a different tableau from the liberal lions who will be taking and retaking the chairmanships of some important House committees.

The diverse viewpoints and backgrounds they are bringing to Washington could pose problems for Representative Nancy Pelosi of California and Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the newly empowered Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, as they quickly move to line up lawmakers behind the party's stances on national security, economic and social issues. The rank and file was eager to be unified when it meant a chance to overturn Republican rule; now Democrats must set the agenda and deliver.

"How are Senator Reid and Speaker Pelosi going to forge consensus on Iraq and on a budget?" Mr. Rosenberg asked. "Where are we going to end up on these two vital things, given the extraordinary diversity of this new Democratic majority?"

Mr. McNerney is a giant killer who, with help from the party and environmental groups, knocked off Representative Richard Pombo, chairman of the Natural Resources Committee. Mr. Shuler, one of the most conservative incoming Democrats, defeated Representative Charles H. Taylor, an eight-term Republican who had served on the Appropriations Committee since 1993. Ms. Shea-Porter, with no help from the party, pulled off one of the upsets of the night in defeating Jeb Bradley.

Keith Ellison of Minnesota, a state lawmaker and the first Muslim elected to the House, sees himself as a champion of economic justice. John Hall of New York, a rock musician and writer of pop hits like "Still the One," is a longtime critic of the nation's energy policy. Harry Mitchell, the former mayor of Tucson, is a veteran politician with a keen interest in immigration policy who is already the subject of a statue in his hometown.

"We are the most diversified caucus in the world and we think that is the great strength of the Democratic Party," said Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, chairman of the Democratic caucus.

As they strode triumphantly through the Capitol on Wednesday, celebrating Democrats said that they were not worried about the party — which benefited from the support of independent voters who want to see legislative gains instead of gridlock — finding common ground.

"We have to get things done for the American people," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who oversaw the Democratic campaign effort for the Senate. "The greatness of this country is being stalled as we are unable to move forward on education and on energy and on Iraq and so many other issues."

The stands some new Democratic senators take could pose difficulties for their own party. Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, who beat Senator Rick Santorum, is an ardent opponent of abortion; Jon Tester, the Montana farmer with a trademark flattop who claimed victory over Senator Conrad Burns, could also emerge as a maverick.

Mr. Reid played down possible divisions, saying that Senate Democrats have shown they can overcome ideological differences. "We have widely varying political philosophies within this team," he said. "And what we've done is we've used these team members with their strengths, and we're going to continue to do that."

In the House, Democratic unity could also be tested in relations between the new committee chairmen — many of whom are liberal veterans who wielded power years ago, when the party last controlled the House — and new lawmakers who have no recollection of the days when chairmen ran the show and the rank and file followed along.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that while there were ideological distinctions among the new Democrats entering Congress, most could fit in the centrist part of the spectrum. And all, he said, have an overriding political bond.

"They are reformers in spirit and temperament," Mr. Emanuel said.

About half the incoming Democratic freshmen are already planning on joining the New Democrat Coalition — a generally centrist group that emphasizes economic competitiveness and national security issues. They include Ed Perlmutter of Colorado, a former state senator who had a legislative reputation for working with Republicans; Michael A. Arcuri of upstate New York, a seasoned district attorney; and Tim Mahoney, the Florida businessman who won the seat that the Republican representative Mark Foley resigned because of the Congressional page scandal.

Other Democrats in the group intend to enlist with the Blue Dog Coalition, a more conservative group viewed as having a more rural outlook and a focus on balancing the budget.

But both groups emphasize trying to find legislative consensus.

"The message from the American people is clear," said Representative Ellen Tauscher, a moderate from California who is chairwoman of the New Democrat Coalition. "They want leaders who will fight for pragmatic policies that improve their lives, whether the issue is Iraq, health care or anything in between."

Ms. Shea-Porter, relishing her victory Wednesday, said she shared that view and was coming to the House eager to try to fix problems despite differences in outlook she might have with her colleagues or the opposition.

"People are so tired of the factions of party and they have been begging us to get together and work things out," she said. "I have the soul of a Democrat, but I also come from a Republican family, and I know we have to reach out."

The 'Thumping' Of The GOP (WP)

PRESIDENT BUSH responded swiftly to Tuesday's electoral "thumping," as he put it at yesterday's news conference. The president's decision to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is late but welcome, especially insofar as it reflects a willingness to bring a "fresh perspective" to the increasingly troubled situation in Iraq. Mr. Bush's choice of former CIA director Robert M. Gates to take over at the Defense Department increases the likelihood that this shift is more than a political bone thrown to an unhappy electorate. Mr. Gates is a member of the Iraq Study Group, chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana Democratic House member Lee Hamilton; he is also a seasoned national security professional who could press the president to embrace options he has resisted, such as reaching out to Iraq's neighbors.

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made" in Iraq, Mr. Bush said. It's good that he heard their message; he ought to consult congressional Democrats about a course correction. But Mr. Bush was right yesterday in signaling the limits of such cooperation: "If the goal is success, then we can work together. If the goal is get out now regardless, then that's going to be hard to work together."

If the president said many of the right things yesterday, so, too, did the incoming House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), and Nevada Sen. Harry M. Reid, who is on the cusp of becoming majority leader. In a procession of news conferences, it seemed at times that the politicians were vying to see who could mention bipartisanship most often and pledge civility most passionately. Given that Mr. Bush came to Washington promising to "change the tone" and instead presided over six years of almost unrelenting partisanship -- not to mention his out-of-bounds campaign rhetoric equating a Democratic victory with a win for terrorists -- it's a bit hard to take all this post-election happy talk too seriously. The same goes for Democrats, given their similarly over-the-top venom toward Mr. Bush. But both sides clearly heard voters' disgust with Washington politics-as-roller-derby, and they may share an interest in avoiding a replay of such brawling.

law, one of the president's early, and rare, moments of bipartisan cooperation with Democrats; and immigration reform, a subject on which the president has been more in sync with congressional Democrats than with his own party. The contours of a comprehensive immigration compromise were well defined last year; Mr. Bush and the new congressional majority should act swiftly to make that law. Much harder, but even more important, will be finding bipartisan will to tackle the growth of entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare, a subject that Mr. Bush raised yesterday. If Democrats aren't responsible enough to stop using those issues as political footballs and start considering the future fiscal health of the country, they won't deserve to remain in the majority.

Pelosi To Be First Woman To Lead Congress (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nancy Pelosi wasted no time making clear who's in charge now.

"Democrats are ready to lead," the San Francisco congresswoman declared at a news conference Wednesday, hours after her party reclaimed control of the House of Representatives to end 12 years of Republican rule.

And prepared to lead the Democrats is an Armani-clad daughter of an old-fashioned Baltimore politician about to become the first female speaker of the House — two heartbeats from the presidency.

Voters "spoke out for a new direction," said Pelosi, who promised to be "the speaker of the House, not the speaker of the Democrats." She reached out to Republicans, saying she seeks bipartisanship: "Democrats are not about getting even."

President Bush responded in kind. He pledged to work with Democrats and leave behind the harsh campaign attacks exchanged by both sides. "If you hold grudges in this line of work, you'll never get anything done," he said.

How the two will get along is anyone's guess, given their diverse personal and political backgrounds. What is clear is that Pelosi has been preparing for this day.

During a campaign stop in Albuquerque on Oct. 28, a man asked what a female speaker is called. "They say 'Madame,'" she replied, "but you can call me Nancy."

Next week, the new Democratic majority elected on Tuesday plans to choose Pelosi to wield the speaker's gavel. She would officially take it from Republican Rep. Dennis Hastert of Illinois in January.

That would put her in the constitutional line of presidential succession behind Vice President Cheney and make Pelosi, 66, the highest-ranking woman in U.S. history.

"My first excitement is that there will be a Democratic speaker," Pelosi said in a pre-election interview.

Now, Pelosi is about to reach the top rung of a ladder that Montana's Jeannette Rankin began climbing 90 years ago when she became the first woman elected to Congress.

"It's tough. You talk about the glass ceiling. This is the marble ceiling," Pelosi said. Her ascendance, she said, tells women "they can handle power at any level, that we can breathe air at this altitude," and it "bodes well" for a woman to be elected president.

As polls in the campaign's final days pointed to a Democratic victory, Republican TV ads and e-mails demonized the House minority leader as a San Francisco liberal.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich, who led the GOP revolution that ended 40 years of Democratic rule in 1994, circulated an e-mail to news organizations and Republican activists that said her "left-wing values are rejected by most Americans."

The message apparently didn't resonate. Nearly half of those surveyed in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll last month never heard of Pelosi or had no opinion about her.

Pelosi's San Francisco district is one of the most liberal in the country — 14% voted for Bush in 2004 — and she makes no apologies for her constituents' values.

She says conservative critics are “afraid of the fact that every child in San Francisco has health insurance, that our minimum wage is over $8 an hour.” As one of her first acts, she has vowed to push for a hike in the federal minimum wage, now $5.15 an hour.

Vin Weber, a GOP strategist and former Minnesota congressman, warns, “If Republicans believe this caricature of Nancy Pelosi as a wacked-out San Francisco liberal, they're going to find out it's not true and (will) underestimate her. … She comes out of a family famous for having extraordinary practical political skills.”

Thomas D'Alesandro III, Pelosi's brother and also a former Baltimore mayor, says, “She knows how to read people. She got that from my father. She's not confrontational. She tries to seek a consensus.”

That doesn't mean the mother of five (who awaits the birth of her sixth grandchild this week) is a pushover, according to those who've worked with her.

Former Texas congressman Martin Frost says he learned that firsthand when he opposed the then-No. 2 minority leader for the top Democratic post in 2002. Pelosi easily defeated the moderate lawmaker. He compares her to Margaret Thatcher, Britain's first female prime minister, who he says was “very steely.”

Pelosi moved into the leader's office promising a four-year plan to move back into the majority. She made good on her vow in part by raising more than $50 million this election cycle, the most of any Democrat other than former president Bill Clinton and his wife, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

She let Democrats know that their chances to chair plum committees “would be determined by how loyal they were and how active in fundraising,” Frost says. She made it clear there would “be consequences” if they weren't, he says.

It was a change from Pelosi's predecessor, Missouri congressman Dick Gephardt. Frost said Gephardt would “try to get (Democrats) to do the right thing with the carrot rather than the stick. She's more into the stick.”

Gephardt, whom Pelosi criticized for supporting the resolution in 2002 that authorized military force in Iraq, said in an interview that when he stepped down from his post to run for president, “the caucus was ready for a little more disciplined approach, and she brought that.”

House Democrats under Pelosi's prodding voted together 88% last year, according to Congressional Quarterly, the most unified stance in the past half-century.

Michael Franc of the conservative Heritage Foundation says Pelosi “found ways to inject an animal spirit that melded together the moderates with the most traditional liberals in ways I have not seen before. It was the shared mission that if we all stick together, our odds of recapturing the House go up immeasurably.”

It wasn't easy. Pelosi and other Democrats clashed over:

•Social Security. When the White House pushed for Social Security individual accounts last year, some Democrats such as Florida's Robert Wexler wanted to present their own plans to fix the retirement program. Pelosi brushed them aside to focus on defeating Bush's plan. She succeeded: It was shelved without coming to a vote.

•Iraq. The war has divided Democrats, but Pelosi put the best public face she could find — that of a highly decorated former Marine, John Murtha of Pennsylvania — out front. Murtha, a strong supporter of the military, called last year for a swift withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. He said the war was wearing out the military.

Murtha had the behind-the-scenes blessing of Pelosi, who he says kept liberals “quiet” so the Vietnam War veteran could neutralize GOP charges that Democrats were weak on defense. “She's tougher than hell,” Murtha says. “I heard her tell one guy, ‘If you're not with us, we're not with you.' ”

•Ethics. Pelosi angered the Congressional Black Caucus when she pushed to remove caucus member William Jefferson of Louisiana from a powerful committee. She acted after the FBI said it found $90,000 in a freezer during a search of his home for a bribery investigation. She said she wanted to contrast her action with GOP leaders. They did not punish any members tied to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

•Payback. When John Conyers of Michigan, in line to chair the Judiciary Committee, suggested Bush be impeached, she squelched the idea. “There's not going to be any impeachment. That would make the Republicans' day,” she says. “What we are about is the future.”

Pelosi says she won't emulate Republicans who froze out her party from shaping legislation. “We're talking about opening Congress. It may have worked for them to consolidate their power, but it isn't right and it isn't what the American people expected.”

Dick Armey, a former Republican House majority leader who worked with Pelosi, says of her and the Democrats, “She will try to be more inclusive. One of their complaints is they've been left out of the process, cut off, ignored. They are going to try to demonstrate we are bigger than that.”

Some moderate Democrats hope they won't be left out, either. “There (have) been instances where she hasn't been as inclusive as she should have,” says Rep. Adam Smith of Washington. “It would be a mistake, but I'm optimistic that won't happen.”

Pelosi says she has big plans for the first 100 hours of a Democratic majority. Among them: “Sever unethical ties between lawmakers and lobbyists,” enact the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and negotiate lower prices for Medicare prescription drugs.

Political scholar Stephen Hess of the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, says Pelosi “is no Newt Gingrich. She really isn't intellectually interesting. Gingrich came up with ideas. … With her, I don't know whether that's true or not. We have to see if she is really ready for prime time.”

Weber says Pelosi “is capable of being an effective speaker but faces significant constraints” from “the very energized, very angry” liberal base of her party, some of whom are in no mood to work with Republicans. “There's a good chance almost nothing will get done in the next couple of years,” he says.

A divided Senate, even a narrowly Democratic one, and the need to attract independent voters for the party to win the White House in two years will require Pelosi to reach out to Republicans. “The way she governs will be absolutely critical for the Democratic Party in '08,” says Bruce Cain, a political scientist at the University of California, Berkeley. “She's got to find the right balance.”

That means working with a still-Republican White House. Pelosi appealed to Bush “to work together to find a solution to the war in Iraq.”

Days before the election, she said three letters she and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sent Bush offering to do that went unanswered. “I feel a little bit like Paul to the Corinthians. Paul wrote to the Corinthians all the time, but it's a mystery to all of us whether the Corinthians ever wrote back,” said Pelosi, who attended Catholic school. “I hope (Bush) would respect the office of speaker” and write back next time.

Wednesday, Bush picked up the phone and invited Pelosi to lunch today at the White House.

America's First Madam Speaker (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

Vilified in Republican campaigns across the nation as a "San Francisco liberal," Nancy Pelosi - the speaker presumptive of the 110th Congress - actually lives politics closer to her roots in the precincts and wards of Baltimore's Democratic Party machine.

That's not to say she's a backslapping, cigar-champing pol. The totems in Representative Pelosi's office are white Casablanca lilies and San Francisco's Ghirardelli chocolates. Like many Democrats of her generation, she keeps a photograph of herself - then, a credible stand-in for Audrey Hepburn - with President Kennedy on a table in her office.

But what helped Pelosi become the first female speaker - and second in line to the presidency - is old-school pragmatism: a practical sense of how to build power and no qualms about using it.

A prodigious fundraiser with a family fortune, Pelosi openly split with the House's former Democratic leader, Richard Gephardt of Missouri, over the 2002 vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq, which she opposed. When Mr. Gephardt stepped down after Democratic setbacks in that year's midterm election, Pelosi quickly consolidated support to replace him.

She insists that she would not hesitate to defend the nation, if needed. A woman in power is like "a lioness in the jungle," she said at a Monitor breakfast in March. "You know you're dead if you go near the cubs.... If you pose a real threat to the people of our country, you can count on hearing from us very soon," she added.

As minority leader in the House, Pelosi united a diverse and fractious Democratic caucus on more key votes than any leader in the past half century, according to a survey by Congressional Quarterly. She did it by setting clear lines and holding party members to them on the argument that a united caucus had a better shot at winning back the House than did a divided one.

But behind the unity is fear - mostly that she will strip projects or plum assignments from Democrats seen as working too conspicuously with Republican lawmakers.

Critics also charge that Pelosi has let partisanship interfere with legitimate oversight activities of Congress. Last September, when a House committee held a hearing on the government response to hurricane Katrina, she dubbed it a "a partisan whitewash" and urged Democrats not to attend. Two Gulf region Democrats went anyway, and the hearing turned out to be a grilling of Bush administration officials.

Former Speaker Newt Gingrich minced no words in stating his view of a Pelosi-led House. It would be, he said in August, a "disaster" for the country. A bigger tent to manage

As speaker, Pelosi will preside over a very diverse majority - broadened by the influx of red-state Democrats, many of them fiscal conservatives, that gave House Democrats their victory. Most newcomers are expected to line up with the moderate, "blue dog" wing of the caucus. With an expected margin about 30 votes, she will need all her pragmatic smarts to hold the new Democratic majority together.

"Pelosi has been able to maintain unity among Democrats, keep legislators on the same page and on message, count votes effectively, and cause problems for House Republicans. She clearly inherited her father's political skills," says Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University, referring to former Baltimore mayor and US Rep. Thomas D'Alesandro. "Now, she will have no choice but to focus on keeping the Democratic machine intact, pushing her party to focus on politically effective issues and finding policies that will attract some Republican support."

In her first 100 legislative hours at the helm, Pelosi says, she aims to "drain the swamp" by passing a new rules package, including pay-as-you-go budgeting; raise the minimum wage; pass all the independent 9/11 commission recommendations; cut the interest rate on student loans by half; negotiate for lower drug prices in the Medicare prescription-drug program; end subsidies for Big Oil; and allow federal support of embryonic stem-cell research. All these items have at least some support across the aisle but involve bypassing the usual committee-hearing process to gain quick votes on the floor. It's an agenda that will test Pelosi's ability to hold her own majority while winning enough GOP support to get bills to the president's desk. Diversity counts

While current Speaker Dennis Hastert characterizes his role as that of a coach, Pelosi often describes herself as presiding over a room in her "mother-of-five voice." (In fact, she is a mother of five and awaits the arrival of her sixth grandchild.) And there's no word more important in the Pelosi lexicon than "diversity."

Bypassing more senior colleagues, Pelosi appointed Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D) of Ohio to be the first African-American woman to serve on the Ways and Means Committee, Rep. Hilda Solis (D) of California to be the first Latina on the Energy and Commerce Committee, and Rep. Linda Sanchez (D) of California to be the first Latina to serve on the Judiciary Committee.

"She understands the importance of diversity ... of having all groups represented in the decisionmaking process," says Rep. G.K. Butterfield of North Carolina, who serves on the steering committee for the Democratic caucus.

In the next Congress, that committee will consider new rules for committee assignments within the caucus, including whether to downgrade the importance of seniority. "While seniority is important, other factors are as important in a committee assignment or chairmanship, such as geography, race, and political philosophy," he adds.

In a move that has already generated controversy, Pelosi has signaled that she is unlikely to name Rep. Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, to the chairmanship, in favor of Rep. Alcee Hastings of Florida, next in line and a member of the Congressional Black Caucus. Respected in the intelligence community,

DOJ_NMG_0092090

Representative Harman often worked with the committee's GOP chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, even as Pelosi urged Democrats to hold ranks.

Caucus moderates are urging Pelosi to embrace the new freshman moderates.

Her "challenge is to wrap her arms around all aspects of the different philosophies that exist in this big Democratic tent, which is much larger as a result of this election," says Rep. Allen Boyd of Florida, a moderate Democrat. "I've tried to encourage ... Pelosi to put them in the room with her when she makes ... decisions."

Meanwhile, feminist activists hailed the historic moment of the first woman speaker ever. "This is the highest political leadership post ever held by a woman and puts Pelosi in the driver's seat as we begin to fulfill the will of the electorate and reshape the national agenda," says Ellen Malcolm, president of Emily's List, a group that supports abortion-rights candidates.

"Seeing this smart, tough, effective woman leading the Congress will help pave the way for the future of all women in politics," she added in a statement. Pelosi basics

• Career: House Democratic leader, 2002-present; Democratic whip, 2001-2002; House of Representatives, 1987-present; Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, 1984-1986; chairwoman, California Democratic Party, 1983-1984.

• Birthplace: Baltimore, Md.

• Current Hometown: San Francisco.

• Education: Bachelor of arts, Trinity College, 1962.

• Family: Husband, Paul; five children; five grandchildren.

• Self-description: "An Italian Catholic mother of five, grandmother of five, going on six."

• Former G.O.P. Speaker Newt Gingrich's description: "A hyperpartisan obstructionist."

• Miscellaneous: Pelosi stuffs cotton in her ears when she takes her grandkids to rock concerts. And she's so petite, a policeman once lifted her out of her shoes during an evacuation of the Capitol.

• What to expect with Pelosi as Speaker: Democrats could be expected to let most of President Bush's tax cuts expire and to block any new effort to privatize parts of Social Security.

• Quote: "I think targeting me [during the election] - most people don't even know who I am - is an act of desperation on the part of the Republicans. We're going to keep the focus in a very optimistic way on our new direction."

Pelosi Says Democrats Are Ready To Lead (AP-Y)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 9, 2006

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi — soon to be Madam Speaker — says she had something other than politics on her mind when her phone rang early Wednesday morning.

"I thought it might have been Alexandra calling with some news," Pelosi said, talking about her daughter and the impending arrival of a sixth grandchild. "I picked up the phone and said, 'Do we have a baby coming?'"

"Leader Pelosi?" the voice on the other end inquired.

It wasn't her daughter with news of an overdue baby but rather a White House staffer trying to connect her with President Bush. The president wanted to congratulate her after Democrats upended his party's 12-year reign in the House and put her in charge next year as the first female speaker in the nation's history.

"The call was so very, very early in the morning," an ebullient Pelosi recalled, saying that Bush referred to her as "Madam speaker-elect, and I referred to him as president."

Rep. George Miller, a California Democratic colleague, said Pelosi had been telling him for three weeks that "everything stops when the baby's coming."

Would a man in her position of power make the same choice? "The record's probably not very good on that," Miller quipped. Alas, the baby didn't come Wednesday.

Such was Pelosi's morning the day after voters gave Democrats at least a 25-seat majority in the House, and put her, a 10-term lawmaker, in the No. 2 spot in the line of succession to the presidency, behind only Vice President Dick Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0092091

She was greeted outside the Capitol by cameras and seventh-graders from Flushing, N.Y., who happened to be there for a tour and ended up getting a hands-on civics lesson from the California Democrat.

"On the day of Jan. 3rd, I'll receive the gavel on behalf of all of the young people in America," Pelosi told the kids. "We're responsible to you."

At more buttoned-down media events throughout the day, Pelosi made it a point to promise repeatedly to work with the Republicans who her party had just drummed.

"Democrats are ready to lead, prepared to govern, and looking forward to working in a bipartisan way with the Republicans in Congress and with the president of the United States," Pelosi said. She planned to have lunch Thursday at the White House with Bush.

Any effort to impeach the president "is off the table," she assured the nation before TV cameras, but she also said American voters "spoke for change and they spoke for a new direction for all Americans."

In an appearance with Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, Pelosi welcomed Bush's announcement he was replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense. "It will give a fresh start to finding a solution to Iraq, rather than staying the course," she said.

She said Democrats would return to power without rancor, but with a forward-looking vision, outlining an agenda that includes enacting recommendations of a commission impaneled after the Sept. 11 attacks to look at terrorist threats, raising the minimum wage, reducing college costs, pushing for more stem-cell research and working for lower medicine prices.

Pelosi will be formally re-elected as her party's leader, and its nominee to be speaker, when the Democratic caucus meets on Nov. 16. The actual speaker's election will occur in January.

While Pelosi is unopposed, other leadership posts are being hotly contested. Current minority whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland and leading Iraq war critic John Murtha of Pennsylvania are vying for the position of majority leader.

Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, a former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, is in line to become majority whip, but might be challenged by Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who as party campaign committee chairman directed the Democrats' successful election effort.

Pelosi, 66, made history four years ago when she became the first woman to lead a party caucus in either house of Congress.

Her next history-making move is a huge step for women in America, Miller said.

"I think it's just an incredible role model. When I came to Congress (in 1974), there were very few women ... and now a woman is the speaker of the United States House of Representatives. It's really quite something," Miller said.

Pelosi is a liberal who represents one of the most left-leaning districts of San Francisco. Republicans had tried to use that against her. In races around the country, GOP partisans said the possibility of a "Speaker Pelosi" was reason enough to keep the House in Republican hands.

It's not clear which Republican will serve as minority leader. House Speaker Dennis Hastert announced Wednesday he will not run for Republican leader when Democrats take control in January.

The daughter and sister of Baltimore mayors, Pelosi grew up immersed in politics and moved west in her 20s when her investment banker husband wanted to return to his roots. She managed to work herself into California's Democratic political structure while raising five children who were born over six years.

She didn't run for Congress until she was 46, when her youngest daughter reached high school.

Nancy Pelosi Is Ready To Be Voice Of The Majority (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — As Representative Nancy Pelosi faced the cameras Wednesday morning, after the Democrats had taken a majority in the House and put her on the brink of becoming the first female speaker, she spoke so softly at first that some reporters insisted they could not hear her.

“I’m not in charge of the technical arrangements,” Ms. Pelosi said quietly, fiddling with the microphone.

Then suddenly, she was commanding: "But I could use my mother-of-five voice!"

It is a line Ms. Pelosi uses often, and a voice she may have to rely on frequently as she tries to ensure that the new Democratic majority lasts more than two years.

As speaker, she would be second in line to the presidency — the closest a woman in elective office has come to the White House. And while she has been a leader in Congress for years, and the target of Republican attacks, many Americans still do not know who she is. Her new job places her on a more visible stage, with much greater stakes.

Ms. Pelosi, 66, who has been a San Francisco congresswoman for 20 years, became minority leader and then guided her caucus to victory by enforcing remarkable party discipline. She curbed the demands of those who share her often-caricatured liberal values, while making a place for the party's conservatives, for whom San Francisco is sometimes as distant as the moon.

She finds herself now with a more diverse caucus than before, some of its liberal members elected on a pledge to pull out of Iraq immediately, some members so conservative they often sounded like Republicans during their campaigns. She also has to work with Republican House members and a president she blasted — and took a blasting from — during a bitter two-year campaign.

Her friends say her background — as the daughter of a Baltimore mayor and congressman, the youngest and only girl in a family of six children, and the mother of five — has prepared her perfectly.

"I'll say to her, 'Nancy, I'd blow up if I had to deal what you deal with,' and she says, 'I had five children in six years,' " said Representative Anna G. Eshoo, Democrat of California, an old friend of Ms. Pelosi. "If there wasn't discipline in her house, there would have been chaos. She knows how important that is."

Ms. Pelosi's colleagues and friends describe her as a person of singular focus. That was evident as the House worked its final night before breaking to campaign for the midterm elections, significantly distracted by the resignation of Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, after he was revealed to have sent sexually explicit electronic messages to Congressional pages.

Toward midnight, Ms. Pelosi took the floor. "As a mother and grandmother and the leader of the House Democrats," she began, demanding an investigation into what House leaders knew about the Foley messages. Republicans booed, a rarity even in the raucous House chamber. She pressed on, however, smiling her unbudging smile.

"Mr. Speaker, once again, as a mother and a grandmother," she continued, demanding that the votes be recorded.

Representative George Miller, Democrat of California, said, one of the things that motivated her to run for leadership "was that people didn't want to win."

"They were all going through the motions, but they weren't kicking it into gear." he said. "She looked around and said, 'What is this? I didn't come here to hang out.' "

After the Democrats lost in 2004, Ms. Pelosi talked to consultants about how the party could win, rather than resigning itself to minority status. Their suggestion, her advisers said, was to "take down" the president; it was not enough to simply kick him in the shins. Then, the consultants advised, she had to differentiate between the two parties, and finally, articulate the positive things that the Democrats would do.

She fought the president first on Social Security, sending Democratic lawmakers to tell the elderly in town-hall-style meetings that the president's plan for change would reward Wall Street at their expense.

While she had long opposed the war, she also realized that a liberal congresswoman from California would have little impact in speaking out against it. And she pushed back against liberal members of her party who wanted to protest by denying financing for the war. Instead, she worked quietly with Representative John P. Murtha, a conservative Democrat from Pennsylvania and a veteran who had supported the war, to get him to express his growing doubts about it.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, said: "The most credible person in the Democratic Party would be the face of the party on this issue. She knew that because he had supported it, he had the greatest credibility to critique it."

Mr. Markey called Ms. Pelosi a liberal pragmatist: "San Francisco on the inside, Baltimore on the outside."

When Ms. Pelosi and Senate Democratic leaders were drafting their "Six for '06" platform going into the campaign, she pushed back on including traditionally liberal ideas like universal health care.

“She realizes that you cannot make everyone happy,” said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

Ms. Pelosi has used a style that one Democratic aide characterized as “chocolate and the gavel” to bring party members along. As she rose through the ranks, she would often deliver chocolate cakes to supporters or helpful staff members, and now her meetings are characterized by bowls of Ghirardelli chocolate. Representative Gene Taylor, a conservative Democrat from Mississippi, was heartened when Ms. Pelosi called to encourage his efforts after Republicans had refused to extend health benefits to reservists in a military appropriations bill. Mr. Taylor had voted against her in the leadership elections, but the gesture was the start of a positive relationship.

“She puts a very big premium on people who have ideas, but not if you think your idea is to the exclusion of everyone else’s input,” Mr. Taylor said.

Where the history is not so clear is whether Ms. Pelosi can find common ground with Republicans, if they let her. Her advisers say she wants to work in a bipartisan manner, but that does not mean agreeing to everything.

The biggest question is how Ms. Pelosi will define her relationship with President Bush. Her staff says the two already have some rapport because of the documentary film that her youngest child, Alexandra, made about the president’s 2000 campaign. But that is different from a working political relationship.

She will have her first chance on Thursday, when she has lunch with Mr. Bush.

In a rare unscripted moment Wednesday, Ms. Pelosi noted that Mr. Bush had telephoned her that morning. “He called to congratulate me, referred to me as Madam Speaker-elect,” she said, smiling. She paused, then — still smiling — added, “I referred to him as Mr. President.”

Democrats To Usher In Change In Judicial Nominations, Investigations (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 9, 2006

Democrats, as widely expected, wrested control of the House of Representatives from the Republicans, after 12 years of Republican rule, in elections across the country Tuesday, setting the stage for a series of intensive investigations of the Bush administration by several different House committees.

But it appears Democrats also carried the Senate -- radically changing the politics of federal judge-picking as well -- and that victory was something of a surprise, even to them. As of Wednesday afternoon, Democrat James Webb had claimed victory in the Virginia Senate race over incumbent Sen. George Allen, but a recount that could take several weeks appeared likely. If Webb is indeed the winner, Democrats will have a 51-49 edge.

"There just wasn't a firm sense this would happen," says a senior Democratic staffer. "It could have been as few as two pickups," the staffer adds, referring to previously Republican seats won by Democrats. "But six was at the high end."

The Democratic Senate victory, assuming it holds, could also have profound implications for the next Supreme Court pick, if 86-year-old Justice John Paul Stevens dies or resigns, or another justice resigns or falls ill, during the last two years of the Bush administration.

"The biggest thing [about the Democratic takeover] is judges," notes David Hoppe, former chief of staff to Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. "Everything else has a way of working itself out," adds Hoppe, now a lobbyist at Quinn Gillespie & Associates.

By midday Wednesday, Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats had already plunged into discussions over the agenda they planned to carry out in their expected majority status.

If they are indeed the majority, then when the 110th Congress begins in January, the Senate Judiciary Committee will be led by Vermont's Patrick Leahy, a 32-year veteran who had previously chaired the committee for 18 months, from mid-2001 until just after the 2002 elections, after the departure of Vermont's James Jeffords from the Republican Party.

Legislatively, the changes between a Leahy-controlled committee and the current committee, under Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., shouldn't be that extreme; the men are relatively close ideologically.

The major difference will be the politically contentious issue of federal judges, especially federal circuit judges, as well as a possible Supreme Court replacement.

DOJ_NMG_0092094

At the very least, a Democratically controlled Senate Judiciary Committee would make it unlikely that President George W. Bush's most conservative choices will even get out of the committee. That would leave Bush with two choices: He could pick more moderate conservatives that would pass Democratic muster, or he could pick highly conservative judges who would not get a majority committee vote, a choice that would give the Republicans' ultraconservative base an energizing issue.

That strategy may be difficult, however, in the event there is a Supreme Court replacement, notes Hoppe.

"If there is a vacancy on the Supreme Court, it will be harder to say, 'Gee, golly, I won't fill it,'" he says.

In both the Senate and House, Democratic majorities will almost certainly translate into one major change: more oversight.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will revisit the lack of habeas corpus rights for Guantanamo Bay detainees, the administration's warrantless surveillance program, and patent reform, according to lobbyists who follow the committee.

In the House Judiciary Committee, the gavel will move to Michigan Rep. John Conyers, a mercurial veteran who on Tuesday was elected to his 21st House term.

Conyers' staff were in meetings all day Wednesday, so a future agenda for the upcoming majority staff was difficult to determine.

But Conyers will certainly share certain oversight duties with Henry Waxman, the California Democrat who will chair the House Committee on Government Reform. That committee, which was expanded during the years of the Clinton impeachment, has maintained a large staff. And Waxman has a reputation as an aggressive investigator.

While in the minority, Waxman has continued to produce investigative reports; one of the most recent, documenting the links between ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the Bush White House, resulted in the resignation of Susan Ralston, then a White House aide to Karl Rove.

Hoyer, Murtha Battle (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin And John Bresnahan

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

As Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) pledged Wednesday to rule the House fairly in the 110th Congress as the first-ever female Speaker, a handful of senior Democrats moved aggressively to secure other leadership posts in their nascent majority.

One day after Democrats decisively seized control of the chamber from the GOP, one of the architects of that victory — Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) — remained mum about his plans despite speculation that he could run for Majority Whip.

Current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) was not similarly hesitant, formally announcing his bid for the Majority Leader's office early Wednesday morning and confidently predicting that he will secure the post when Democrats vote in leadership election on Nov. 16.

"I think I'm going to win," Hoyer said in an interview Wednesday. The Maryland lawmaker, who has served as Minority Whip since 2003, said "over a majority" of House incumbents as well as newly-elected lawmakers "have indicated that they would be supportive of me."

But Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) — who stunned fellow lawmakers when he announced in June that he would campaign for the Majority Leader post against Hoyer — re-affirmed his own interest in the office Wednesday.

"I'm working diligently now trying to convince people that I'd make a good balance" to the leadership team, Murtha said in an interview with National Public Radio.

The Pennsylvania lawmaker declined to be interviewed for this article.

Murtha, who is the ranking member of the House Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, also defended his decision to seek the leadership post, asserting that not only is the office an "open seat" in the new Congress, but arguing that he outranks Hoyer in the Caucus hierarchy.

"There's Nancy Pelosi, [Appropriations Committee ranking member Rep.] Dave Obey (D-Wis.) and myself, and then Hoyer is listed after me in the power plays," Murtha said on NPR.

That assertion bewildered at least one Democratic House lawmaker, who spoke on the condition of anonymity: "In my mind that shows a lack of understanding. I like Mr. Murtha but that's not just the way it is."

"There is real genuine concern that we don't want to see a divisive leadership fight, just at the time that we're seeing tremendous success and tremendous unity and harmony and good feelings in the Caucus," the lawmaker added.

Although some Democratic lawmakers have acknowledged their support for one of the would-be Majority Leaders, neither Hoyer nor Murtha have released lists of backers.

Hoyer asserted Wednesday that doing so could create unnecessary divisions in the Caucus heading into the new session.

"My object is to keep our Caucus unified ... so I'm not going to put out any lists," added Hoyer, who is expected to receive the support of the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Coalition, as well as the New Democratic Coalition.

A group of senior lawmakers representing a broad cross-section of the Caucus — including Reps. Barney Frank (Mass.), John Dingell (Mich.), Henry Waxman (Calif.), Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), Ike Skelton (Mo.), John Lewis (Ga.), Lucille Roybal-Allard (Calif.) and James Oberstar (Minn.) — issued their own letter Wednesday urging fellow Democrats to back Hoyer's bid.

"Steny ... has been an instrumental part of our leadership team, reaching out to all elements of our diverse Caucus and helping to bring Democrats together," the letter stated. "Our continued unity is imperative, and we believe that the leadership team that brought us to this point should continue to lead us in the new Majority."

In addition, the significant time Hoyer has spent over the past two years building a base of support among junior Democrats, including challengers and open-seat candidates, by raising money and making campaign visits to 80 districts, appears ready to pay dividends, as several Members-elect confirmed Wednesday that they will cast ballots for the Maryland lawmaker next week.

"I watched Steny Hoyer for the last few months," said Rep.-elect Albio Sires (D-N.J.), one of several incoming House Democrats who now support Hoyer's bid. "He has worked very hard to keep the Caucus unified and worked on electing new Members. ... I think he has real authentic qualities that earn him a lot of support."

Rep.-elect Brad Ellsworth (D-Ind.) said Murtha called him on Tuesday night, but he was still backing Hoyer, whom he first met in early 2005.

"It's like in anything — when you establish a relationship of trust, it makes the decision easier," Ellsworth said. "Congressman Hoyer was one of the first people in April '05 that I met with when I went to [Washington, D.C.] to decide if I was going to run. Since that time, I have been in contact with him a dozen times or more. ... It just feels more natural due to the relationship that we have that I would support him."

Ellsworth said Murtha called him on Tuesday night to congratulate him on his victory over Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.), but has had no other contact with the Pennsylvania Democrat. "It was on Election Night, a short conversation to congratulate me," Ellsworth said.

Hoyer gave nearly $14,000 to Ellsworth's campaign, while Murtha donated $4,000.

While House lawmakers backing Murtha acknowledge that he does not have one particular base of support, they claim that Murtha will instead draw endorsements from across the Caucus.

"It's not a factionalized race," Rep. Mike Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha backer, said Wednesday.

The Massachusetts lawmaker also added that he has advised Members-elect not to offer endorsements in the race prior to arriving in Washington next week for an organizational meeting of the Caucus

"My hope is that not a single new Member would spend a single second thinking about these leadership races before Tuesday," Capuano said.

In addition to the Majority Leader competition, Democrats could see a contest for control of the third-ranking post of Majority Whip.

Although House Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (D-S.C.) remained the only active candidate for the post Wednesday evening it is possible that Emanuel, who has said he will not serve a second term as DCCC chairman, will make a bid for the office.

Appearing at a press briefing Wednesday, Emanuel declined to discuss his plans, asserting that he wanted to confer with fellow lawmakers before issuing a decision. "Give me 24 hours more to decide," he said.

But even if Emanuel decides against challenging Clyburn for the post, the South Carolina lawmaker could still face competition. Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.), the current Chief Deputy Minority Whip, has not spoken publicly about her interest in the post, but is nonetheless expected to enter the race if Emanuel does not.

Clyburn officially announced his bid Wednesday in a letter to fellow lawmakers — although he began actively seeking endorsements in mid-October — touting his previous leadership experience, including chairing the Congressional Black Caucus as well as serving three years as the Democratic Caucus vice chairman.

"You run for the next office by serving well in the office you hold," Clyburn said during the DCCC's election watch party Tuesday night.

In the meantime, Pelosi, who is expected to ascend to the Speaker's office in January when Democrats take control of the House, has demurred on whether she will offer her own endorsement in the leadership races, asserting at a Wednesday press conference that Democrats first needed to finalize the outcome of several races.

"Democrats pledge civility and bipartisanship," Pelosi said at a midday press conference, her first in the wake of the Tuesday victory. "Democrats are not about getting even," she later added. "Democrats are about helping America get ahead."

Some Democratic strategists have suggested Pelosi should intervene in the Hoyer-Murtha contest in order to avoid a divisive inter-party squabble so soon after a major electoral victory, but the California Democrat has not done so yet.

"I think that this has to play out on its own," said a top House Democratic staffer, speaking on the condition of anonymity. Another senior House aide said Pelosi "was staying on the sidelines" and has not indicated any willingness to take sides.

Murtha has won kudos from many in the party for his opposition to President Bush on the Iraq War, despite intense criticism from House and Senate GOP leaders, as well as conservative commentators. Hoyer, while not close to Pelosi personally, has raised millions of dollars for Democratic candidates and incumbents, and spent extensive time on the road this election cycle, all of which earned him support within the Democratic Caucus.

In the interim, Democrats will hold an organizational meeting Tuesday, one of the first steps as the Caucus prepare to take over the majority party role it last held in 1994.

According to Capuano, who has overseen a review of the internal Caucus rules in recent months, Democrats will vote Tuesday on a new package of guidelines, covering everything from the selection of committee chairmen to more mundane regulations.

"There's no real shake-up in these rules, the real shake-up will come in the House rules," Capuano said.

Senior House Democratic aides said Pelosi and other Democratic leaders have otherwise done almost no preparatory work on taking over physical control of the House.

Pelosi has not appointed a trusted Democrat to oversee the transition to Democratic rule, a tactic former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) employed when the GOP won control of the House in the 1994 midterm elections.

Pelosi was very sensitive to accusations by President Bush and other Republican leaders that Democrats "were measuring the drapes" at the Capitol for a takeover, they purposely delayed any transition planning.

"[Pelosi] put the nix on anyone doing the transition," said a high-ranking Democratic aide.

Bush did telephone both Pelosi and Hoyer early Wednesday morning — he joked at a press conference that he had given Pelosi "the name of some Republican interior decorators who can help her pick out the drapes in her new office" — and the Democratic leaders are scheduled to have lunch at the White House today.

"I had a very cordial conversation," Hoyer said of his conversation with Bush. "Over the next two years, he wants to work together. If that's the posture he takes, we want to do the same."

Blue Regime Augurs A Shift In Chairs (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A day after winning control of the House, Democrats appear on the verge of taking over the Senate as well, giving them the ability to steer the agenda across Capitol Hill.

Though the Virginia outcome isn't official yet, it appeared last night that Democrat Jim Webb was about to prevail in the final Senate race Democrats needed to take effective, though exceedingly, narrow control. The Associated Press, after a statewide check of local election officials, declared Mr. Webb the winner after determining his razor-thin lead would hold up after a canvassing of the statewide vote.

The Republican, Sen. George Allen, isn't yet conceding. The Senator "wants to be sure all the votes are counted," said Dan Allen, a spokesman, last night. Republican officials said Sen. Allen is likely to want to wait until an initial canvassing of the results reported by the state's voting districts is completed before considering a concession. That canvassing might be completed today, they said.

If the canvassing doesn't show any anomalies, Sen. Allen might not seek the full, statewide recount he could request under state law, officials said. The new AP count showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236.

Earlier yesterday, Democrats also prevailed in the other Senate race that was too close to call on Tuesday night after the polls closed, the contest in Montana. Democrat Jon Tester was declared the narrow winner there when all votes were in.

The victories in Montana and Virginia would give Democrats an effective 51-49 majority. It would elevate Nevada's Harry Reid to the post of Senate Majority Leader, and he would then oversee Congress with Nancy Pelosi of California, who is poised to become Speaker of the House. Democrats would control both the House and Senate for the first time since 1994, when Republicans won a landslide election.

Technically, the Senate would be divided 49-49 between Republicans and Democrats. But the chamber also will include two Senators -- Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont, both of whom say they will align with Democrats.

Despite that, Democrats face a challenge translating the gains at the polls into wins on Capitol Hill. With the threat of a filibuster always possible, most legislation needs 60 votes to pass the Senate. President Bush also holds veto power.

Still, the Democrats' victory will have broad impact on how Congress conducts business. Democrats will take over dozens of congressional committees and will have the power to set the agenda for those panels. Some in line to become chairmen have suggested that, even if they can't pass legislation that Mr. Bush would sign into law, they would use the power of the gavel to conduct oversight hearings and investigations into the administration and some of its corporate allies.

In the Senate, Pat Leahy of Vermont would take over the Judiciary Committee; Hawaii's Dan Inouye would take the reins of the Commerce Committee; Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts would inherit the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee; and Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico would run the Energy and Natural Resources panel.

A former lawyer, Mr. Leahy has talked about removing the antitrust exemption for some insurance companies. Mr. Kennedy has plans to lead the charge on raising the minimum wage and expanding health care to the poor and needy.

At the Commerce Committee, Mr. Inouye champions many of the maritime and telecommunications policies of current chairman Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska. A major rewrite of the telecommunications law isn't likely to be affected by the changeover.

Likewise, Mr. Bingaman likely wouldn't bring major changes to energy legislation. The current chairman, Pete Domenici, joins him in representing New Mexico in the Senate. One difference is that Mr. Bingaman is a stronger supporter of renewable fuel and alternative energy sources.

The same goes for the Senate Banking Committee, where Connecticut's Chris Dodd is in line to be chairman. Few industry watchers expect a significant shakeup in the tone coming from the committee, which oversees the Securities and Exchange Commission and Federal Reserve, among others. The impact may be felt around the margins, with credit-card companies and big business potentially losing ground to insurers and retail investors.

In the House, the incoming chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, John Dingell (D., Mich.), has told the Federal Communications Commission to hold off on approving the merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp. until he formally takes control of the panel next year. Mr. Dingell may ask for conditions on the merger that his predecessor, Texas Republican Joe Barton, didn't.

Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), expected to take over the Financial Services Committee, will focus attention on affordable housing and predatory lending. But Mr. Frank also hopes to enact new regulations on government-sponsored enterprises, such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, that were endorsed by the current chairman, Mike Oxley (R., Ohio).

Rep. Charles Rangel, (D., N.Y.), who inherits the Ways and Means Committee, said he is inclined not to try to repeal Republican-passed tax cuts which are set to expire in 2010. In a conference call with reporters yesterday afternoon, Mr. Rangel said he wants to close the so-called tax gap between the amount of money the Internal Revenue Service is owed and how much it collects.

The IRS relies on private-sector companies to help it collect revenues that it is owed. Mr. Rangel said using private debt collectors is "terrible." Mr. Rangel said he would like to approve legislation as early as next week to exempt million of taxpayers from paying higher taxes under the alternative minimum tax.

Rep. Henry Waxman, (D., Calif.), who will run the Government Reform Committee plans to probe oil-company prices, government contracting in Iraq and massive growth in homeland-security expenditures.

Others assuming committee chairmanships in the House include Michigan's John Conyers at the Judiciary Committee; California's George Miller at the Education and Workforce Committee; and Wisconsin's David Obey at the Appropriations Committee. They are among the longest-serving lawmakers on Capitol Hill. Mr. Conyers, 77, began his career in Congress as an intern to Mr. Dingell, 80, about a half-century ago.

Democrats Promise Radical Reform (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Democrats in the House of Representatives on Wednesday declared themselves ready to press forward with an ambitious agenda and promised to enact the kind of change that they said voters demanded on Tuesday.

But they also tried to deflect attention from the liberal records of those set to ascend to top jobs in Congress, vowing to work with Republicans.

“We extend a hand of co-operation to the president, our colleagues across the aisle,” said Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago Democrat who led the party’s campaign committee. “We’ll work with you when we agree, we will challenge you when we don’t. But our goal will always be the best interests of our country.”

Uncertainty over which party would control the Senate – and the possibility that President George W. Bush could use his veto – necessitated such an approach. But so too did the growing strength of moderate Democrats, who expect to hold considerable sway in the new House.

“We will be the group that gave the Democrats the majority,” said John Tanner, a Tennessee congressman who is among the leaders of the Blue Dog coalition, a group of moderate Democrats who stress fiscal responsibility and often come from socially conservative districts.

Public expectations are also likely to shape the Democrats’ agenda. “This Democratic majority has heard the voices of the American people,” Nancy Pelosi, who will become the first female speaker of the House, said on Wednesday, with Iraq the place where the demand for change is most clear. Despite pleas from some on the left of their party, Democrats have ruled out impeachment proceedings against Mr Bush for his conduct of the war. They have also vowed not to cut off funding for US troops in Iraq.

A CBS News/New York Times poll this week found that 41 per cent of voters – and 50 per cent of Democrats – said that the war in Iraq would be the Democrats’ top priority if they controlled Congress. While Democrats portrayed the election as a referendum on Mr Bush and the war in Iraq, the difficult situation on the ground and divided views about what to do there, as well as the need to avoid appearing weak on national security and the White House’s power in this area will make quick, tangible progress difficult to achieve.

Mrs Pelosi has focused immediate attention on an aggressive package of measures that she said Democrats would enact in their first 100 hours in the majority.

Prompted by a series of recent ethics scandals, the top item in that "Six in '06" platform is a set of rules changes, which Mrs Pelosi said would "make this the most honest and open Congress in history". After Democrat complaints that Republican leaders frequently excluded them from debate and other House functions, she also pledged to restore civility and give the minority party a broader role.

The early agenda also includes increasing the federal minimum wage, enacting the homeland security recommendations of the bipartisan 9/11 commission, promoting stem-cell research and reducing university costs, by making tuition tax deductible and halving interest rates on student loans. Other priorities include giving the government the power to negotiate with drugs companies to lower prices in the Medicare prescription drug programme, eliminating what they say are Republican-backed incentives to shift jobs overseas and rolling back subsidies for big oil companies, using those funds to promote alternative energy sources instead.

"Jobs, healthcare, education, energy independence, a safer America, a dignified retirement – that's what the Democrats are all about and we're going to do that in the first 100 hours," Mrs Pelosi said on the campaign trail.

Democrats also pledged to adopt so-called "pay-go" rules, which re-quire any new spending or tax cuts to be offset by changes elsewhere in the budget.

Such a move would be popular with the Blue Dogs, who take their name from the Southern description of a party loyalist – one who would vote for a yellow dog if it were on the ballot, as long as it was running as a Democrat. The Blue Dogs were moderate and conservative Democrats who claim to have been "choked blue" by their party in the late 1980s and early 1990s, when liberals were in control.

"It helps force choices," said Mr Tanner.

Tuesday's vote saw the number of Blue Dogs in the House increase from 37 to 44, including several in the Ohio River Valley. Their new ranks include some lawmakers who are likely to become quick celebrities in the capital, such as Heath Shuler, a former Washington Redskins professional football quarterback. Mr Shuler, elected in North Carolina, opposes abortion and gun control.

Mr Tanner said Blue Dogs would also push for a financial audit of all government agencies and for including the costs of the war in Iraq within the federal budget, rather than treating it as a supplemental cost that is not included with other budget calculations.

Mrs Pelosi has earned a reputation as a San Francisco liberal and several Democrats poised to take over as chairmen of key committees have long records on the left of their party.

But James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University in Washington, said a Democratic majority would not be able to base its work on strictly liberal policies. "Elections have mandates, and the number of moderates elected means they'll have to go to the middle."

Finance's New Chair Has Equality On Agenda (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Expect keen wit, tough oversight and a sharply different emphasis when Massachusetts Democratic Rep. Barney Frank, 66, becomes chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, overseeing banking, housing and corporate governance.

One of the few openly gay House members, the Harvard-educated Frank is a liberal on social issues. He advocates tougher regulation in areas than current Chairman Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, but insists he's not anti-business. Frank's goal is to ensure that economic benefits are better distributed.

"We're getting economic growth, but it's coming at very great increases in inequality," Frank said in a recent interview. "How do you do a better job promoting growth without exacerbating" the widening gap between the rich and less well-off?

Among Frank's priorities: expanding affordable housing, enhancing consumer privacy rights and going after predatory mortgage lending. He has introduced legislation to force public companies to get shareholder approval for lavish CEO pay packages and to provide the Securities and Exchange Commission greater authority over hedge funds. Frank has opposed efforts by Wal-Mart and other firms to delve into financial services by acquiring a type of bank.

"He is a liberal who understands markets," says Floyd Stoner, chief lobbyist for the American Bankers Association. "When you work with Mr. Frank you have to be knowledgeable, organized and succinct."

Frank said Wednesday he will wait to announce an agenda for next year. In the short term, one big unknown is whether there will be a push to impose new oversight of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac when Congress reconvenes this month, still under GOP control. The House has passed a bill letting a new regulator cap the mortgage giants' $1.4 trillion portfolios. The Senate Banking Committee has a tougher stance.

Democratic gains could take some wind out of a business-backed drive to relax provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in reaction to the Enron accounting scandal. Businesses say the act, particularly tighter accounting provisions, is onerous. A Frank spokesman said he is not interested in changing Sarbanes-Oxley but would rather let the SEC use discretion in enforcing its costlier provisions.

Stoner and Sheila Crowley, president of the National Low Income Housing Coalition, note that there has long been bipartisan support on the committee for many issues that Frank champions, such as regulatory relief and housing. With Democrats in control, some of these bills — stymied under the GOP leadership — could have a full House vote.

"He'll hit the ground running, and we'll be there to help that happen," says Crowley, adding that along with Frank's efforts to build low-income housing, she hopes the committee will provide more oversight of rebuilding on the hurricane-battered Gulf Coast.

Gay rights advocates say Frank's chairmanship has symbolic, as well as substantive, meaning.

"Having him in a chairman's role is important, because I think one of the most important things we should be looking for is that Congress looks a lot more like America," says Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, a gay rights group.

The first member of Congress to announce he was gay, Frank has sponsored legislation to provide benefits to domestic partners of federal employees.

Frank was reprimanded by the House in 1990 after revelations that a male prostitute he hired as a household employee had run a prostitution business from Frank's home. He survived politically by coming clean to the Ethics Committee.

One of the House's fastest-talking, and fastest-thinking, lawmakers, Frank looks impatient even when sitting still. He is widely viewed as one of the premier speakers in Congress.

"He's one of the best I've ever seen," says Dan Mica, a former GOP congressman and now head of the Credit Union National Association. "I would never want to debate him on the other side."

Frank's prickly demeanor can put people off. He told his hometown paper, The Boston Globe, that he would try to tone down his comments if Democrats won the majority, to ensure he doesn't say anything to upset the markets.

Easily re-elected from a district that includes liberal strongholds as well as aging industrial and coastal areas, Frank has secured funds for defense contractors, the fishing industry and tech firms.

A native of Bayonne, N.J., Frank stayed in Boston after graduating from Harvard. He was first elected to Congress in 1980, succeeding Democratic Rep. Robert Drinan, a Catholic priest, who gave up his seat in the face of a Vatican ban on clergy in public office.

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Rep. John Dingell, who has long had a reputation as a partisan investigative bulldog, is in the unusual position of cautioning younger Democrats to resist the impulse to seek revenge on their Republican colleagues.

"Revenge makes you feel good," says Mr. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who, at 80 years old, is the most seasoned member of the committee chairmen taking control in the House. "It ain't the right way to go, but it's going to cause me some problems."

In taking back the reins of the Energy and Commerce Committee, for which he was chairman from 1981-94, Rep. Dingell says he plans to run his panel "from the center" and work out a formula for comity that allows Republicans to participate in the panel's decisions and investigations.

But he and other Democrats who want to reach out to Republicans to avoid gridlock may encounter some resistance from younger Democrats, half of whom have never served in a House controlled by Democrats. Many are smarting from being shut out of debates by Republican leaders and see the coming Democratic takeover as payback time.

Mr. Dingell has set an ambitious agenda for his committee, which has jurisdiction over a vast array of issues from climate-change regulations to prescription-drug prices for the elderly to foreign-currency manipulations that, he says, hurts the auto industry and other U.S. manufacturers.

A senior Republican House aide, who recalls the way Mr. Dingell ran the energy panel before, says Republicans see Mr. Dingell as "a very hard driver for his position," but also someone who "generally believes he works with both sides of the aisle."

Michael Kitzmiller, one of Mr. Dingell's former committee staff directors, cautions that Mr. Dingell's approach was far from free of partisan rancor. "We had these conflicts [with Republicans] that were just horrendous, but he had a way of not letting it explode to destroy the basic comity of the committee," he said.

Mr. Dingell also brought Republicans in on his investigations. In 1994, when Democrats lost control, some Dingell aides wrote down the formula he used to coach his investigative staff: "We learned the etiquette of dealing with our enemies: to be gentle, to treat them with the greatest care, to ask them a few nice questions, and then give them exactly what they deserve." Mr. Dingell has it hanging on the wall of his office.

Mr. Dingell governed with a sense of humor. Peter Stockton, one of his chief investigators, remembers his pouncing on a subpoenaed invoice that showed a defense-industry official once billed the Pentagon for kennel charges for a dog named Furston. "Who is Furston?" Mr. Dingell asked the hapless witness, who said he didn't know. "Well, let me read you a voucher here. Is Furston a dog?"

He also used patience. Mr. Kitzmiller recalls becoming so outraged at Mr. Dingell's penchant for protecting the auto industry and resisting gun-control measures that he resigned several times. "He would always call me back later and say 'Well, you don't have to deal with that anymore.' " When one younger member of the committee proved troublesome and always complained about assignments, Mr. Dingell tolerated him. "I said why do you put up with that?" recalls Mr. Kitzmiller. He said "because he reminds me of me."

Some younger Democrats are excited about the man some of them call "Big John" climbing back into the saddle. "He's legendary, well-known for using the committee to really get to the bottom of significant changes facing our nation," says Rep. Tammy Baldwin, (D., Wis.), who joined the panel in 1998 to work on health-care issues.

To some of the younger Democrats, the name Rayburn simply denotes the office building where the committee's office is located. To Mr. Dingell, it means Sam Rayburn, the former speaker of the House who was one of his first mentors when he arrived in Congress in 1955 at the age of 29. Mr. Rayburn's motto was "those who go along, get along."

Mr. Dingell's memories of the ways of Congress go back well before that. According to his aides, he breaks out in archaic language to brand enemies as "blackguards" "know-nothings" "pantywaists" and "lickspittles." This puzzled some of them until one came across a speech given by Mr. Dingell's father, who was also named John Dingell. He came to Congress in 1933 and his son inherited his seat. "The boss sometimes quotes from his father's old speeches," said an aide, who asked not to be identified.

Republicans Blame Their Party Leadership For Tuesday's Losses (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republicans turned on one another Wednesday after losing control of power in Congress - blaming an out-of-touch, self-promoting party leadership for abandoning ethics and conservative principles and turning off the country.

The first political casualty was House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., who announced he'd step down from the party's leadership.

More casualties were possible. At least one conservative movement leader demanded that Republicans in the House of Representatives delay electing leaders for the next Congress beyond the scheduled date of next Wednesday, presumably to allow time to reconsider the current slate.

Discontent could spread to the Senate, where Republicans lost a fifth seat Wednesday in Montana. There, Democrat Jon Tester defeated Republican Sen. Conrad Burns, who was tarred by his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

That put Democrats into at least a 50-50 tie with Republicans for Senate control.

That left Virginia, where Democrat James Webb led Republican Sen. George Allen by about 7,000 votes out of 2.3 million cast. Allen refused to concede, saying he'd wait to see final official results on Nov. 27 before deciding whether to seek a recount.

If Webb's lead holds, Democrats will control the Senate. If Allen wins a recount, then Vice President Dick Cheney would break the tie to let Republicans control the Senate, though their grip on power would be much diminished compared with the past five years.

Veteran conservative strategist Richard A. Viguerie was especially caustic.

"Every single member of the Republican leadership in the House should be replaced. They have failed the conservatives who put them in office, and they have failed the people of this country," Viguerie said.

"This election was also a referendum on the so-called `neoconservatives' - the big-government Republicans who took us into a nation-building war while they busted the budget and enriched big business and its K Street lobbyists."

"I feel liberated," said conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh, one of the party's biggest cheerleaders. "I no longer am going to have to carry water for people who I don't think deserve having their water carried."

In one of the most stinging indictments, David Keene, the longtime president of the American Conservative Union - the nation's oldest grass-roots conservative lobby, founded in 1964 - ripped Republicans for spending more taxpayer money than Democrats had and for weak ethics.

"We have watched Republicans elected by promising the highest standards in terms of integrity come to Washington to do good and stay to do well for themselves, their families and their friends, and demean the offices to which they were elected in the process," Keene said.

"We have witnessed the hypocrisy of Republican leaders who came to Washington swearing an allegiance to upholding traditional values work to protect those among their number who have flaunted those values, morals and standards.

"We have stood by as Republicans have flaunted, twisted and ignored rules to achieve their own partisan, rather than principled, ends; leaders who have used earmarks to seduce reluctant members to vote for legislation they knew was wrong and kept votes open for hours while they and their White House allies bludgeoned their colleagues into line in support of such legislation," Keene said.

Keene joined Rep. Eric Cantor, R-Va., in urging House Republicans to postpone their leadership elections until January. Cantor is a member of the existing House Republican leadership as chief deputy whip. Among the many Republicans mentioned as a possible challenger was Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., leader of a large bloc of both social and economic conservatives.

Others argued that voters were turned off by the climate in Congress, particularly by its partisanship and a sense that Republican leaders looked the other way at scandals, from Abramoff's lobbying corruption to former Florida Rep. Mark Foley's sexual harassment of teenage male aides.

Hastert presided over a partisan, one-party rule that shut Democrats out of negotiations. He wouldn't even allow the House to vote on an issue unless it could pass solely with Republican votes.

Voters "believed that we came to Washington to change government and government changed us," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Voters also rebelled at the sense that the Republican Congress didn't get anything done.

"There was a feeling of a do-nothing Congress," Republican pollster Ed Goeas said.

He said voters wanted "bipartisan solutions rather than the partisan bickering we've seen" and that Republicans want the party "to make sure our leaders have public service as their highest calling, not personal enrichment."

Conservative Talkers, Feeling Just A Little Blue (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Conservative commentators were bloodied but unbowed yesterday.

After a day in which Republicans lost their grip on the House and appeared on the verge of forfeiting control in the Senate, some of the right's most prominent voices found little cause for discouragement.

"Democrats, in my mind, don't have a mandate because they stood for nothing," radio host Laura Ingraham told her listeners yesterday.

"Republicans lost last night, but conservatism did not," Rush Limbaugh said on the 600 stations that carry his program. "The Democrats beat something last night with nothing. They advanced no agenda, other than their usual antiwar position."

Two distinct camps quickly emerged among the columnists, talkers and bloggers who spent much of the last six years defending the administration. One carried an air of defiance, the other a mood of resignation that what President Bush yesterday called an electoral "thumping" was perhaps deserved.

"People are obviously depressed, but there's also been a sense among conservatives for a long time that Republicans deserved to be taken to the woodshed, and perhaps this will be cathartic," said Rich Lowry, editor of National Review. The Democrats "had the virtue of not being the Republicans and benefiting from an unpopular war and not having high-profile corruption issues hung around their necks, but they also made themselves acceptable to voters."

Moments after the interview, as the president announced that he was replacing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Lowry wrote on his magazine's Web site that "a lot of Republicans are probably yelling right now, 'Why didn't you do it BEFORE the election?' Of course, he couldn't have done it right before the election, but a few months ago it might have been a step toward giving the public the fresh look/approach it wanted with regard to Iraq."

Ingraham said after her show that she is "very confused. Wasn't it just last week that the president said Rumsfeld was doing an 'excellent' job? And hasn't the president consistently said that his war policy is driven by what is happening on the ground in Iraq -- not politics or polls?

"Six months ago the White House could have replaced Rumsfeld, tying the decision to lack of adequate progress in the war -- but doing it the day after the election looks weak and defensive, and a move aimed at placating Speaker-to-be [Nancy] Pelosi."

Beyond the Pentagon and politics, there was simply the trauma, known to every high school athlete, of losing the big game. Commentator Sean Hannity sounded like a therapist as he addressed his followers yesterday: "I know a lot of you are sad. I know a lot of you are bummed. I know a lot of you are depressed. . . . I'll give you 24 hours and then I'm going to tell you to get over it. Don't let yourself wallow in what has happened here."

Brian Maloney struck an equally upbeat note on his Radio Equalizer blog: "Unlike Democrats after their 2004 election debacle, it doesn't seem likely that many conservatives will threaten to move to Canada, spend months in therapy, or engage in angry, unhinged public meltdowns. Welcome to the No-Sulk Zone!"

Some pontificators weren't in mourning for their formerly favorite political party.

"The voters gave the Republicans a well-earned kick in the gut," Atlanta radio host Neal Boortz wrote on his blog, adding that the GOP "bore little resemblance to the Republican majority that rode to power 12 years ago. In 1994 we were promised less government. Over the next 12 years the Republicans more than doubled the size of the government. . . . We were promised fiscal responsibility. We got a bridge to nowhere in Alaska."

Liberals are accustomed to dealing with big political defeats, having gotten plenty of practice in 2000, 2002 and 2004 as Democrats were relegated to minority status. Left-wing blogs have flourished, and liberal radio programs have gotten a foothold. Now conservative pundits, who have been riding high for so long, will be getting some practice.

After months of arguing that a Democratic victory would hand over the House to such scary figures as John Conyers, Barney Frank and Charlie Rangel, some conservatives now say that the winners are not just a collection of loony libs.

Attorney Scott Johnson, who writes for the popular Power Line blog, said from Minneapolis that he is "disappointed" in the voting but takes solace in the fact that "a number of conservative Democrats were elected in the House and Senate. I don't know how that plays with the antiwar, McGovernite thrust of the critique of administration foreign policy."

In certain conservative quarters, there was little effort to dispel the aura of gloom. Blogger Dean Barnett acknowledged online: "We made a case to the American people. They didn't buy it because they thought it was a weak case. And you know what? They were right. In the closing weeks of the campaign season, I felt like I was a lawyer who had a bad client while writing this blog."

But Limbaugh said he felt liberated at no longer having to "carry the water" of Republicans who don't deserve it.

For some, though, there may be a financial silver lining. Lowry noted that National Review's circulation tends to jump when the other side is in power, surging to 280,000 during the Clinton administration, only to decline to 150,000 during the Bush reign. He now expects another bump as conservatives get agitated about the Democrats' new clout in Congress.

"That doesn't mean I was rooting for Nancy Pelosi to be speaker," Lowry insists.

GOP Starts To Play The 'blame Game' Over Its Big Losses (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, November 9, 2006

When a political party suffers a major defeat, soul-searching and ideological bickering follow.

Republicans continued that tradition Wednesday, launching a period of self-reflection by trading barbs and pointing fingers.

Commentator Rush Limbaugh accused the Republican Party of straying from its conservative ideology, saying, "This non-partisan Republican identity, that's what went down in flames." Former House majority leader Tom DeLay referred to his party's losses as a "Texas whooping" on MSNBC. He said Republicans had failed to fight for their core beliefs on such issues as tax reform and immigration.

Dick Armey, former House majority leader and an architect of the Republicans' 1994 takeover of Congress, told National Public Radio's Diane Rehm that the GOP had become the big government party. "They actually grew the government," he said.

President Bush took a jocular swipe at his top political adviser, Karl Rove, who is credited with Bush's victories in 2000 and 2004 and GOP gains in the 2002 congressional elections. "I obviously was working harder in the campaign than he was," Bush said.

Post-election finger-pointing is normal, Republican strategist Scott Reed said. "This is a big party made up of economic conservatives and social conservatives, and there will be an attempt to play the blame game," he said.

The party's self-analysis began about a month ago, when polls predicted Democratic wins, Reed said. "These efforts usually make the party go back to its fundamentals, make it more focused," he said.

Democrats went through a similar period in the late 1980s, when the presidency seemed out of reach, said Will Marshall, president of the Progressive Policy Institute.

"Parties that don't engage in honest self-scrutiny rarely reform themselves," he said.

The Republican Majority for Choice, a lobbying group for Republicans who support abortion rights and embryonic stem cell research, blamed the losses Tuesday on Iraq and "social extremism," Co-chairwoman Jennifer Stockman said. "Moderates have been alienated for years. This was the last straw."

Today, the group planned to unveil a campaign and website, modeled after the liberal MoveOn.org site, called RealRepublicanMajority.org. It will begin running TV ads in Pennsylvania on Sunday, contrasting images of Republican icons like Ronald Reagan with social conservatives such as Sen. Rick Santorum, who lost his seat Tuesday.

The campaign will continue through the 2008 presidential election, Stockman said. She said, "It's all focused on making sure the Republican Party returns to the center if there's any chance of keeping the presidency and getting some of these seats back."

End Of The Revolution (WSJ)

By Dick Armey

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

If there was still any doubt, the Republican Revolution of 1994 officially ended Tuesday night with the loss of at least 28 seats and majority control of the House of Representatives. As I write this, the race in Virginia that will determine if the Republicans also lose control of the Senate is too close to call, but leaning Democrat.

It was a rout.

How did we get here? The war in Iraq and historical voting patterns that favor the opposition party in off-year elections are factors suggested by many post-election pundits. Certainly, the mounting problems in Iraq were on voters' minds, but responsibility for the conduct of the war lies with the executive branch, and President Bush was not on the ballot.

That said, this was a national election, driven by national issues. One big issue in exit polls suggests widespread voter backlash against the "culture of corruption." There is something to this, I think. Over time, too many Republicans in the governing majority forgot or abandoned their national vision, letting parochial interests dominate the decision-making process.

All enterprises have a life-cycle. The Republican takeover in 1994 was the culmination of years of agitation by a relatively small group of political entrepreneurs in the House. Before we could beat the Democrats and their "culture of corruption," we had to beat the old bulls of our own party. They too were driven by a parochial vision, and had grown complacent with the crumbs offered them by the majority. It is often said that Newt Gingrich and I "nationalized" the election in 1994, but what the Contract with America really did was establish a national (as opposed to a parochial) vision for the Republican Party. When we took control, that positive Reagan vision of limited government and individual responsibility provided a great deal of discipline and allowed us to govern accordingly. Our primary question in those early years was: How do we reform government and return money and power back to the American people?

Eventually, the policy innovators and the "Spirit of '94" were largely replaced by political bureaucrats driven by a narrow vision. Their question became: How do we hold onto political power? The aberrant behavior and scandals that ended up defining the Republican majority in 2006 were a direct consequence of this shift in choice criteria from policy to political power.

Nowhere was this turn more evident than in the complete collapse of fiscal discipline in the budgeting process. For most Republican candidates, fiscal responsibility is our political bread and butter. No matter how voters view other, more divisive issues from abortion to stem-cell research, Republicans have traditionally enjoyed a clear advantage with a majority of Americans on basic pocketbook issues. "We will spend your money carefully and we will keep your taxes low." That was our commitment. This year, no incumbent Republican (even those who fought for restraint) could credibly make that claim. The national vision -- less government and lower taxes -- was replaced with what Jack Abramoff infamously called his "favor factory." One Republican leader actually defended a questionable appropriation of taxpayer dollars, saying it was a reasonable price to pay for holding a Republican seat. What was most remarkable was not even the admission itself, but that it was acknowledged so openly. Wasn't that the attitude we were fighting against in 1994?

I've always wondered why Republicans insist on acting like Democrats in hopes of retaining political power, while Democrats act like us in order to win.

I've also wondered why Republicans let their fears and insecurities get in the way of important reforms. They missed the opportunity of a lifetime by failing to embrace retirement security based on personal ownership. Instead, from both parties we heard about "saving Social Security" -- to the extent we heard anything at all. Republicans should be for reforms that free individuals and their families from failed government programs. We should not be for "saving" failed government programs. When we took on welfare reform in 1995, we knew we were taking on a Goliath. Once we threw the first rock, we knew we had to finish the job. Otherwise, the worst claims of our opponents would have stuck with us in future elections. With legislative success, the horrible accusations of our opponents were replaced with reduced welfare roles, and the individual dignity and self-sufficiency that naturally followed.

In 2006, instead of heavy lifting on substantial reforms, House and Senate leaders attempted to rally their political base on wedge issues like illegal immigration and gay marriage. Instead of dealing with spending bills or retirement security, the Senate dedicated two full legislative days to a constitutional ban on gay marriage that no one expected to pass. No substantive legislation was passed dealing seriously with border security and legitimate guest workers (funding for a 700 mile fence was finally authorized, but no funds were appropriated). In both instances, it was pure politics, designed to appeal to angry factions of the GOP base. While Republicans managed to hold conservative Christians, they alienated independents, who represent 26% of the voting population. For the first time in 10 years, independents sided with Democrats by a wide margin. Candidates that bet on the high demagogy coefficient associated with illegal immigration, notably in Arizona, lost.

You can't build a winning constituency based on anger. The American people expect more. That is a lesson Democrats will soon learn if they wrongly interpret the election results as a mandate to "get even."

Moving forward, my advice to Republicans is simple: Don't go back and check on a dead skunk. The question Republicans now need to answer is: How do we once again convince the public that we are in fact the party many Democrats successfully pretended to be in this election? To do so, Republicans will need to shed their dominant insecurities that the public just won't understand a positive, national vision that is defined by economic opportunity, limited government and individual responsibility.

We need to remember Ronald Reagan's legacy and again stand for positive, big ideas that get power and money out of politics and government bureaucracy and back into the hands of individuals. We also need again to demonstrate an ability to be good stewards of the taxpayers' hard-earned money. If Republicans do these things, they will also restore the public's faith in our standards of personal conduct. Personal responsibility in public life follows naturally if your goal is good public policy.

Besides the obvious impact on the House and Senate, Tuesday's elections will no doubt redefine the Republican field going into early presidential primary states like Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. It will be up to grassroots activists in those battlegrounds to establish a constituency of expectations that anyone aspiring to be the next president of the United States must satisfy. To voters I say: Demand substance and you will get it. To Republican candidates for office I say: Offer good policy and you will create a winning constituency for lower taxes, less government and more freedom.

After Losses, GOP Asks: Now What? (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

Even before the votes were counted, the 2006 election set off a sweeping critique of what went wrong both within the Republican Party and among groups that once backed it.

On Capitol Hill, the power struggle to lead the new Republican minority is already under way. On Wednesday, Speaker Dennis Hastert announced he will not to seek the minority leader post in the next Congress.

Those with close ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff - or who knew about disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley's e-mails to pages and failed to act - need not apply. Lawmakers are awaiting the results of a bipartisan ethics investigation on a possible coverup in the page scandal, which could produce more openings in GOP leadership.

But GOP self-critics say that the bad environment - scandals, war, the economy, or the president - doesn't account for this historic GOP defeat. The need, they say, is to get back to the principles that won them their majority in 1994.

Call it a bridge to the insurgent past. While the Republican Class of '94 campaigned to balance federal budgets, the GOP in power has racked up massive deficits. The party that campaigned to limit the size of government instead vastly expanded it. And the party that railed against entitlements created the biggest expansion of one, the 2003 Medicare prescription drug program, in a generation.

"We did not just lost our majority, we lost our way," said Rep. Mike Pence (R) of Indiana, one of 25 Republicans who voted against the prescription drug plan. He also chairs the conservative Republican Study Group, the largest group in the caucus.

"While the scandals of the 109th Congress harmed our cause, the greatest scandal in Washington, D.C., is runaway federal spending," he added in a statement within hours of the historic defeat. Mr. Pence sat out the fight in January to replace Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas as majority leader, but he is now widely seen as a top contender. On Wednesday he announced his candidacy for the top GOP post. "Only by making a dramatic turn in the direction of the Republican Revolution can we hope to attain majority status," he wrote in a letter to his GOP colleagues.

In a separate statement, Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R) of Texas, who has drawn fire from fellow Republicans for his outspoken opposition to members' pork projects, called for a "return to Republican principles by renewing our commitment to limited government, individual empowerment, a strong national defense and traditional American values."

Along the same lines, the current GOP majority leader, Rep. John Boehner (R) of Ohio, called on the GOP to "recommit ourselves to the principles that brought us to the majority and renew our drive for smaller, more accountable government."

At stake in the next leadership fight is whether the GOP continues as a party of big conservative government or returns to its ideological roots in the Goldwater and Reagan eras, say libertarian critics.

"This is all a debate leading up to 2008, which is when we really get to make our decisions: Are we going to continue to follow the George W. Bush path of big government conservatism or the path of Reagan, Goldwater, and - to some extent - Newt Gingrich," says Ryan Sager, author of the recent book, "The Elephant in the Room: Evangelicals, Libertarians, and the Battle to Control the Republican Party."

Libertarians say the GOP's commitment to a social agenda that bans gay marriage and limits government funding for embryonic stem-cell research also contributed to its defeat this week. If there are new leadership elections, the party's conservative base is "going to be looking to clean house," and wipe away remnants of a leadership machine that "presided over the explosion of earmarks and petty corruption and worse," says Mr. Sager.

Meanwhile, business groups that work with the current GOP leadership are prospecting new ties with the incoming Democratic majority. One thing that Republicans and their critics are missing in the postelection analysis is that "this Congress, though well-intentioned, did not achieve a lot of legislative progress," says Jay Timmons, of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Of the many agenda items left incomplete at the end of the 109th Congress, those that most concern the business community include a permanent extension of the estate tax, renewal of research-and-development tax credits, and plans to bring down the high cost of oil and natural gas by increasing the domestic supply.

"They still have time to do this in the lame duck session," he adds.

Conservatism Is Alive And Well (USAT)

By Jonah Goldberg

USA Today, November 9, 2006

The great irony of the post-election spin fest is that Republicans and Democrats are switching their talking points.

For a year, the Republicans tried to frame the elections as a “choice” between the parties and their respective philosophies. The Democrats insisted that the elections were really just a “referendum” on President Bush, GOP corruption and the war. For most of the campaign season, Democratic leaders Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California and Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada hid in their respective spider holes. Later, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean refused to debate Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman — all for fear of reminding voters that the Democrats are Democrats. This just wasn't part of their playbook and was one reason Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's “botched” joke seemed so deadly: It threatened to remind people that a vote against the Republicans was a vote for the Democrats.

Now that the midterm elections are over, and the GOP has lost the House and possibly the Senate, the Republicans like the referendum spin after all. This was just a year to throw the bums out, they say, and a few scandal-plagued bad apples cost the barrel a whole bunch. Meanwhile, the Democrats insist that voters made a bold “choice for change,” whereas before, change merely meant “not Bush.”

Now change means whatever Pelosi, Reid, New York's Sen. Charles Schumer and Co. want. This is a major bait and switch. If I tell my waiter, “I don't want to eat this hamburger,” I've made a choice for change. That doesn't mean I've automatically embraced whatever he brings me in its place. A moldering pottage of road-killed badger is no less change than a steak. But it's not necessarily what most diners have in mind.

Republicans will have a tougher time winning the spin war, not because they have the worse argument, but because they have a worse environment to make it in. America has been moving to the right since at least 1980 with the election of Ronald Reagan. Since then, the GOP has seen its power and popularity grow as a result, albeit not in perfect tandem. Bill Clinton beat the first George Bush largely because he ran as a centrist Democrat. When he wavered in his centrism, the increasingly conservative electorate punished him with the 1994 Republican takeover of both the House and the Senate, which lasted until this week (not counting the 2002 switch in the Senate caused by the defection of Vermont's Sen. Jim Jeffords). And, of course, in 2000 and 2004, George W. Bush won back to back elections. In other words, the GOP was due for a shellacking, and any shellacking would seem like a sea change. But in a historical sense, this week's shellacking was a bit lacking.

Since the direct election of senators (i.e. the past nine relevant midterm elections), the average losses in a president's sixth year have been 34 House seats and seven Senate seats. By that standard, the Democrats came up just shy of average. Republican losses in the Senate in 1986 were worse, but few now remember those elections as a national repudiation of conservatism. Yet that's how we're supposed to interpret this week's news. That's hard to do if you look at the candidates who put the Democrats over the top.

Sen. Joe Lieberman's win in Connecticut was hardly a victory for the progressive base.

If Sen. George Allen of Virginia loses, it will be partly because he contracted a terrible case of Dukakisitis — a debilitating disease that causes the victim to run cartoonishly awful campaigns — and because Democrats threw in former Republican Jim Webb, a gun-toting, big-military, anti-affirmative action, right-leaning populist type who quit the Reagan administration as secretary of the Navy because it wasn't hawkish enough.

In Pennsylvania, Democrat Bob Casey unseated Sen. Rick Santorum because he's a nominally pro-life Democrat. Indeed, according to data collected by the leftwing Media Matters for America, 16% of the Democratic candidates in the most competitive races described themselves as “pro-life.”

There are other telling indicators. A Fox News election day poll suggests that perhaps a third of supporters of the gay-marriage ban on Virginia's ballot voted for Webb, while similar bans passed in several other states as did a ban on racial preferences in Michigan. Shortly before the elections, one in five self-described independents were “very enthusiastically” voting Democratic.

These are hardly indications of a sudden lurch to the left in American politics. The GOP got thrown out of office because it got fat and lazy and because Democrats — with the help of a transmission-belt media — convinced a lot of voters that they could simply change the channel on the war by voting for “change.”

The great irony is that the best thing in the world for the Republicans — though perhaps not the country — would be if the Democrats actually believed their spin and tried to act on a mandate that isn't there. Given the underlying historical trends in conservatism's favor, that would ensure another victory in 2008 for the GOP — as the party of change.

A Loss's Silver Lining (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

At least Republicans now know where the "Bridge to Nowhere" leads: to the political wilderness. But there are three reasons for conservatives to temper their despondency.

First, they were punished not for pursuing but for forgetting conservatism. Second, they admire market rationality, and the political market has worked. Third, on various important fronts, conservatism continued its advance Tuesday.

And Now, Back to the War

» Sebastian Mallaby The news has been dominated by elections and Iraq. After tomorrow, there will be only Iraq -- and an agonizing choice between soldiering on, scaling back or pulling out.

Of course the election-turning issue was not that $223 million bridge in Alaska or even the vice of which it is emblematic -- incontinent spending by a Republican-controlled Congress trying to purchase permanent power. Crass spending (the farm and highway bills, the nearly eightfold increase in the number of earmarks since 1994) and other pandering (e.g., the Terri Schiavo intervention) have intensified as Republicans' memories of why they originally sought power have faded.

But Republicans sank beneath the weight of Iraq, the lesson of which is patent: Wars of choice should be won swiftly rather than lost protractedly. On election eve the president, perhaps thinking one should not tinker with success, promised that his secretary of defense would remain. That promise perished yesterday as a result of Tuesday's repudiation of Republican stewardship, which, although emphatic, was not inordinate, considering the offense that provoked it -- war leadership even worse than during the War of 1812.

Tuesday's House result -- the end of 12 years of Republican control -- was normal; the reason for it was unprecedented. The Democrats' 40 years of control of the House before 1994 was aberrant: In the 140 years since 1866, the first post-Civil War election, party control of the House has now changed 15 times -- an average of once every 9.3 years. But never before has a midterm election so severely repudiated a president for a single policy.

The Iraq war, like the Alaska bridge, pungently proclaims how Republicans earned their rebuke. They are guilty of apostasy from conservative principles at home (frugality, limited government) and embrace of anti-conservative principles abroad (nation-building grandiosity pursued incompetently).

About $2.6 billion was spent on the 468 House and Senate races. (Scandalized? Don't be. Americans spend that much on chocolate every two months .) Although Republicans had more money, its effectiveness was blunted because Democrats at last practiced what they incessantly preach to others -- diversity. Diversity of thought, no less: Some of their winners even respect the Second Amendment.

Free markets, including political markets, equilibrate, producing supplies to meet demands. The Democratic Party, a slow learner but educable, has dropped the subject of gun control and welcomed candidates opposed to parts or even all of the abortion rights agenda. This vindicates the candidate recruitment by Rep. Rahm Emanuel and Sen. Chuck Schumer, chairmen of the Democratic House and Senate campaign committees, respectively. Karl Rove fancies himself a second iteration of Mark Hanna, architect of the Republican ascendancy secured by William McKinley's 1896 election. In Emanuel, Democrats may have found another Jim Farley, the political mechanic who kept FDR's potentially discordant coalition running smoothly through the 1930s.

Making the Democratic House majority run smoothly will require delicacy. The six elections beginning with 1994 produced Republican majorities averaging just 10 seats. The six elections before 1994 produced Democratic majorities averaging 44. Nancy Pelosi's majority will be less than half that. The most left-wing speaker in U.S. history will return to being minority leader in 2009 unless she eschews an agenda that cannot be enacted without requiring the many Democrats elected from Republican-leaning districts to jeopardize their seats.

This year Democrats tacitly accepted much of the country's rightward movement over the past quarter-century. They did not call for restoring the 70 percent marginal tax rates that Ronald Reagan repealed. And although Pelosi and 15 of the 21 likely chairmen of committees in the coming Congress voted against the 1996 welfare reform, which has helped reduce welfare rolls by roughly 60 percent, Democrats this year did not talk about repealing it.

The property rights movement gained ground Tuesday as voters in nine states passed measures to restrict governments from exercising eminent domain in order to enlarge their tax revenue. In Michigan, opponents of racial preferences in public hiring, education and contracting easily passed their referendum, 58 to 42 percent, in spite of being outspent more than three to one. In Minnesota -- the only state Democrats have carried in each of the past eight presidential elections, but one that is becoming a swing state -- Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty was reelected. And, come January, the number of Republicans in the House (at least 200) will still be larger than the largest number during the Reagan years (192 in 1981-83).

The country remains receptive to conservatism. That doctrine -- were it to become constraining on, rather than merely avowed by, congressional Republicans -- can be their bridge back from the wilderness.

AP: Hastert Won't Seek House Leader Post (AP-Y)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, November 9, 2006

Triggering a post-election shake-up, Dennis Hastert announced Wednesday he will not run for leader of House Republicans when Democrats take control in January.

DOJ_NMG_0092110

"Obviously I wish my party had won," the House Speaker said in a statement that added he intends to return to the "full-time task" of representing his Illinois constituents.

His decision to step down from the leadership cleared the way for a likely succession battle among lawmakers who face the sudden loss of power after a dozen years in the majority.

Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, currently the majority leader, is expected to run for leader, and Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana announced during the day he also will seek the post. Joe Barton of Texas has signaled he may join the field.

Hastert first conveyed word of his plans in a conference call with fellow GOP leaders one day after Republicans lost control of the House in midterm elections.

There is no recent precedent for Hastert's situation. The last time control of the House changed hands, in 1994, the speaker at the time, Democratic Rep. Tom Foley of Washington, lost his House seat.

Hastert, 64, became speaker nearly eight years ago, stepping up after Newt Gingrich resigned and the next-in-line lawmaker, Bob Livingston, quit after saying he had had an extramarital affair.

A former high school wrestling coach, Hastert was the perfect tonic for Republicans at the time, studiously avoiding the controversy that Gingrich often seemed to court.

He worked closely with President Bush, and originally had indicated he would retire rather than seek re-election this fall. The president prevailed on him to run again though, and Hastert agreed.

In the final weeks of the campaign, fellow Republicans questioned whether he or his aides had failed to act more quickly to force Rep. Mark Foley to resign. The Florida Republican quit Congress on Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit computer messages he had sent to teenage Capitol pages.

Hastert's tenacious — but plodding — approach to his tenure received mixed reviews. He largely shunned the talk-show circuit. He pushed much of Bush's legislative agenda to passage, although critics said he occasionally failed to line up GOP support for key legislation, including a 1999 resolution supporting U.S. intervention in Kosovo and gun-control measures.

Although conservative, Hastert became known more as a legislative tactician with a pragmatic, consensus-building style than as an ideological purist.

In an effort to keep his fragile, fractured Republican majority — and himself — in charge of the House, Hastert maintained a dizzying fundraising pace as speaker that rivaled the legendary cash-collecting abilities of his predecessor, Gingrich.

He took steps to decentralize the House, allowing policy to bubble up through the committees rather than being dictated down from the top.

Hastert won 10 terms by concentrating on issues important to his north central Illinois district, a mix of far-out Chicago suburbs, farmland and high-tech industry.

On Tuesday, Hastert was easily re-elected to his congressional seat over a relatively unknown challenger, but Democratic wins nationwide gave them control of the House and put California Democrat Nancy Pelosi in line to be the next speaker.

"It's been kind of tough out there," Hastert said during a brief appearance at his election headquarters.

Several officials said Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri would seek a new term as whip, the second-ranking leadership position. Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona circulated a letter to fellow Republicans announcing he would run for the post.

Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, issued a statement saying she would not seek to remain in leadership. She is locked in a tough re-election race in her district around Columbus.

Players Begin Jockeying For Leadership Posts (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republicans' loss of power in Congress set off a leadership shuffle Wednesday as the new minority party faced remaking itself after its election losses and Democrats scrambled to divide the spoils of victory.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert announced that he will step down as leader of the House Republicans at the end of the year after an election night that saw his party lose at least 28 seats and control of the chamber. As of Wednesday evening, no Democratic incumbent had lost.

Nine races remained too close to call. Rep. Deborah Pryce, an Ohio Republican, was in one of them. Pryce, the only female member of the House GOP leadership team, told colleagues in a letter that she would also give up her leadership post even if she wins re-election.

"I believe it is in the best interest of the party … that I keep my focus on my district for the next two years and ensure this seat remains safely in Republican hands," Pryce wrote.

House members in both parties celebrated the end of the congressional campaign by cranking up new campaigns for party leadership positions. Elections will be next week, when members of the current Congress return for a lame-duck session to complete work on spending bills and next year's freshmen arrive for orientation.

In the Senate, Virginia Democrat Jim Webb was declared the winner Wednesday night by the Associated Press over incumbent George Allen. That would elevate Harry Reid of Nevada to majority leader. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky has no opposition to succeed retiring Sen. Bill Frist as the new Senate Republican leader.

Former Senate GOP leader Trent Lott of Mississippi, forced from his post in 2002 after a controversy over a remark he made at Sen. Strom Thurmond's 100th birthday party, has said he may try for a comeback as McConnell's deputy.

The outlook is less certain in the House. Although even President Bush acknowledged Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi's role (she said at a news conference that he called her "speaker-elect" during a phone call), competition for the remaining slots on her team is intense.

After 12 years when Democrats were out of power, "there's a lot of pent-up ambition," says Democratic Rep. Zoe Lofgren of California.

A fight is underway for the job of Democratic majority leader. Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, a longtime Pelosi ally and critic of the Iraq war, has announced plans to challenge Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland. Hoyer, currently the No. 2 Democratic House leader, is a onetime Pelosi rival who has the support of many party centrists.

Another confrontation is looming over the third-ranking Democratic post. Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who engineered the party's House takeover as head of the congressional campaign committee, says he has not ruled out a challenge to Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, a senior member of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Congressional analyst Norman Ornstein says that would pose a "tricky" challenge for Pelosi. Emanuel has "a strong and legitimate claim to a reward," he says, but blocking an African-American from the first rung on the leadership ladder could anger a key constituency.

House Republican leadership contests are shaping up as a wide-open, intensely ideological fight over what direction the party should take in the aftermath of its losses. Reps. Joe Barton of Texas and Mike Pence of Indiana are challenging Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the current majority leader, for the post of minority leader. Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, a conservative closely allied with Pence, said he will oppose Roy Blunt of Missouri for House minority whip, the second-ranking GOP leadership post.

All of the candidates for top Republican posts are advocating a turn to the right. "We must seize this opportunity to reaffirm our conservative principles," Blunt said in a letter to colleagues. Party moderates read the returns differently. "The majority of the American people are centrists, and our party lost many seats because the party was not in touch with what the American people care about," said Rep. Mike Castle of Delaware.

Former New Jersey governor Christine Todd Whitman said Republicans lost ground because of a "hard-edged" image and emphasis on divisive issues such as abortion and gay marriage. She urged GOP leaders to recruit another woman to replace Pryce on the leadership team. "It's important for Republicans to have a woman there, because the gender gap is still an issue and women are more than 50% of the American people," she said.

The infighting got underway as election returns were still being counted. Among the late-decided races, Rep. Richard Pombo, a seven-term California Republican and a leading critic of environmental regulations, lost to Democrat Jerry McNerney, the chief executive of a wind-power company. Still-undecided races in Connecticut, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Texas, Washington and Wyoming would determine the fates of eight Republican incumbents. One Democrat, Rep. John Barrow of Georgia, remained locked in a close race with Republican Max Burns.

Alexander Says He's Close To Getting Votes Needed To Win GOP Whip (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

Tennessean

U.S. Sen. Lamar Alexander said today he's confident his Republican colleagues will select him to be GOP whip, the party's No. 2 leadership position in the Senate.

Alexander said he's close to a majority and "working on a consensus" to win the post now that his closest rival, Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, lost his re-election bid.

"I'm encouraged by the response I'm receiving from my fellow senators," Alexander said in a conference call with reporters. He also said he was disappointed by Santorum's loss and had looked forward to a "spirited contest."

Alexander for months has been meeting with Senate Republicans in hopes they will select him to be the GOP whip. The current whip, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, is expected to succeed Sen. Bill Frist as GOP leader. Frist, a Republican from Nashville, is leaving at the end of the year to consider a 2008 presidential campaign.

The whip counts votes and tries to maintain party unity. McConnell also has used the leadership job to prioritize projects back home in Kentucky, something Alexander has said he would try to do, too.

The closed-door House and Senate leadership elections are scheduled for Nov. 15.

Even though Tennessee Republicans avoided the fate of their GOP colleagues in several states when Bob Corker beat Democrat Harold Ford Jr. to capture Frist's seat on Tuesday, Alexander said Republicans need to listen to American voters.

"We'd be tone deaf if we didn't hear the message Americans were sending to Congress," Alexander said. "We've (Republicans) drifted from our core values. We haven't gotten control on entitlement spending. We've forgotten that we're opposed to the idea of Washington knows best."

Suggesting that President Bush should work more closely with Congress, Alexander said, "I think we need to remind ourselves and the country that Pennsylvania Avenue is a two-way street."

Democratic Majority May Grow (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Democrats claimed a comfortable House majority in Tuesday's midterm elections and appear poised to also capture control of the Senate pending a final vote tally in Virginia, as voters across the country voiced widespread frustration with President Bush and the Republican Party's leadership.

In the House, Democrats picked up a minimum of 28 seats, with the potential for at least one more gain pending final vote confirmation or recounts. In the Senate, Democratic challengers defeated Sens. Rick Santorum (Pa.), Mike DeWine (Ohio), Jim Talent (Mo.) and Lincoln Chafee (R.I.).

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) narrowly trailed state Senate President Jon Tester (D) into the wee hours Wednesday morning and the race was called for Tester by mid-day, although Burns has yet to concede.

That leaves Virginia as the contest to decide whether Democrats will have 51 Senate seats next Congress.

Surrogates for Sen. George Allen (R) said Wednesday they were unwilling to concede defeat before all the votes were counted and the tally becomes official next week. Unofficial results late Wednesday afternoon showed Allen trailing former Reagan Navy Secretary Jim Webb (D) by 7,217 votes.

But even as the official Senate outcome and several House races remained up in the air and recount teams were being deployed Wednesday morning, strategists in both parties already were shifting their focus to the 2008 landscape and assessing how sustainable the new Democratic majorities might be.

At a briefing Wednesday to discuss the election results, National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) conceded that the seats held by GOP Reps. Anne Northup (Ky.) and Jim Leach (Iowa) — two of the biggest upsets Tuesday — would be all but impossible to return to the GOP fold. Leach had held his seat for 15 terms.

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) carried both districts in the 2004 presidential contest, and he also won the districts held by defeated Reps. Clay Shaw (Fla.), Curt Weldon (Pa.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Charles Bass (N.H.).

DOJ_NMG_0092113

All six seats would appear to be difficult for the GOP to regain before the next round of reapportionment and redistricting after the 2010 Census.

Northup has faced tough challenges ever since winning the Democratic-leaning Louisville-based seat in 1996 and, in more favorable climates, has always held on.

"It's a tough seat," Reynolds said. "She's the only person I know that can hold it [for Republicans]. We watched it and it just was a year where she ran a good race and the Democratic numbers of the city were able to prevail."

But Reynolds also sounded confident that his party would be able to recapture some of the GOP-friendly territory lost in 2006.

He held out the seats of Reps. John Sweeney (N.Y.) and Jim Ryun (Kan.), both of whom were defeated on Tuesday, as prime pickup opportunities in 2008.

Sweeney's upstate New York seat has a Republican registration advantage of almost 100,000, Reynolds said, and he described Kansas' 2nd district as a "pretty darn good seat." President Bush won 59 percent of the vote in Ryun's district in 2004.

Democrats, however, likened their strong performance in the Democratic-friendly Northeast to the political realignment that occurred in the GOP tidal wave of 1994, when Democrats lost a disproportionate number of seats in the South — most of which they have not since reclaimed.

The Democrats picked up a minimum of 10 seats with victories in Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York and Pennsylvania on Tuesday. In Connecticut's 2nd district, Rep. Rob Simmons (R) trailed former state Rep. Joe Courtney (D) by less than 200 votes as of late Wednesday and the race had yet to be called.

"Blue states got really blue," Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said in meeting with reporters Wednesday. "We were halfway [to the majority] before we even left the Northeast. [Early in the cycle] we talked about building a strategy in the Northeast that would be for us what the South was for Republicans in 1994."

Several races still were too close to call on Wednesday, but at minimum 20 House Republicans were tossed from office Tuesday — including Resources Chairman Richard Pombo (Calif.) — and Democrats picked up eight GOP-held open seats.

Retaking many of those seats in GOP-leaning territory next cycle may prove to be a more daunting task for Republicans than it might appear, even with the pull of the presidential ticket at the top of 2008 ballots.

For instance, Democrats picked up three seats in Indiana, all of which are districts that voted strongly for Bush in 2004. But Vanderburgh County Sheriff Brad Ellsworth's (D) more than 20-point blowout of Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.) would appear to make him a less-than-appealing target for any would-be opponents, despite the lackluster campaign that Hostettler ran.

In addition, Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) has spent the past year preparing for a White House bid in 2008. If he is on the national ticket next cycle, it would only further boost the re-election prospects of Ellsworth, Hill and attorney Joe Donnelly (D), who defeated Rep. Chris Chocola (R-Ind.) on Tuesday.

Even winning back a conservative-leaning district such as North Carolina's 11th district, where former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler (D) defeated eight-term Rep. Charles Taylor (R), is far from a sure thing for the GOP.

DCCC spokesman Bill Burton argued that new Members like Shuler, a conservative on social issues, are a genuine reflection of their constituencies and will vote their districts.

If that proves to be the case, Democrats also would have a good shot of holding onto GOP-leaning seats they picked up Tuesday such as Arizona's 5th district, Minnesota's 1st district and New York's 24th district.

Other Republican targets are more obvious. Just as Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) began the 2006 cycle as the No. 1 target for the GOP, that distinction for 2008 goes to former Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas). Lampson won the seat vacated by former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) after the Republican nominee was forced to mount a write-in campaign. The district voted 64 percent for Bush in 2004, and Lampson faces an uphill battle in holding the seat two years from now.

Bean, however, won re-election Tuesday by a comfortable 51 percent to 44 percent margin in a district where Bush won 56 percent two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0092114

Another challenge for Republican leaders heading into next cycle will be to motivate their House Members to stick around, given their new minority status. Both parties have done a good job of holding retirements to a minimum for the past two cycles.

Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf, a one-time top aide to ex-House Democratic Leader Richard Gephardt (Mo.), recalled the shock within the party ranks when Democrats lost control of the House in 1994.

"I think there's a whole bunch of their people who have never really contemplated the idea that they were going to lose," Elmendorf said. "They're going to be depressed. They're not going to like being in the minority, and they're not going to like being taken off their exclusive committees, and they're going to think twice about whether they should stay here or not."

Meanwhile, if Democrats do claim a one-seat majority in the Senate, the 2008 landscape already is tilted in their favor because of the sheer number of seats the GOP is defending.

Twenty-one Republican-held seats and only 12 Democratic-held Senate seats are up for re-election next cycle, and the playing field does not overlap with any of the biggest presidential battlegrounds: Florida, Ohio, Missouri and Pennsylvania.

Retirement worries also appear to be a more prominent problem for the GOP. Topping the party's potential retirement list are Sens. Pete Domenici (N.M.), John Warner (Va.), Ted Stevens (Alaska), Thad Cochran (Miss.) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.). Sen. Wayne Allard (Colo.) must decide whether to adhere to a term-limits pledge.

Competitive contests are all but assured in Colorado, Minnesota, Louisiana and South Dakota, and open-seat races in New Mexico and Virginia also would draw much attention.

Republicans' best pickup opportunities appear to rest on their ability to generate competitive races against Sens. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) and Max Baucus (D-Mont.).

Sen. John Ensign (Nev.) is set to take the helm of the National Republican Senatorial Committee next cycle. Democrats have not decided who will chair the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in 2008, although current Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) is heavily favored to do a return engagement.

Democrats Recast U.S. Political Landscape (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The rolling realignment of U.S. politics accelerated Tuesday, as Democrats strengthened their hold over the Northeast and opened new beachheads in the Midwest and Mountain West that could prove critical to their hopes of winning the White House two years from now.

These and other political changes, illuminated by the 2006 election like a late-night flash of lightning, could signal a new stage in the competition between the two major parties.

For Democrats, the watchword Tuesday was growth: the party expanded its reach with key groups of swing voters as it made notable advancements on previously GOP-leaning terrain.

The results sent Republicans a message of retrenchment: the Democratic surge reversed President Bush's gains in the 2004 vote among women and Hispanic voters and saw the GOP virtually obliterated across the Northeast and mid-Atlantic.

In all, the election dealt a powerful blow to Republican hopes that Bush's re-election in 2004 had established a narrow but lasting political majority for the party. Instead, the U.S. appears to have reverted back toward a 50-50 political nation, with Democrats, if anything, claiming the momentum.

"Heading into the 2008 election, neither party holds a significant advantage," argued political strategist Simon Rosenberg, head of centrist Democratic group known as NDN, in a memo Wednesday. "It is a 'jump ball' for control in 2008 . . . "

The most emphatic Democratic gains came in the 11 Eastern states stretching from Maryland to Maine. Many of these states were once a foundation of the GOP, but they have drifted toward the Democrats over the last 50 years as Republicans have become more closely identified with a Southern-flavored social conservatism and small-government ideology.

That trend, mixed with antipathy toward President Bush and the war in Iraq, produced explosive gains for Democrats in the East on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0092115

Pending final results in two tight contests, Democrats gained as many as 12 House seats in the region, ousted GOP senators in Pennsylvania and Rhode Island and seized Republican-held governorships in Massachusetts, New York and Maryland.

When the next Congress convenes, Democrats could hold 68 of the region's 92 House seats. They also will control 17 of the region's 22 Senate seats (Bernie Sanders of Vermont and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who were elected as independents, plan to caucus with the party.)

Two other Democratic breakthroughs turned heads. One was their success in smaller, economically struggling Midwestern communities where Bush ran well in 2000 and 2004. Democrats beat three GOP House members from Indiana in districts with those characteristics, and Democrat Sherrod Brown showed strength in such places in routing Republican Sen. Mike DeWine in Ohio.

The other important Democratic breakthrough came in the Mountain West. Democrats captured one GOP-held House seat in Colorado and two in Arizona. In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester apparently defeated Republican Sen. Conrad Burns, pending a final vote count. Democratic governors won landslide re-elections in New Mexico, Arizona and Wyoming. Democrat Bill Ritter scored a landslide victory in the race for Colorado's governor's office, which a Republican had held.

After Tuesday's results, Republicans "should be terrified" about holding Colorado in the 2008 presidential race, said Walt Klein, a veteran GOP consultant in the state.

Still, Democrats excited by their gains may be overlooking signs of continued resistance in the region. They came close, but failed to defeat, targeted GOP House incumbents in Nevada and Colorado, lost the Nevada governor's race, failed in a bid against Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and saw Colorado voters reject a ballot initiative to authorize civil unions for homosexuals while approving a state constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage.

One reason Democrats generally ran well across the Southwest was the GOP's poor showing among Hispanics.

In 2004, exit polls showed Bush carrying about 40 percent of Hispanic voters. But with many Republicans pushing a hard-line message on immigration, National Election Pool exit polls showed GOP congressional candidates winning just 29 percent of the Hispanic vote.

Republican support also suffered among independent voters, after running about even with them in 2002 and 2004. Democrats won independents, often by commanding margins, in each of the 11 most competitive Senate races except in Rhode Island and New Jersey, where the GOP nominated moderate candidates.

Women voters, who moved toward Bush in 2004, turned away from the GOP. Women preferred the Democratic candidates in the 11 top Senate races, often by huge margins.

One big reason for that success: exit polls found women considerably less supportive of the Iraq war than men. Similarly, the exit polls found that independents were nearly as unhappy about the war as Democrats.

Those findings suggest that without progress in stabilizing Iraq, Republicans may find it difficult to regain the support they lost Tuesday. The White House understands that after the election, the clock is ticking more loudly.

"The president believes in this war and everything that is at stake in this war, and so it's very difficult, even impossible, to envision that he would just give up on it," said a senior GOP strategist who requested anonymity when discussing administration policy. "On the other hand, the White House and Republicans are aware this is an unpopular war, and there is certainly pressure to turn things around. It's no secret that public patience is being taxed."

Half-Dozen House Races Could Move To Recounts (RC)

By Matthew Murray And David M. Drucker

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Election Day may stretch well in to mid-November or beyond, as a bumper crop of midterm nail-biters mean that state elections officials may re-tally the vote in perhaps a half dozen or more House races.

Several of the candidates involved in potential recounts have consulted lawyers to make sure they know their options, though none went so far as to predict that a recount was likely to change the outcome of a race.

DOJ_NMG_0092116

As of Wednesday afternoon, Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said the GOP was keeping a watchful eye on races involving incumbents Reps. Rob Simmons (Conn.), Robin Hayes (N.C.), Barbara Cubin (Wyo,), Heather Wilson (N.M.) and J.D. Hayworth (Ariz.) — and GOP House campaign leadership hinted that the list may not be fixed.

"We will assist in any recount that we are asked to assist in," said NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.).

By late Wednesday, Democrat Joe Courtney's narrow lead over Simmons appeared to trip a Connecticut state law requiring recounts.

With 100 percent of precincts reporting, the total vote in Connecticut's 2nd district had Courtney besting the three-term incumbent by less than 200 votes. Although Simmons' campaign declined requests to indicate whether he would waive a recount, Simmons readied himself Wednesday for a recount, as he said on a GOP conference call, according to a source familiar with the call.

Courtney declared himself the winner on Wednesday. "Right now there is no reason to believe this will get narrower," said Courtney campaign spokesman Brian Farber.

In addition to those races flagged by the GOP, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokesman Bill Burton said Democrats were keeping tabs on Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy's (D) attempt to oust the House GOP's fourth-ranking Member, Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio). Burton also said Democrats were concerned about alleged voting irregularities in Florida's 13th district, where automobile dealer Vern Buchanan (R) narrowly defeated banker Christine Jennings (D) in the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris (R).

David Kochman, a Buchanan campaign spokesman, said Wednesday afternoon that Jennings was trailing Buchanan by 367 votes.

However, Jennings sounded more optimistic that a turnaround could be afoot, saying in a statement that the Supervisor of Elections has reported 18,382 undervotes, and that that number indicated something had gone awry in the vote counting. An undervote is when a ballot registers votes for other offices but not the office in question — in this case these ballots did not include a vote for Congress.

Jennings also talked of complaints coming into her campaign office from concerned voters, and by Wednesday Democrats already were asking for donations to pay for a recount.

In many states, margins of less than 1 percent can trigger an automatic recount, negating the need for a campaign to lawyer up and demand one from the courts. Such is the case in the 12th district of Georgia, where former Rep. Max Burns (R) believes that is the next step in his challenge to Rep. John Barrow (D).

"We think right now the election could go either way," Burns campaign spokesman John Stone said, saying his candidate received a big boost Wednesday when the votes from Republican-leaning Effingham County came in, dropping Barrow's lead from 2,387 on Tuesday night to around 1,000.

"Whoever wins this race will win it with a few hundred votes," Stone said, explaining that military and provisional ballots, as well as regular ballots that had yet to be counted, could help put Burns over the top.

In another seat where Republicans were hoping for a pickup — Georgia's 8th district — the margin also remains too close to call, with Rep. Jim Marshall (D) leading former Rep. Mac Collins by 1,700 votes. Collins spokesman Ed Prill said the process in his race to determine the winner could be long and drawn out.

Prill said that exploring every option was much more than an exercise for its own sake.

"We're not in the business of wasting our time," he said.

Bush To Meet With Big 3 Automakers (AP-Y)

AP, November 9, 2006

President Bush's long-promised meeting with the heads of Detroit's Big Three automakers will be held Tuesday at the White House.

The auto executives tentatively were scheduled to meet with Bush in May, but in September, the meeting was pushed back until after the election.

DOJ_NMG_0092117

That prompted criticism from Michigan's Gov. Jennifer Granholm and other Democrats who said the administration had neglected the problems of the Big Three automakers and its workers.

The White House said the president talks to the automakers all the time, and promised that Bush will hold his meeting with the heads of General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co., and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group in mid-November. White House spokesman Tony Fratto said Bush would meet with the automakers before leaving on a trip to Asia.

Bush declined an opportunity to have the meeting in Detroit when he was there in early September to attend a fundraiser for a GOP Senate candidate about 40 miles northwest of Detroit. The Big Three automakers all have headquarters in or near Detroit.

Bush To Study Bill That Would Give D.C. Full Voting Rights (WP)

By Yolanda Woodlee

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

President Bush said yesterday that he will review a bill to give District residents full voting rights in the House, marking the first time he has spoken about a measure that local lawmakers are trying to win approval for over the next few weeks.

The bill, introduced six months ago, also would add a congressional seat for Utah. Proponents of D.C. voting rights have waged a major push to get the bill passed this year.

"It's the first I've heard of it," Bush responded to a question during a news conference at the White House. "I didn't know that's going to come up from the lame duck."

The president was referring to the last few days of the current Congress, which returns to session next week and will adjourn before Thanksgiving. He did not say whether he would support the bill.

"Well, it may or may not come up. . . . But I'll take a look at it," he said.

Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman, said Bush was aware of the bill but wants to study it.

U.S. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who introduced the measure with Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) in the spring, said he has talked about the issue with the president.

"The congressman said that he had a conversation with the president months ago and followed up with a lengthy memo on it to the White House office that deals with policy matters," said Brian McNicoll, a Davis spokesman. "This is a legacy issue. We're working hard on it. We're not done, and I do not see the president vetoing this."

Bush's comments come a week after prominent D.C. politicians and business leaders met to determine how they can get the bill passed this year.

Voting rights advocates want Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to move the bill to the floor for a vote. But before that, Utah lawmakers would have to approve a redistricting map that would create a fourth congressional seat for the state.

The bill would expand the House from 435 to 437 members. In hopes of winning broad bipartisan support, Davis and Norton proposed that one seat go to Utah, which is predominantly Republican, and the other to the District, which is overwhelmingly Democratic.

Chris Bleak, chief of staff to Utah House Speaker Greg J. Curtis (R), said the legislation creating the congressional seat for his state could be moved in a day.

"If we get the signal that this bill is going to move forward, we will move quickly to pass that bill," Bleak said. "We just need to get the thumbs-up from Representative Sensenbrenner or our congressional delegation telling us to move forward."

Norton predicted that Bush would sign the bill if it cleared Congress because it benefits both parties. "The president will take his cue from what the Congress does," Norton said.

OTHER NEWS:

Bush Pledges To Seek Common Ground, Work With Democrats (USAT)

By David Jackson

DOJ_NMG_0092118

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush began rebooting his agenda on Wednesday, ticking off a revised list of priorities that include education, an immigration overhaul and maybe even an increase in the minimum wage.

After his party lost control of the House of Representatives and was in danger of losing the Senate, too — which appeared to prove true Wednesday evening when the Associated Press declared Virginia Democrat Jim Webb the victor over incumbent Sen. George Allen — Bush pledged to "work through our differences" with incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi and other Democratic leaders. He said that includes the conduct of the Iraq war.

"The challenges and opportunities are plain for all to see," Bush said at a news conference.

To jump-start the final two years of his presidency, Bush said he would draw on his experience as governor of Texas, where he developed a reputation for working well with Democrats who controlled the Legislature on such issues as raising education standards and toughening penalties for juvenile crimes.

Bush said there may be some "common ground" on a Democratic proposal to increase the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 as long as there is "compensation" for small business owners. He and other Republicans say small businesses are hurt the most by such increases because they employ hourly workers. "There's a significant difference between common ground and abandoning principle," he said.

Bush also expressed hope for a more "comprehensive" immigration bill that includes expanded employment opportunities for temporary "guest workers." In December 2005, 164 House Democrats voted against a GOP-sponsored bill that was tough on border protection but did not include provisions for guest workers and a path to citizenship for some illegal immigrants as Bush supports.

Among other agenda items Bush cited: an extension of his signature No Child Left Behind education law, promoting alternatives to oil and dealing with unfunded liabilities in entitlement programs, including Social Security. Bush failed last year in an attempt to restructure Social Security to provide for private accounts.

Democrat Jim Turner, a former member of both the Texas Legislature and the U.S. House, said both parties could profit from working together. He cautioned that it would not be easy for Bush.

For one thing, he said, Bush lacks the partner he had in Texas with Lt. Gov. Bob Bullock, who liked Bush and exercised major influence with the Democratic legislators. Another Texan noted the partisanship in Washington is much worse than it was in the Austin of the 1990s, notably because of the Iraq war.

The war "will hover over everything," said former congressman Martin Frost, a Democrat who represented the Dallas area. "That will color the relationship."

Frost said Democrats won the election because of dissatisfaction with the war, and their supporters will expect them to deliver a plan to get U.S. troops out of Iraq. Bush said he remains committed to victory in Iraq and will listen to Democratic ideas.

"If the goal is success, then we can work together," Bush said. "If the goal is 'get out now regardless,' then that's going to be hard to work together."'

The president acknowledged his administration's handling of the Iraq war was a factor in the election, as voters registered "their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there." He also cited a desire for "congressmen to be honest and ethical."

Still, Bush was optimistic about the new political environment, even joking about Tuesday's setbacks.

"Actually, I thought we were going to do fine," Bush said. "Shows what I know."

Power Shift In Washington (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann And Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

The tectonic plates of Washington power have shifted, presenting both President Bush and the new Democratic majority in Congress with an opportunity to work together and leave behind the politics of confrontation.

DOJ_NMG_0092119

The day after the historic midterm elections of 2006 - in which the Democrats won considerably more than the 15-seat net gain needed to take over the House of Representatives and were heading toward a possible majority in the Senate - leaders from both parties pledged to work together and avoid the intense partisanship of recent years.

"The message yesterday was clear: The American people want their leaders in Washington to set aside partisan differences, conduct ourselves in an ethical manner, and work together to address the challenges facing our nation," Mr. Bush said Wednesday in a press conference.

The reality, analysts say, is that the next two years are likely to offer a blend of confrontation and common ground. The Democrats, after 12 years in congressional opposition, don't want their hard-fought majority to vanish in the next election. The incentive for Bush, entering the final two years of his presidency, is to leave his party in a position to compete effectively in 2008. He can take a page from his earlier days as governor of Texas, when he gained a reputation for working well with Democrats.

"Early indications are that he's doing what he's done before and can do again, if he can get over his hurt and his pique, which it sounds like he already has, or at least he's working on it," says Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas, Austin. "That is, this is not the time to get confrontational and dig in his heels."

Yesterday morning, Bush was on the phone, congratulating the Democratic leadership of Congress, and inviting the presumptive next speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, over for lunch.

From the Democrats' end, Ms. Pelosi already has appeared to clamp down on talk of impeaching the president by some of the more vocal liberals in the House. Still, life under the Democrats is expected to include hearings and inquiries into aspects of the Iraq war and the larger war on terror. The challenge will be for the Democrats not to appear on a witch hunt.

By Wednesday morning, the contours of the new House and Senate were becoming clear, but not definitive. At press time, the Democrats had made a net gain of 27 House seats and five Senate seats. One Senate race remained too close to call - but the Republican incumbent, George Allen of Virginia, was slightly behind. If the challenger wins, Democrats will control a majority in the Senate.

In Tuesday's wave, some longtime Republican members were defeated, including Reps. Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Clay Shaw of Florida, and Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania. In the Senate, incumbent Republicans Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, and Mike DeWine all lost.

For the foot soldiers of both parties, who worked overtime to turn out their voters, such loyalty breeds demands on leaders - and it is among those base constituencies that common ground could be most elusive. For Bush, extending the tax cuts that he says have boosted the US economy will be an important goal. Democrats have pledged to raise the minimum wage as one of their first acts in the majority, presenting Bush with the choice of going along with or vetoing legislation that the public supports.

Some elements of Bush's agenda, such as his plan to partially privatize Social Security, now appear dead while others, such as his plan for comprehensive immigration reform - enhanced enforcement twinned with a guest-worker program - may gain new life.

Generally, voters were in a sour mood. Six in 10 said the nation was on the wrong track, according to exit polls conducted by the Associated Press and other news organizations. Scandals played a role. More than half of voters said they were dissatisfied with the way the GOP House leadership handled the matter of Rep. Mark Foley (R) of Florida, who has been accused of improper behavior toward teenage House pages.

But if one issue was the most important in the vote, it was Iraq. Six in 10 voters said they disapproved of the war. In the end, "the election became a referendum on the war," says Michael McDonald, a visiting fellow at the Brookings Institution in Washington and assistant professor of government and politics at George Mason University.

Whether Bush will read the election results as a mandate to change course in Iraq remains to be seen. If he chooses, he could take cover under the forthcoming recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, a government-sponsored commission.

Considering both the Iraq war and the halting federal response to hurricane Katrina, voters have become skeptical of the ability of the White House to run important matters of US policy, says George C. Edwards III, a scholar of the presidency at Texas A&M University. "They're not confident in the competence of Republicans to govern. That may, or may not, be fair," he says.

Many newly elected Democratic representatives come from swing districts, and are likely to be more moderate than liberals from safe Democratic seats. Congressional Republicans, for their part, may be dissatisfied with their current leaders, such as Speaker Dennis Hastert (R) of Illinois, and may tack away from a president they increasingly see as a lame duck.

Meanwhile, House Democrats will find it hard to push their own legislative agenda over Republican Senate filibusters and a potential White House veto.

Democrats may have won big Tuesday. "But we still have separation of powers," notes Dr. Edwards.

A New Bush? Yes And No (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — As President Bush launched the final two-year stretch of his presidency Wednesday, his effort to secure his legacy was encumbered by two inflexible factors: the loss of a once-supportive congressional majority, and the weight of an unpopular war that he has so far found no way to win.

Fielding questions from reporters in the White House's East Room, the president reeled off a list of domestic issues on which he thought he could find common ground with Democrats, just as he had as governor of Texas six years ago and during his brief honeymoon with Congress in the first year of his presidency — the economy, education, energy, immigration, Social Security and Medicare.

But on Iraq, Bush warned that he was in no mood for a major change of course. "Looking at this election, the enemy is going to say, 'Well, it must mean America is going to leave.' And the answer is, no, it doesn't," he said. The goal, Bush repeated several times, remained the same: "Victory."

He said he'd work with Congress, but not on a timetable for withdrawing troops.

What lies ahead, Bush's remarks suggested, may be a two-sided presidency, one open to compromise on domestic legislation but committed to its basic strategy in Iraq and the war on terrorism — one-half Austin, Texas, one-half Sept. 11.

"On foreign policy, the new Bush is the old Bush, and he doesn't seem likely to change much," said Stanley A. Renshon, a political scientist at the City University of New York who has written a largely admiring biography of Bush.

"On domestic affairs, he's never entirely been a 'movement' conservative; he's always been willing to go the extra mile…. But he's always been tough on defense and foreign policy, even before 9/11."

Aware that Tuesday's balloting signaled voters' desire for new approaches to the war, aides insisted Bush was willing to look at policy alternatives.

They pointed to his nomination of former CIA director Robert M. Gates to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his promise to consider the recommendations of an independent commission on the war.

"Of course the president is going to remain principled about [opposing] a massive withdrawal, just like he will about tax increases," said one aide, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for the White House. "But there is a lot of room in between."

At Bush's news conference, however, when a reporter asked whether Rumsfeld's resignation would lead to "a new direction in Iraq," the president rejected the phrase.

"New direction," he mused. "Well, there's certainly going to be new leadership at the Pentagon…. Bob Gates will bring a fresh perspective."

But the president added that when he talked with the Defense Department nominee last weekend, "I found him to be of like mind. He understands that we're in a global war with these terrorists. He understands that defeat is not an option in Iraq."

When another reporter asked whether the president believed he could work with the Democrats on Iraq, he said: "Well, I think we're going to have to work with them" — then described the job principally as persuading Democrats that his policies are right.

"We're not going to leave [Iraq] before the job is done," he said.

"And obviously we've got a lot of work to do with some members of Congress…. If the goal is success, then we can work together. If the goal is 'get out now, regardless,' then that's going to be hard to work together."

DOJ_NMG_0092121

That was a polite way for Bush to step around the most important conflict between his approach to Iraq and that of many House Democrats.

The new Democratic majority may have problems of its own on Iraq, which could give the president some room to maneuver.

Officially, the Democrats campaigned for "the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces" — a phrase Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the incoming speaker of the House, repeated on Wednesday. But they never agreed on when or where that redeployment would occur.

Some want the phrase to mean an immediate removal of most U.S. troops from Iraq, but others say they don't support a fixed timetable for withdrawal.

Administration officials say they plan to press the Democrats, now that they hold the majority, to specify what their proposals for pacifying Iraq would be. "If there are any good new options out there, we'll take them," said one aide, who asked for anonymity because he was speaking unofficially. "But most of them don't have any good new options."

Similarly, Bush challenged Democrats to come forward with proposals to bolster the finances of Social Security and Medicare — problems whose solutions are unlikely to be politically popular because they usually require tax increases or reductions in benefits.

"This is bipartisanship of a special kind: 'We have this problem, and what do you propose to do about it?' " Renshon said of the administration's position.

A former aide to Rumsfeld, Torie Clarke, agreed that it would be easier for Bush to work with Democrats on domestic issues than on national security.

"He does share some common ground with a lot of Democrats on some issues, especially domestic issues," she said.

"But there's a canyon between him and some others on Iraq and the principles of the war on terror."

As for the prospects of bipartisan cooperation becoming the rule in Washington, instead of the exception, Clarke said she was skeptical.

"With very few exceptions, policymakers and politicians operate in their own self-interest," she said. "If bipartisanship is in their interest, they will be bipartisan. If it's not, they won't. It will happen on a case-by-case basis."

Presidents often have faced the problem of Congress falling into opposition hands, and they invariably say — with as much enthusiasm as they can muster — that they welcome the opportunity for bipartisanship.

Ronald Reagan scrapped furiously with a Democratic Congress over legislation but invited its leaders to the White House for drinks. George H.W. Bush compromised with Democrats on a tax increase and, in his son's view, lost his job as a result. Bill Clinton promised to work with the conservative Republican majority that swept into power in 1994 and joined with it to pass a landmark welfare reform bill, but battled it on most other issues.

President Bush's problems may be greater than theirs.

For one, he and his staff have had little experience in trying to govern with Democrats since they arrived from Texas in 2001; for most of that time, they have known nothing but solid GOP majorities.

For another, Bush and his chief political advisor, Karl Rove, have long pursued a strategy aimed mainly at maximizing their support among conservative Republicans, not at reaching out to moderate Democrats and independents; declaring that the president has decided to be a centrist looks impractical at this late date.

"Politicians develop a style of leadership over many years, and it becomes consolidated," Renshon said. "It's very hard to turn on a dime."

Republican Blindness (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

With one Republican bastion after another falling as returns poured in for Democrats Tuesday night, the GOP's carefully constructed defenses crumbled. The party's barriers failed to prevent the election from being a referendum on Iraq, George W. Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress. It was a failure of concept as well as execution.

That failed concept relied on friendly, familiar Republican incumbents, who had delivered government pork for their districts, negating intense voter hostility by using the party's time-tested machinery to get out its vote. These tactics proved useless in the face of a wave that was not so much pro-Democrat as anti-Republican. Only gerrymandered House districts prevented a landslide that would have given the Democrats a House majority of historic proportions, approaching 50 seats.

The apparent Democratic takeover of both houses of Congress left Republicans stunned and divided, unable to comprehend that the nation's political realignment creating a GOP majority had crested and reversed. The confidence that relied on generously funded Election Day organization now looks like mindless arrogance. The party's cocksure political mechanics simply could not believe the outcome as the results poured in.

Even up to the last minute, the Republicans never really saw overall defeat coming. Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina used a golfer's language in telling me in July that his colleagues failed to appreciate how close the Republicans were to losing control of the Senate: "It's like we think we'll get by with pars on the last two holes when we really need birdies," he said then. On Wednesday Graham told me: "Actually, we bogeyed the 17th hole and picked up on the 18th."

Republican leaders are still in denial in the wake of their crushing defeat. They blame individual losing candidates for failing to prepare themselves for the election. In contrast, the private reaction by the candidates was anger at President Bush and his political team. That includes a rising GOP undercurrent against Iraq policy. The unpleasant truth is that Republicans lost almost everywhere the president campaigned during the past week. An exception was Florida, where state Attorney General Charlie Crist kept out of Bush's way and won the election for governor.

The bellwether of defeats to come was the Louisville district where the respected Rep. Anne Northup, who won 60 percent of the vote two years ago, was defeated for a sixth term. There was nothing she had done wrong or that her opponent had done right to cause her defeat. The same was true of other highly regarded Republican congressional veterans who were defeated Tuesday, headed by Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Clay Shaw of Florida and Jim Leach of Iowa.

Exit polls confirmed what had been clear to anyone who spent time on the campaign circuit this year. Opposition to the war and the president had produced a virulent anti-Republican mood. About two weeks before the election, political technicians running the campaign of Rep. Charles Bass in New Hampshire suddenly realized that the popular six-termer was in deep trouble. His moderate voting and record of pork delivery (including a federal prison for his district) meant nothing. He was swept under by the anti-Iraq voting tide.

Bass at least had some warning. New Hampshire's other House member, Rep. Jeb Bradley, won with 63 percent of the vote in 2004 and never felt threatened this year until the results came in. This was a nationalized election about Iraq in which individual characteristics did not count.

Rep. J.D. Hayworth of Arizona, a stalwart of the famous Republican Class of '94, did not seem seriously endangered until word came back to Washington election morning that he looked like a loser. Representing a district that is not as Republican as it used to be, Hayworth had become an enforcement-only immigration hard-liner. It did not help him at the polls.

Sen. John McCain, the putative front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, reacted to defeat with the typically blunt comment that his party had lost its way with earmarked pork-barrel spending. If party leaders in Congress at long last heed McCain's counsel, it would mark the beginning of wisdom.

Facing Up To Reality (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Never was a political wipeout better advertised in advance than the one that hit the Republican Party on Tuesday and cost Don Rumsfeld his job. From the first of my political soundings in the Midwest in early spring, it was clear that the public's frustration with the war in Iraq, the inept performance of the Bush administration after Hurricane Katrina, and the stunning partisanship and tawdriness of the Republican Congress was reaching explosive levels.

When Congress quit work without addressing immigration, energy prices or health-care inflation in any serious way, the majority Republicans were clearly asking for trouble. And the scandals that kept erupting just added to the public disgust.

A few days before the election, Bernadette Budde, political director of BIPAC, the Republican-friendly Business Industry Political Action Committee, was quoted here as warning of the imminence of what she correctly predicted would be "an earthquake."

The only people who seemed oblivious to the warning signs were President Bush and his political adviser, Karl Rove. Against all evidence, including the warnings of other Republicans, they kept insisting that Republicans would hold the House and Senate. Bush said at his news conference yesterday, "I knew we were going to lose seats," but he acknowledged he was shocked that the twin themes he kept pushing -- taxes and security -- didn't save the GOP from "a thumping."

The Republican Party paid a heavy price for Bush and Rove's obduracy -- and for the miserable performance of the GOP congressional leadership. The vaunted Republican "base," on which the White House has relied to support the president's agenda, splintered on Election Day. In exit polls, one-fifth of self-described Republicans and three out of 10 white evangelicals or "born-again" Christians said they voted Democratic for Congress.

Meanwhile, independents and moderates went Democratic by margins of 18 and 23 points, respectively. Democrats broadened their coalition, winning the cities and splitting even in suburbs and rural areas, while capturing majorities in all age groups and every income level up to $100,000 a year. That same range is reflected in the expanded Democratic caucuses in the House and Senate, with notable victories from New Hampshire to Arizona.

So Bush was simply acknowledging reality when he reversed himself and bade farewell to his controversial Pentagon chief. He said he had made the decision in the final hours before Election Day, when he still believed he'd have a Republican Congress. In reality it was announced less than half an hour after speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi had said at her own news conference that firing Rumsfeld would be the clearest way for Bush to signal that the election constituted a call for a new policy in Iraq.

Pelosi's performance at her debut as leader of a congressional majority was pitch-perfect, calm, confident and blessedly free of the screeching tone of some of her stump speeches. She is leading a formidable political force in this revived Democratic Party. Bush has every reason to treat her with respect -- and a degree of deference. He is right in thinking that they could well find common ground on immigration, education and perhaps even entitlements if they tried. But the acid test will be his willingness to open a genuine dialogue on Iraq.

Pelosi, who spent October out campaigning, showed a clearer grasp of the public mood than did Bush. He was still halfway between avowing a new open-minded readiness to listen and learn and his more familiar insistence on living in a world of moral absolutes. Thus the conflict between his welcoming fresh ideas on Iraq and insisting single-mindedly that "victory" is the only acceptable outcome for the military intervention that most of the voting public now judges a mistake.

The Democrats will offer Bush alternatives for Iraq and so, presumably, will the Baker-Hamilton commission when it meets with him next week and issues its report in December. James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton and their colleagues are perfectly positioned to help break the deadlock on that policy -- if Bush is looking for an out.

The question is whether a president who couldn't recognize the reality of an approaching political landslide is any more discerning about spotting a policy and political disaster in the making in a far-off land.

As Predicted, A Wave Washes Republicans Out To Sea (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Well, don't say we didn't warn you.

Tuesday's balloting was about what we expected. A relatively large political wave swept almost 30 House Republicans out of office and appears to have delivered the Senate to Democrats. Of course, we won't know the status of control of the Senate for a while, but whatever happens in Virginia and Montana, Democrats had a big night in that chamber, as well.

Actually, Republicans got lucky on Election Day. Many of the close House contests went to the GOP. Had squeakers in districts such as New Mexico's 1st, Virginia's 2nd, New York's 25th and 29th, North Carolina's 8th, Nevada's 3rd, Ohio's 1st, New Jersey's 7th, Connecticut's 4th and Wyoming's at-large seat gone Democratic, we could be talking about a 38- to 40-seat swing.

There were a lot of noteworthy things about Tuesday's voting, so let me touch on a few of them.

First, what the South was to Democrats in 1994, the Northeast was to Republicans this year. Two seats in Connecticut appear to have fallen, along with another pair in New Hampshire, three in New York and four in Pennsylvania.

The New England and Mid-Atlantic landscape is littered with moderate Republicans, from Charles Bass and Jeb Bradley to Sue Kelly to Nancy Johnson and, possibly, Rob Simmons, and Republicans may find that it was easier to lose those seats than it will be to get them back. Add liberal Republican Rep. Jim Leach (Iowa) to the mix, and you have a national weeding out of moderates that impacted the northeast corner of the nation greatly.

True, moderates such as Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Jim Walsh (R-N.Y.) survived, but even their wins were ugly, and they stand out as exceptions to the rule.

Second, partisan voting devastated Republicans in Democratic-leaning districts. When Leach loses to an underfunded, fourth-tier Democratic challenger, you know that districts carried by Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004 saw plenty of straight-ticket voting by Democrats.

But these elections weren't about partisans after all. Exit polls showed that few partisans defected on Tuesday, and the real story was independents. While independents constituted only about 26 percent of the electorate, those voters went Democratic 57 percent to 39 percent. That 18-point margin is gigantic when it comes to normal independent voting patterns.

Third, all of the talk about a Republican surge during the final days of the campaign was bunk, as I believed (and wrote in this space) at the time.

You aren't likely to have large moves in public opinion after a lengthy campaign without events that force people to change their assessments and intentions. And given the likelihood that late deciders would move toward Democrats (which is exactly what happened), it was hard to see a Republican surge.

Once again, people overreacted to a couple of polls, particularly the generic ballot in the first Washington Post/ABC News survey and then, even more importantly, the late Pew Research poll, ignoring contradictory polling that suggested Democrats still held a significant advantage in the generic ballot going into Election Day.

It was stunning how quickly people jumped on the "Chafee Resurgent in Rhode Island Senate" bandwagon after seeing just one poll.

That's not to say there wasn't any closing toward the end. Montana tightened up in the final week, and there was data showing some increased GOP interest in the elections and likelihood to vote as Nov. 7 neared.

Fourth, we seem to have discovered the base Republican vote in many districts, and we found out where and how the Republicans' structural advantages from redistricting sheltered some Republican candidates from the wave.

Allegedly vulnerable Republicans in what appeared to be bulletproof GOP districts, such as Reps. John Doolittle (Calif.), Cathy McMorris (Wash.) and Mark Souder (Ind.) and incoming Reps. Doug Lamborn (Colo.), Bill Sali (Idaho), Adrian Smith (Neb.) and Tim Walberg (Mich.) held on despite the wave. Their margins were down, of course, but they survived, some even comfortably.

Republicans now must figure out what they are going to do. They can expect a number of retirements of senior Members now that the party is in the minority, and many GOP House Members will have to deal with being in the minority for the first time in their Congressional tenures.

President Bush, of course, is the biggest loser in a number of ways. He loses at least one chamber, and he is the reason Republicans took a bath on Tuesday. He may console himself by believing that he has the right policy in Iraq and history will judge him kindly. But his performance in office has destroyed a number of noteworthy political careers, and he would be wise to never forget that.

The Middle Muscles In (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

For decades, moderates have been the cowardly lions of American politics. You'd see them quivering in the corner as the anti-establishment left exchanged culture war mortar fire with the anti-establishment right. You'd see them passed over and dissed as the parties mobilized their bases and played to their primary voters.

DOJ_NMG_0092125

Well, somebody's been on steroids, because on Tuesday the muscular middle took control of America. Say goodbye to the era of Rovian base mobilization. Say goodbye to the era of conservative dominance that began in 1980. On Tuesday, 47 percent of the voters were self-described moderates, according to exit polls, and they asserted their power by voting for the Democrats in landslide proportions.

About a year ago, these angry moderates lost confidence in Republican rule. The tens of millions of dollars spent since then — the ads, the robocalls, the microtargeting — did nothing to change that basic decision.

Their disaffection with the G.O.P. was not philosophical. It was about competence and accountability. It was about the accumulation of Rumsfeld, Katrina, Abramoff, the bridge to nowhere and the failure to quarantine Mark Foley. Bill Clinton captured the electorate's central complaint about the G.O.P.: "They can't run anything right."

So voters kicked out Republicans but did not swing to the left. For the most part they exchanged moderate Republicans for conservative Democrats. It was a great day for the centrist Joe Lieberman, who defeated the scion of the Daily Kos net roots, Ned Lamont. It was a great day for anti-abortion Democrats like Bob Casey and probably for pro-gun Democrats like Jim Webb. It was a great day for conservative Democrats like Heath Shuler in North Carolina and Brad Ellsworth in Indiana.

It was even a good day for some moderate Republicans, like Chris Shays in Connecticut, Deborah Pryce in Ohio and Arnold Schwarzenegger in California, who held on because they are independent.

It was a terrible day for anti-immigration restrictionists on the right of the G.O.P., like J.D. Hayworth and Randy Graf in Arizona.

If you wanted to pick out a stereotypical swing voter in this election, it would be a white evangelical suburban office park mom in a blue state suburb. She's part of the one-third of white evangelicals who voted Democratic this year, as did 20 percent of self-described conservatives. She supported the Iraq war once but believes it has been conducted terribly. She doesn't have a lot of faith in government generally — 54 percent of voters believe government interferes too much, while only 37 percent want it to do more, according to a recent CNN survey — but she does think government should be able to accomplish its core missions.

She embodies the message of E. J. Dionne's 1991 book, "Why Americans Hate Politics," which argues that Americans are sick of symbolic politics, dying ideologies and false choices. Most of all, she's angry that politicians behave in ways that would be unacceptable in every realm of her life, and she thinks they're endangering her country.

In some ways, this election reminds me of the 1974 Democratic sweep. The Republicans have screwed up. Democrats have surged in. But the result leads not to a liberal tide but to Jimmy Carter, who in 1976 ran as a conservative anti-political reformer who won on fiscal discipline and with the support of Pat Robertson.

This election didn't define a new era, but it marks the end of an old one. If Democrats are going to take advantage of their victory, they will have to do two things. They will have to show they have not been taken over by their bloggers or their economic nationalists, who will alienate them from the suburban office park moms. Second, they'll have to come up with ideas as big as the problems we face. Their current platform consists of small-bore tax credits and foreign policy vagaries about, say, "redoubling" our efforts to get Osama bin Laden. (Why not retripling or requadrupling?)

Realignments are achieved by parties that define big new approaches to problems (see F.D.R.'s Commonwealth Club speech), and neither party has done that yet. In the meantime, if I were a Democrat I'd be like Lee Hamilton, the former Indiana congressman and serial commission member. The country is hungering for leaders like him: open-minded, unassuming centrists who are interested in government more than politics. If the Democrats are smart, this could be the beginning of a new Hamiltonian age.

The Thumpees Try Their Luck At The Blame Game (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

President Bush had many explanations for what he called the "thumping" his party took on Tuesday, but the most creative was the notion that his chief strategist, Karl Rove, had spent too much time reading books.

DOJ_NMG_0092126

"I obviously was working harder on the campaign than he was," the president said at yesterday's East Room news conference. The reporters laughed. The Architect, who had challenged Bush to a reading contest, wore a sheepish grin and stared at his lap.

True, Rove will have to surrender his "genius" credentials after the GOP lost the House and apparently the Senate. But the recriminations weren't stopping at Rove's door. The president, who started his appearance with an admission that "I share a large part of the responsibility," went on to blame everybody else.

He blamed corruption: "People want their congressmen to be honest and ethical, so in some races that was the primary factor."

He blamed Mark Foley, whose name remained on the Florida ballot: "People couldn't vote directly for the Republican candidate."

He blamed ballot rules. "You could have the greatest positions in the world . . . but to try to get to win on a write-in is really hard to do."

He blamed Democratic organization: "I'm sure Iraq had something to do with the voters' mind, but so did a very strong turnout mechanism."

He blamed bad luck: "If you look at race by race, it was close."

Implicitly, of course, he blamed Donald Rumsfeld, by firing him as defense secretary in favor of the "fresh perspective" of Robert Gates.

And, not least, he blamed the uncomprehending voters: "I thought when it was all said and done, the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security. But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on."

The president's performance fit neatly into yesterday's version of the post-election ritual in Washington: The winning side gloated, and the losing side pointed fingers every which way.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, the party's bantam rooster, barely waited until sunrise to start crowing. In a morning news conference at the National Press Club, he stood with hands in his pants pockets and used the word "extraordinary" nine times and "huge" 12 times to explain the triumph: "Huge night!" "Huge achievement!" "Huge step forward!" "Huge mark!" "Huge piece!" "Huge breakthrough!" Dean, who spent much of the election season squabbling over strategy with his fellow Democrats, boasted: "We all worked together, and it came out great."

Republicans were equally determined to show their disunity. While Dean spoke, conservative leaders held dueling news conferences in other rooms at the press club. Their theme: Blame the party, not us. "This was not a repudiation of conservatives," said Pat Toomey, a former GOP congressman. "It was a rejection of the Republican Party." At the rival conservative event across the hall, Richard Viguerie was condemning "the failed big-government policies of President Bush."

GOP officials pointed the finger elsewhere. On Fox News, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said the party's vaunted turnout operation works only "in the very close races." Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), who led House Republicans' campaign efforts, said more Republicans could have won -- if they had acted more like him. "Just take a look at my race," he suggested. He blamed his colleagues for "self-inflicted wounds" and being "caught unprepared," and he blamed the "stiff wind" blowing in Republicans' faces.

The creator of this stiff wind, however, was in no mood for contrition. "Say, why all the glum faces?" Bush asked when he entered the East Room. In fact, his aides had worn exaggerated grins as they took their seats.

Clearly, Bush was trying to tone down the rhetoric from the campaign, when he said the Democratic "approach comes down to this: The terrorists win, and America loses." Yesterday, he voiced soothing notions of "consultations" and "bipartisanship."

But he seemed unsure how much to concede. He began by saying "Iraq had a lot to do with the election." He amended that to "Iraq had something to do with it." And finally he cited cases where "I'm not sure Iraq had much to do with the outcome." While he said "many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure" with Iraq, he looked puzzled when a reporter suggested that voters wanted the troops withdrawn. He said he was "making a change" at the Pentagon to respond to the voters, but he also said he was going to sack Rumsfeld "win or lose."

Likewise, he wrestled with the message voters sent on Tuesday. "If you look at race by race, it was close," he reasoned. "The cumulative effect, however, was not too close. It was a thumping." But when the New York Times' Jim Rutenberg repeated the "thumping" description, Bush bristled. "Let's make sure we get the facts," he said. "I said that the elections were close. The cumulative effect: thumping."

Ken Herman of Cox News teased the wounded president. "That was 'thumpin',' without a 'g,' correct?" he queried. "I just want to make sure we have it right for the transcript."

For Bush's New Direction, Cooperation Is The Challenge (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Tuesday's electoral earthquake triggered an equally seismic reaction in Washington yesterday, one that signaled more clearly than ever that a politically humbled President Bush now agrees with a resurgent Democratic Party on the need for a change of course in Iraq. What was not clear was whether the two sides are genuinely prepared to work together to produce one.

In the wake of an election that swept Republicans from power in the House and left them on the brink of surrendering their Senate majority as well, both parties have greater incentives to reach accommodation than at any time since Bush was elected in 2000. Iraq will provide the critical test of whether either can overcome the ingrained habits and bad blood of six years of partisan warfare that have often left the Capitol in gridlock.

The president took the most dramatic step yesterday in acknowledging how much the landscape has changed. At a midday news conference he announced that he had accepted the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has come to symbolize the administration's apparent unwillingness to change a policy that has failed to bring order to Iraq and that has lost popular support at home. Bush said it is time for "a fresh perspective" on the war.

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there," he said. "Yet I also believe that most Americans and leaders here in Washington from both political parties understand we cannot accept defeat."

If Bush was willing to dismiss Rumsfeld, which the president said only a week ago that he had no intention of doing, it was in part because he and his party have so much at risk. Tuesday's elections proved to be a reaction not only against the war and the corruption scandals that have scarred Congress but also against the kind of base-driven politics that Bush used in 2004 to win a second term.

That model has often elevated policies and tactics designed to energize conservative activists over an appeal to what many GOP strategists saw as a shrinking middle of the electorate. But on Tuesday, the center struck back, voting decisively for Democratic candidates in House races.

The president responded with a renewed call for bipartisan cooperation, saying leaders on both sides should resist the temptation to divide the country into red and blue. "By putting this election and partisanship behind us, we can launch a new era of cooperation and make these next two years productive ones for the American people," he said.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), in line to become the nation's first female speaker in January, also spoke to what is now widely seen among leaders in both parties as a rejection of partisan polarization.

"The American people spoke out for a return to civility to the Capitol in Washington and how Congress conducts its work," she said in her first news conference after the election. "And Democrats pledge civility and bipartisanship in the conduct of the work here, and we pledge partnerships with the Republicans in Congress and the president, not partisanship."

Bush and Pelosi will meet today to try to begin to forge a relationship that could be critical to both their parties' futures and that will color the atmosphere as the 2008 campaigns take shape.

There are any number of areas where the two sides might begin to try to work together. Immigration policy is one, an area where the president was more at odds with his own party than with some Democrats.

But Iraq will provide the acid test. On that issue, there are significant differences yet to be bridged. Many Democrats favor a shift that would begin to draw down U.S. troop levels. But Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has been critical of Rumsfeld and the mistakes made by the administration in prosecuting the war, said again yesterday that he favors sending in more troops to try once and for all to suppress the sectarian violence.

William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard and an early advocate of the war, said Bush was wise to let Rumsfeld go, but he cautioned against reading into the decision any move by Bush to begin a withdrawal of U.S. forces. He said a hawkish shift in policy is just as likely as one that calls for the United States to begin to get out.

For there to be any chance at rebuilding public support, Kristol said, "Rumsfeld had to go. . . . For the sake of the war, he had to go. I don't interpret his going as a step toward withdrawal or redeployment," and he does not foresee Bush "looking for a way out."

Democrats said they expect to find many Republican allies on Capitol Hill in pushing Bush closer to their views.

"I know it sounds trite, but elections have profound consequence," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.). He said the president "would be absolutely not tone deaf but stone deaf" to ignore the meaning of Tuesday's elections, adding that Republicans "are not going to allow this president" to stick with the current policy.

Democrats have an agenda of issues other than the war that they will push at the beginning of the new Congress. The list includes raising the minimum wage, providing college-tuition assistance, letting the government negotiate with drug companies over prices for Medicare patients, and implementing the recommendations of the Sept. 11, 2001, commission.

But they recognize, as does the White House, that all those proposals pale in comparison to finding a solution to Iraq. Pelosi said yesterday that the election demonstrated the public's desire for a new direction, but she and other party leaders have been circumspect about exactly what that might entail, other than to begin withdrawing U.S. troops at some point.

Many of the party's newly elected House members campaigned on explicit platforms of withdrawing U.S. forces. Party leaders and prospective Democratic presidential candidates, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), will be under growing pressure to clarify their and the party's position in coming months.

Many Democrats now look to the Iraq commission chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) to find a solution that will satisfy both president and Democrats. Robert M. Gates, named yesterday as the next defense secretary, sits on that commission.

William A. Galston, a Brookings Institution scholar who served in the Clinton administration, said the experience of the Vietnam War should give Democrats a powerful incentive to cooperate with Republicans to develop a new policy. "This is a matter of great consequence," he said.

In the early 1970s, he said, Democrats ended up blamed for "ending an unpopular war in the wrong way. We paid a price for decades, and to some extent we're struggling against that legacy. The very worst thing we could do is repeat that mistake."

Democrats Close In On Senate (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — A day after discontent with the Iraq war prompted sweeping election defeats for the Republican Party, President Bush on Wednesday acknowledged voters had given him "a thumping" and said the chief architect of his military strategy, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, had resigned.

The announcement came hours after Democrats won a majority in the House for the first time in 12 years and seemed all but certain to take control of the Senate — barring unexpected changes in the vote totals in two states.

In the past, Bush repeatedly defended Rumsfeld, even as progress in the war stalled and as the Defense secretary, known for his confident and bristling manner, piled up critics in both parties. But on Wednesday, the president said he and Rumsfeld agreed that the Pentagon needed "fresh eyes."

"He himself understands that Iraq is not working well enough, fast enough," Bush said. He said he would nominate Robert M. Gates — who served as CIA director under Bush's father — as his new Defense secretary.

News that one of the most powerful figures in Washington was leaving office came as GOP hopes faded that they could win two close Senate races, in Virginia and Montana, that would decide control of the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0092129

Virginia officials had not confirmed final results, but the Associated Press declared that Democratic candidate Jim Webb had pulled off an upset victory based on new data from election officials in all 134 voting localities. But GOP Sen. George Allen refused to concede. His aides said they wanted to wait for election officials to complete a routine review of the vote totals, expected this week.

Earlier in the day, Montana officials declared Democrat Jon Tester the Senate race winner, but GOP Sen. Conrad Burns had not given in.

In Washington, Democratic leaders were expected to hold a news conference today to celebrate their apparent victories in the two races — which would give them 51 Senate seats to the Republicans' 49. The party has not held both chambers of Congress since 1994.

"I'm obviously disappointed with the outcome of the election," Bush said. "And as the head of the Republican Party, I share a large part of the responsibility."

As House Republicans began to grapple with their loss of at least 28 seats, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said he would quit the party's leadership. That set off a struggle to lead the new House minority party and sparked a round of recriminations over the cause of the defeat.

GOP losses in the House could climb, since about half a dozen races are not yet final.

Bush said he was surprised by how many seats his party lost, even if many defeats were narrow. He spoke at a White House news conference with a chastened tone. "If you look at race by race, it was close," he said. "The cumulative effect, however, was not too close. It was a thumping. But nevertheless, the people expect us to work together."

The ritual of postelection fence-mending began early Wednesday, when Bush began dialing congressional leaders, including Democratic chieftains he rarely consulted while they were in the minority.

"I welcomed the president's call as a sign of respect for the votes of the American people," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the likely next speaker, who was sleeping when Bush called at 7:15 a.m. She and other congressional leaders are to meet with Bush over lunch today.

At her inaugural news conference as presumptive speaker, Pelosi tried to set a conciliatory tone. But she said the election returns were a mandate for change in Iraq.

Bush insisted that the personnel change had been in the works even before he had learned of the election returns.

"After a series of thoughtful conversations, Secretary Rumsfeld and I agreed that the timing is right for a change of leadership at the Pentagon," he said.

That marked a 180-degree turn from Bush's comments to reporters a week ago, when he insisted that Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney would remain in the administration for the rest of his tenure.

Rumsfeld's resignation was welcomed by his critics — Democrats who opposed Bush's Iraq policy as well as Republican allies who faulted the secretary's handling of the Iraq mission.

"This important change offers the administration and Congress a fresh opportunity to examine all aspects of our strategy and tactics in Iraq, and make whatever changes are necessary to succeed there," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a war supporter who has clashed with Rumsfeld.

A key question is whether the shift in Pentagon leadership signals a willingness make policy changes as well. Bush said he was open to a "different approach," but only if the goal was victory in Iraq.

"If the goal is success, then we can work together," he said of the new Democratic majority. "If the goal is 'get out now, regardless,' then that's going to be hard to work together."

However, the election is likely to intensify the pressure for a shift in Bush's Iraq policy.

Coming after months of military setbacks, the election demonstrated that both Democrats and independents were weary of making sacrifices while stability in Iraq remains elusive. More Republicans now are likely to join the effort to press Bush to find another approach, hoping they will not have to face the 2008 election with 140,000 troops still in Iraq, strategists in both parties say.

Meanwhile, in the next few months, a congressionally appointed study panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) is expected to report its suggestions for a new direction on Iraq policy.

In his comments, Bush left himself room to maneuver in the face of these pressures. While insisting he would accept nothing less than victory in Iraq, he said he was eager to talk to the new Democratic leadership, and the study group, about how to achieve that goal.

Some top Democrats have insisted they will not try to push through a cutoff of war funds, as lawmakers did in 1973 to end U.S. participation in Vietnam. But Democrats are likely to wrangle with the White House on how money will be spent on the war.

The first shot in that battle may be over an expected fiscal 2007 supplemental spending request for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars. The services are preparing to ask for a record $160 billion for that purpose, defense analysts say.

In other policy areas, Bush suggested that compromise might be possible with a Democratic-controlled Congress, despite the bitter rhetoric of the campaign.

"I believe we can find some common ground with the Democrats" on a broad rewrite of immigration laws, he said. Bush's vision of the overhaul is supported by more Democrats than Republicans, because many conservatives oppose his plan to offer a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the U.S.

In another olive branch, Bush suggested he might be willing to back an increase in the federal minimum wage, an idea that was a key plank in Democrats' 2006 campaign platform.

Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University, said Bush might be more willing to work with Democrats in the final two years of his presidency. "He might feel more compelled to build his legislative record fast so he is not remembered just for a failed war in Iraq and losing Congress to the Democrats," Zelizer said.

But amid the talk in Washington of renewed bipartisanship, there were already signs of the distrust and bickering that had plagued Congress throughout Bush's tenure.

"Contrary to public statements [by Pelosi] that we're entering a time of 'partnership, not partisanship,' let's be honest," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.). "Pelosi's House will be marked by two years of partisan warfare, complete with infighting, intrigue, investigation, incompetence and inaction,"

Recriminations were flying as Republicans debated why and how they lost so badly. Many Republicans said the election returns did not represent a landslide mandate for Democrats or for a liberal agenda. They contended that many of the defeated Republicans had been injured by scandal, rather than rejected for their conservative views.

But many conservative activists said the GOP suffered at the polls because it had lost its commitment to controlling spending and limiting government.

"We did not just lose our majority, we lost our way," said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), leader of a large faction of House conservatives.

The finger-pointing is likely to intensify in the power struggle set off by Hastert's decision to step down as the longest-serving Republican speaker. Pence is challenging Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the current majority leader, for the post of minority leader, which will be the No. 1 post for House Republicans.

Democrats' post-victory unity will be tested by leadership struggles as well. Pelosi is expected to become speaker without contest, but the No. 2 leadership position will be sought by Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, a favorite of party moderates, and Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, who has thrilled liberals with his opposition to the Iraq war.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman James E. Clyburn of South Carolina launched a campaign for majority whip, the No. 3 slot. But Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chief engineer of Tuesday's Democratic victory, is said to be considering running for the post too.

That could put Pelosi in a difficult spot: She might want to reward Emanuel, but she is under pressure from black lawmakers to elevate Clyburn, a former head of the Congressional Black Caucus.

DOJ_NMG_0092131

WASHINGTON -- She has called him "oblivious, in denial, dangerous" and "not a leader." He has mocked her self-proclaimed "love" of tax cuts. "If this is... love, I don't want to see what hate looks like," he said recently, drawing roars of laughter from a crowd of supporters.

Now Nancy Pelosi and George W. Bush -- the Democrat representing San Francisco, a city often painted as the country's liberal extreme, and the Republican president from ultraconservative Midland, Texas -- will be forced to work together.

It now appears likely that Mr. Bush will face both a House and a Senate controlled by Democrats, as new projections indicated that the final Senate seat Democrats need for control of that chamber was falling their way. That would make Nevada Democrat Harry Reid the new Senate majority leader in January.

But of all the relationships between the president and Congress's new leaders, the most important will be with Mrs. Pelosi, who now will be the speaker of the House and stand third in line for the presidency. In separate news conferences yesterday, she and the president both said they took the same message from Tuesday's elections: The American people want them to set aside their differences and cooperate for the good of the country.

Years of personal and political animosity, however, will make cooperation between the two political leaders difficult -- as will pressures from their very different, and antagonistic, political bases. The president is going to face new demands from conservatives, who, with the election behind them, are giving free voice to their frustrations with high spending, scandals and social issues. They will be strengthened because a number of Republican moderates got wiped out in Tuesday's vote.

Mrs. Pelosi will get an earful from fellow liberals, emboldened by the party's first big political win in a decade. Many are eager to force the U.S. out of Iraq while boosting spending for a range of social programs. Many old-guard liberals in Congress will assume committee chairmanships, though Ms. Pelosi will be shepherding a majority made possible by the victories of more conservative Democrats from Republican-leaning districts.

Mr. Bush yesterday underscored the potential difficulties of his future relations with the House speaker-to-be: "There's a significant difference between common ground and abandoning principle. She's not going to abandon her principles, and I'm not going to abandon mine."

When the two meet for lunch at the White House today, Mr. Bush and his party will come to the table significantly weakened, and Mrs. Pelosi's Democrats considerably strengthened. Unhappy voters on Tuesday ended the president's six years of mostly unfettered rule with a Republican-led Congress and gave Democrats a majority of the seats in the House of Representatives for the first time in a dozen years. Already yesterday, Mr. Bush took a big first step toward appeasing Democrats by announcing the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a move repeatedly demanded by Mrs. Pelosi and other Democrats.

Bush Accepts Role In Losses (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

A contrite President Bush said yesterday that he shares "a large part" of the responsibility for the "thumping" suffered by Republicans on Election Day, but called on his party's lawmakers to work with the new Democratic leadership in Congress to advance his agenda.

In a press conference just hours after Democrats took control of the House for the first time in 12 years -- and appeared poised to seize the Senate as well -- the president seemed at times glum, at other times pugnacious, as he said the American people had spoken.

"Yesterday, the people went to the polls, and they cast their vote for a new direction in the House of Representatives. And while the ballots are still being counted in the Senate, it is clear the Democrat Party had a good night last night," he said in the White House's East Room.

"I'm obviously disappointed with the outcome of the election, and as the head of the Republican Party, I share a large part of the responsibility. I told my party's leaders that it is now our duty to put the elections behind us and work together with the Democrats and independents on the great issues facing this country," he said.

Although he spent the past few weeks traveling across the country to excoriate Democrats as weak on national security and bent on raising taxes, Mr. Bush said it is time to move past partisan politics and work hard for the American people.

"I believe that the leaders of both political parties must try to work through our differences, and I believe we will be able to work through differences. I've reassured the House and Senate leaders that I intend to work with the new Congress in a bipartisan way to address issues confronting this country. I invited them to come to the White House in the coming days to discuss the important work remaining this year and to begin conversations about the agenda for next year," he said.

Asked about his ability to work with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat expected to become House speaker in the next Congress, Mr. Bush said, "If you hold grudges in this line of work, you're never going to get anything done." And he acknowledged that the victory by Mrs. Pelosi's party would have policy consequences.

"Look, this was a close election. If you look at it race by race, it was close. The cumulative effect, however, was not too close. It was a thumping," Mr. Bush said. "But, nevertheless, the people expect us to work together. That's what they expect."

The president immediately granted a key demand of Democrats by announcing the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Bush praised Democrats for a "disciplined campaign" and a "superb job of turning out their votes," but he lobbed a barb at his chief White House political strategist, Karl Rove, who failed for the first time in three elections to deliver a win for the president.

For months, Mr. Bush has publicly joked about an informal contest between himself and Mr. Rove as to who could read the most books. When asked yesterday about who was winning the contest, Mr. Bush said: "I'm losing. I obviously was working harder on the campaign than he was."

Mr. Rove, who orchestrated a historic Republican gain of congressional seats during the 2002 midterm elections, had told The Washington Times late last month that he was "confident we're going to keep the Senate; I'm confident we're going to keep the House." Instead, Democrats gained at least 29 House seats and at least four Senate seats, pending delayed results, recounts and any court challenges.

Mr. Bush also had made optimistic predictions during the campaign's final weeks. He said yesterday that those mistaken forecasts did not show that he was "out of touch."

"I'm an optimistic person, is what I am. I knew we were going to lose seats, I just didn't know how many," he said. "But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on."

Still, although Mr. Bush said he realized that the American people "voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made" in Iraq, he asserted that his strategy -- and his responsibility -- will not change.

"The election has changed many things in Washington, but it has not changed my fundamental responsibility, and that is to protect the American people from attack. As the commander in chief, I take these responsibilities seriously," he said.

Mr. Bush acknowledged that the Iraq policy was "not working well enough, fast enough," but he also sought to warn U.S. enemies, while making assurances to Iraqis and U.S. troops.

"To our enemies: Do not be joyful. Do not confuse the workings of our democracies with a lack of will," he said. "To the people of Iraq: Do not be fearful. As you take the difficult steps toward democracy and peace, America's going to stand with you. We know you want a better way of life, and now is the time to seize it."

And to U.S. troops, he said: "Don't be doubtful. America will always support you."

The president also said that Democrats, who he said on the campaign trail lacked a cohesive plan for Iraq, must now "make up their minds."

"I can understand Americans saying, 'Come home.' But I don't know if they said: 'Come home and leave behind an Iraq that could end up being a safe haven for al Qaeda,' " he said. "I don't believe they said that."

Bush Pledges To Work With Democrats (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann And Tom Raum, Associated Press Writers

DOJ_NMG_0092133

AP, November 9, 2006

President Bush pledged Wednesday to work with Democrats after the "thumping" that Republicans took on Election Day. He named a new defense secretary to oversee the war in Iraq, a change the president said was going to happen regardless of which party won the election.

Bush said former CIA Director Robert Gates, if confirmed by the Senate, would replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon.

Gates is a "patriot" and "strategic thinker" with a transformational spirit, Bush said from the Oval Office.

"He's a man of integrity, candor and sound judgment," the president said. "He knows that the challenge of protecting our country is larger than any political party. He has a record of working with leaders on both sides of the aisle to strengthen our national security. He has my confidence and my trust."

Bush praised Rumsfeld, in the Cabinet from the start of the Bush presidency, saying, "America is safer and the world is more secure because of the leadership and the service of Don Rumsfeld."

Bush said he had been talking with Rumsfeld about whether it was time for a fresh perspective at the department, and the two agreed Tuesday it was appropriate for Rumsfeld to resign.

"It's been quite a time," Rumsfeld said. Then, quoting Winston Churchill, he said: "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

The announcement came the day after Democrats captured control of the House after 12 years of GOP rule and erased the Republican majority in the Senate. One Senate race remained to be decided — in Virginia, where Democrat James Webb held a slight lead of Republican Sen. George Allen. If Democrats win that seat, they would hold a 51-49 edge in the Senate; an Allen victory would split the Senate 50-50, with Vice President Dick Cheney, as president of the Senate, in position with a tie-breaking vote.

Bush called Democratic leaders to congratulate them and he expressed both disappointment and surprise over the vote.

"I thought we were going to do fine yesterday, shows what I know," Bush said at a news conference hours before introducing Gates as his nominee. "But I thought we were going to be fine in the election. My point to you is that, win or lose, Bob Gates was going to become the nominee."

Bush seemed stoic about the election, proclaiming: "This isn't my first rodeo."

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made" in Iraq, the president said. "Yet I also believe most Americans — and leaders here in Washington from both political parties — understand we cannot accept defeat."

Gates led the CIA from November 1991 to January 1993 under former President George H.W. Bush. The president said he met with Gates over the weekend at Bush's ranch in Crawford, Texas.

"Bob Gates will bring a fresh perspective and great managerial experience," Bush said.

Bush was asked by reporters whether he retained full confidence in Cheney, a chief advocate of the war, and whether the vice president would serve out the rest of his term.

"Yes he does, yes he will," Bush replied.

Yet only a week ago, Bush told The Associated Press and other reporters in an interview that he expected Rumsfeld and Cheney to stay through the end of his last two years in the White House. Asked Wednesday about that comment, Bush acknowledged he intentionally misled reporters because he want to avoid a change at the Pentagon during a hotly contested election.

"I didn't want to inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign," Bush said. "And so the only way to answer that question, and to get you onto another question was to give you that answer. ... The other reason why is I hadn't had a chance to visit with Bob Gates yet, and I hadn't had my final conversation with Don Rumsfeld yet, at that point."

The president joked that he had given House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, in line to become the first female speaker of the House, the name of a Republican interior decorator to help her pick out drapes for her new office. The comment was poke at the California Democrat's pre-election remark about having her pick of Capitol suites.

As to the role played in Tuesday's widespread GOP losses, Bush said, "I believe Iraq had a lot to do with the election, but I think there were other factors as well." He suggested that a variety of congressional scandals may also have played a role.

He said he would seek to find common ground with Pelosi, but without either of them compromising their principles.

Bush was asked at his East Room news conference about Pelosi's past derogatory comments describing him as a liar and dangerous.

"I know when campaigns end and governing begins," he said. "If you hold grudges in this line of work, you never get anything done."

Bush also got in a dig at his trusted top political adviser, Karl Rove. Rove is widely credited with Bush's presidential victories in 2000 and 2004 and GOP gains in the 2002 congressional elections. As recently as last week, Rove predicted Republican would retain both House and Senate.

"I obviously was working harder in the campaign than he was," said Bush, who stumped hard for GOP candidates, especially troubled ones in traditionally Republican states.

Bush said he wanted to hear other views on Iraq, and was looking forward to recommendations by a commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana. Bush said expected to meet with the group, which includes Gates, early next week.

Still, Bush added, "We're not going to leave before the job is done."

Power Shift Begins As New Congress Emerges (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman, Tribune National Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, November 9, 2006

As the extent of the Democratic rout became apparent Wednesday with Republicans likely losing control of the Senate, President Bush promised to work with the new leaders of Congress and Democrats moved quickly to consolidate power and pushed for a new path in Iraq.

"I'm, obviously, disappointed with the outcome of the election, and as the head of the Republican Party, I share a large part of the responsibility," said Bush, who described the results as "a thumpin'." "I told my party's leaders that it is now our duty to put the elections behind us and work together with the Democrats and Independents on the great issues facing this country."

The Associated Press reported late Wednesday the Democrats had won the pivotal Virginia Senate race, claiming Democrat Jim Webb had unseated Republican George Allen and that had given the Democrats total control of Congress for the first time in 12 years. AP contacted election officials in all 134 localities where voting occurred, obtaining updated numbers Wednesday. The new AP count showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236.

But the official canvass was not complete, and a senior adviser to the Allen campaign, who spoke on the condition he not be named, said, "The senator is going to see the canvass through. It should wrap up by mid to late afternoon tomorrow. He has no intention of dragging this out. If the numbers hold true to what they were on election night and there is no dramatic movement, he is disinclined to pursue a recount."

At the top of the issues facing Bush and Congress is the war in Iraq, and Democratic leaders expressed a measure of conciliation toward Bush and the Republicans as they began to lay out their agenda.

"This is something that we must work together with the president," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who is expected to be the next Speaker of the House, replacing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who would become the Senate majority leader assuming the Virginia race is finally called for Democrat Jim Webb, said the election confirmed Democrats' call for a change in direction, particularly on Iraq.

"Without getting into the details of what we want to do legislatively, the main point is that we want to do things on a bipartisan basis," Reid said.

Bush himself acknowledged the need for some sort of change regarding the war when he fired Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0092135

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made," Bush said. "Yet I also believe most Americans - and leaders here in Washington from both political parties - understand we cannot accept defeat."

The historic midterm election provided a sharp rebuke to Bush and his policies, as well as to a congressional Republican leadership that allowed runaway federal spending and suffered ethical lapses in its ranks.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), for example, said it was time for Republicans to look in the mirror and reflect on where they went wrong.

"Over the last several years, Republicans have experimented with big government, and we have now seen the result," he said, pointing to the war in Iraq, scandals and unnecessary pork-barrel spending projects.

In the House, Republicans lost 29 seats, Democrats gained 30 and several races were still being counted or recounted the day after the election.

In the Senate, five Republican senators lost their seats-- in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri, and Montana. In Virginia, Sen. George Allen sought a recount, but his opponent, Webb, appeared to have won by about 7,000 votes. If Virginia ultimately goes to the Democrats, the Senate would be divided 51-49 with Republicans in the minority.

The new balance of power in Washington immediately kicked off behind-the-scenes battles for power in the ranks of Democratic and Republican House members.

Hastert, for example, said he would not seek a Republican leadership post after he hands the gavel over to Pelosi. But House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) is expected to face challenges for the top GOP leadership spot from Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and possibly Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas).

"I am running for Republican leader, because I believe that we did not just lose our majority-we lost our way," Pence wrote in a letter to Republican colleagues Wednesday. "We are in the wilderness because we walked away from the limited government principles that minted the Republican Congress."

On the other side of the aisle, the Democratic whip, Steny Hoyer of Maryland, announced he would run for House majority leader, touting his skills as a vote counter, as well as his role bringing Democrats to the majority.

"We have a two-year period in which to demonstrate that we can govern and lead - and our success will be critical to our ability to retain the majority," Hoyer, who is expecting a challenge from Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.), said in a letter to colleagues.

Meanwhile, Democrats may find themselves embroiled in another battle to choose a successor to Hoyer as the majority whip. Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, has thrown his hat in the ring, but Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) is also mulling a bid.

At a press conference early Wednesday, Emanuel said he has not made a decision yet and is consulting with colleagues. He said he would have to evaluate both his professional responsibilities, as well as his family responsibilities. "I'll be making a decision in short order," he said.

A senior Democratic leadership aide acknowledged that the caucus owed Emanuel a debt for his work running the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, but said Emanuel would have to decide whether he wanted to alienate the black caucus by running against Clyburn, a popular and easygoing lawmaker.

Still, the official said, "We wouldn't be here today if it weren't for him."

According to exit polls, Democrats made gains with moderates, swing voters, independents, Catholics, Hispanics and people who live in the suburbs. Republicans hung onto conservative voters, but it was not enough to fend off the aggressive challenge waged by Democrats in every region of the country.

As Democrats celebrated their victory and vowed to work across party lines to accomplish results, Republicans engaged in a bout of self-flagellation and recriminations.

"We came to Washington to change government and government changed us," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who had spent the last year campaigning for Republicans throughout the country. "We departed rather tragically from our conservative principles."

In Delaware, Republican Rep. Mike Castle echoed what Democrats had been saying all along: "It is clear the American people are frustrated with the war in Iraq and with this administration and they voted for change."

DOJ_NMG_0092136

But GOP Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois placed blame with the corruption and scandals that led to the resignation of former Rep. Mark Foley of Florida, former Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas, and former Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio.

"That's not policy, that's in essence a party that imploded because of personal problems," Shimkus said.

With votes still being counted, Democrats appeared to have picked up another seat in Pennsylvania. Patrick Murphy, an Iraq war veteran, ousted Rep. Mike Fitzpatrick, a freshman Republican, by just 1,500 votes.

In Ohio, the fate of two Republicans, Reps. Deborah Pryce and Jean Schmidt, remained in doubt as election officials worked to tally provisional and absentee ballots. Pryce is chairman of the House GOP Conference, the fourth-ranking Republican. Schmidt put her seat in jeopardy after suggesting on the floor that Murtha, a decorated Marine and Vietnam veteran, was a coward for suggesting that American troops should leave Iraq.

Other House race results were inconclusive in Arizona, Wyoming, Washington, North Carolina and Florida.

With Control Of The Senate In The Balance, All Eyes Turn To Virginia (NYT)

By John M. Broder And Ian Urbina

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Va., Nov. 8 — Never mind that Senator George Allen of Virginia had not conceded. Jim Webb, his Democratic opponent, claimed victory Wednesday on the strength of a roughly 7,000-vote margin.

And The Associated Press, a widely accepted authority for calling elections, agreed with Mr. Webb, declaring Mr. Allen, a Republican, the loser.

For the first full day after the balloting, Virginia remained the focal point of American politics, with a race whose outcome will determine which party controls the United States Senate. Mr. Allen's advisers said Wednesday night that he would do nothing until a canvass of ballots was completed. But Democrats — ecstatic at the prospect that they might have swept both houses of Congress — were not waiting.

"It is virtually 100 percent that Webb is going to win the race," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is leading the Democratic effort to take back the Senate. "I think you can say without any hesitancy or doubt that Democrats are going to be the majority party in the Senate."

Mr. Webb began planning his transition, and aides to Mr. Allen suggested that he could acknowledge defeat as early as Thursday afternoon.

If they hold up, the victories of Mr. Webb and Jon Tester, the Democratic Senate challenger in Montana, would give the Democrats control of the Senate for the first time since 2002 and control of the entire Congress for the first time in a dozen years.

Mr. Webb, taking a page from the Republican playbook in the contested presidential vote count in Florida in 2000, tried to cast his victory as inevitable. But Mr. Allen's advisers on Wednesday still held out the possibility of a recount.

Aides to Mr. Webb began referring to him as Virginia's senator-elect, and this afternoon he issued a news release naming three members of his transition team.

Democratic Party officials and some news organizations, including MSNBC and The A.P., declared Mr. Webb the winner of the election with a margin of less than one-half of 1 percent out of more than 2.3 million ballots cast. A candidate can request a recount in Virginia if the vote difference is less than one percentage point.

State officials were conducting a rapid canvass of the vote as part of a formal certification of the result. They could be done by Thursday afternoon, officials said.

Members of the Allen camp said earlier in the day that they expected the review would cut into Mr. Webb's lead, but stopped short of predicting that it would reverse the outcome.

Mr. Allen will speak as soon as the canvass is done, said a senior Allen adviser who spoke on the condition of anonymity. The adviser made it clear that if the margin did not narrow significantly, Mr. Allen would not challenge the result.

"He has no intention of dragging this out," the adviser said.

Democratic leaders expressed certainty that their margins in Virginia and Montana would hold, giving them unquestioned control of the Senate, to accompany the grasp of the House, which they won convincingly on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0092137

A concession by Mr. Allen would end a rough campaign marked by accusations of racism against him and sexism against Mr. Webb in a contest that alienated many voters, particularly women, and has apparently left the senator's once-promising political career in tatters.

Mr. Webb, a former Republican who was secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, ran a fairly listless campaign until the final weeks, when he adopted the persona of the warrior he was in the Marine Corps.

A spokeswoman for him, Kristian Denny Todd, said Wednesday that Virginia's vote-counting procedure was methodical and accurate, and expressed confidence that Mr. Webb's margin would hold .

"The bottom line," Ms. Denny Todd said, "is the votes have been counted and Jim Webb has won. It could have gone the other way, but it didn't. We're on top, and that's the way it's going to stay."

Virginia election results "rarely, rarely, rarely" change after certification, Ms. Denny Todd said, citing a recount in a race for attorney general last year in which the margin was fewer than 400 votes both before and after a recount.

At least one other race faced the possibility of a recount. In Florida, Vern Buchanan, a Republican, and Christine Jennings, the Democrat opposing him in the race for the Congressional seat being vacated by Representative Katherine Harris, appear headed for a recount with Mr. Buchanan ahead by 368 votes.

Last Chance By DAVID FRUM (WSJ)

The Bush administration woke up yesterday morning to a deeply ugly political situation. Those polls that show the president below 40% approval? They would look even worse if they surveyed only Republican members of Congress. As for the president's opponents: They are slavering for a nice two-year-long munch on the administration's haunches.

Worst of all, the administration seems to have exhausted its energy. Frustrated by Iraq, wounded by Katrina, thwarted in its two most recent major domestic initiatives (Social Security and immigration), the administration looks baffled, uncertain and often strangely passive.

But President Bush can yet regain the initiative. His opponents in Congress are badly divided amongst themselves: Witness Nancy Pelosi's attempt last spring to engineer the ouster of her own No. 2, Steny Hoyer, in favor of John Murtha.

Mr. Bush's Democratic opponents are also burdened with a very visible extremist wing. There is a real possibility that Alcee Hastings will be named chairman of the extremely important Intelligence Committee -- he of course being the Florida ex-judge impeached and removed in 1989 on corruption charges. The Democrats are also haunted by gnawing fears that crucial segments of the American electorate distrust them as cultural aliens and foreign-policy weaklings, as demonstrated by the panicked Democratic reaction to John Kerry's inadvertent slur against the troops in Iraq.

With a little ingenuity, the Bush administration could take advantage of these weaknesses -- and make yesterday's defeat work to its own advantage. President Bush should prepare to bombard Congress and the media with new ideas and proposals that rally his own party, divide his opponents and drive a wedge between left-wing Democrats and the voting public. So long as he is acting, he forces Congress to react.

The president's critics complain that the administration has lacked accomplishments over these past two years. The new Congress offers an opportunity to prove that Republicans remain the party of ideas -- and that their opponents still lack them. The nomination of Robert Gates to replace Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense offers a new start. The serene and knowledgeable Mr. Gates is in for a grilling, but by standing his ground and insisting on the importance of succeeding in Iraq, he can expose to the TV-watching public the real beliefs and purposes of left-leaning Democrats like Carl Levin.

At home, the administration should seek less to pass legislation -- although legislative success is always welcome -- than to clarify the differences between the parties for 2008. For instance: The president talked vaguely in 2005 of a grand new tax reform, but never gave enough detail to interest anybody in his ideas. What he had in mind, of course, was a shift away from taxing work, savings and investment toward taxing consumption. Good idea, but awfully abstract. The next Congress offers an opportunity to make it clear what this reform means.

President Bush has repeatedly asked Congress to make permanent his cuts in the income, dividend, estate and capital-gains taxes, as well as his doubling of the child tax credit. Congress has hesitated, citing fears of the impact of permanent tax cuts on the U.S. fiscal balance. These cuts constitute the most valuable element of Mr. Bush's domestic legacy. It's worth fighting to remind the country that Democrats would allow the president's tax relief to lapse -- and that if Democrats are allowed to return to power, taxes will shoot back up in 2010.

The president should send Congress a tax-reform proposal now, shaping it so that it appeals to enough Democrats to split the opposition. Here's one way to do that: Democrats have made a great theme of "energy independence." The president has likewise denounced America's "addiction to oil" and often presented nuclear power as a crucial element of an ideal energy policy. What if he baited the Democrats with some kind of energy tax (or, better, a carbon tax -- which exempts nuclear-generated energy) in exchange for permanent cuts in taxes on work, savings and investment. "Tax waste, not work" is not a bad slogan.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that a carbon tax that began at $12 per ton emitted and rose gradually to $17 would raise $208 billion over 10 years. That's enough to fully compensate for the cost to the Treasury of making permanent the president's cuts to taxes on capital gains and dividends -- and leave over almost $40 billion to balance the budget.

Education reform offers another opportunity for the administration to display energy and highlight opponents' divisions. The testing system instituted by the No Child Left Behind law will soon begin delivering its five-year report cards. Many American schools will be rated as failing -- and very likely the majority of these schools will be found in Democratic congressional districts. Over the past five years -- and over the 20 years before that -- hundreds of billions of dollars have been poured into America's worst schools, without discernible improvement.

George Bush entered politics as an educational reformer. Now, he can return to the good fight by scooping an idea from an opponent. Former Labor Secretary Robert Reich has proposed a voucher system that would grant progressively larger vouchers to children from poorer families. Given how much taxpayers already pay to support the nation's worst schools -- the District of Columbia spends more per child than any other jurisdiction -- Mr. Reich's idea might even save money. But it would certainly put the cat among the Democratic pigeons, especially if the president recruited Mr. Reich to lobby for it.

Democrats have effectively used ethics as a political lever against Republicans. With the election behind them, they will surely welcome the chance to transform their slogans into reality. The president might take the lead in calling for a voluntary ban on lobbyist-paid travel by members of Congress. And since we should want to encourage members of Congress to travel abroad, the president should propose a formal congressional travel fund. Make the fund big -- at least double what is being spent now -- and propose a special joint House-Senate subcommittee to oversee it based on the principle: oversight yes, golf no.

Over the next two years, executive energy must be more than a doctrine. It may prove the key to Republican survival -- and the coming conservative resurgence.

After The Thumpin' (NYT)

By William Safire

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

Washington

WHY all the glum faces?" President Bush asked at the opening of yesterday's news conference.

Though the assembled reporters were hardly glum, conservatives of every stripe can console themselves by considering the limited scope of the Democrats' midterm sweep.

Despite the pervasive weariness with the war and the high tide of irritation at Bush's steadfastness; despite the general disgust at the policy paralysis and ethical laxity in the wake of muscle-bound one-party control — the result was only the average loss of House and Senate seats of the party in power midway in the second term of a president.

A political shakeup every dozen years is a necessary cathartic for the two-party system. What's more, the rightward cast of many Democrats in the freshman class is hardly bad news for conservativism. And the heartening victory of Joe Lieberman over the angry far left in liberal Connecticut augurs a renewal of a brief period of bipartisanship at the water's edge.

Where does our renewed two-party nation go from here?

First, leadership is never weakened by a little humility. After what he called "the thumpin'," the president showed he got the voters' message on Iraq: "I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there." But in acknowledging that "they cast their vote for a new direction," he didn't wring his hands: "The people have spoken and now it's time to move on."

Months ago, he had made provision for that "new direction" response — a phrase acceptable to hawks provided the direction is not out, quick — in the post-election report to be made by James Baker and Lee Hamilton's Iraq study group. The report should give cover to increased pressure on elected Iraqi leaders to confront the urgent needs of nationhood.

By placing Robert "Fresh Eyes" Gates, a former C.I.A. chief, on that panel, Bush paved the way for Donald Rumsfeld to absorb the need of opposition politicians for bureaucratic punishment. The loyal SecDef's resignation after the poll results was Bush's act of contrition.

Now the president should take the Democratic leaders up on their fine post-election expressions of bipartisanship. He's headed to Asia for an economic meeting in Hanoi. In its lame-duck session beginning next week, Congress should pass the $67 million earmark to Vietnam called for by Bush primarily for AIDS treatment. Then he should seize the initiative to get some cooperation on domestic progress during the final days of the outgoing, unlamented 109th Congress. In addition to the usual budgetary housekeeping between Thanksgiving and Christmas, both parties should make a concerted effort to deal with the most doable urgent domestic need: to resolve the fears of 12 million Hispanic "illegals" living in the United States.

Bush has already proposed a comprehensive compromise: a guest worker program with earnable citizenship for those here now, as well as a border fence to stop the influx of Mexicans. But Republicans — fearful of nativist voters shouting "no amnesty" — passed only the harsh half, and that unfunded fence is a joke. Now Bush, with many Democrats already supporting his approach, should get recalcitrant Republicans to pass his fair-minded immigration package. It would be a test of both new Republican discipline and Democrats' sincerity on bipartisanship.

The window of bipartisan compromise can also fit a minimum wage increase tied to inheritance tax reduction; energy drilling tied to mileage standards and alternative fuels subsidy. But the window won't be open long. That's because the committees of the 110th Congress will be headed by the liberal Old Bulls eager to pass "one-house bills" useful only to provide hearings and make headlines.

Committee chairmen like Charles Rangel of Ways and Means, John Dingell of Energy and Commerce, Barney Frank of Financial Services and others will crowd the airwaves with hearings grilling contractors and torturing accused torturers.

After a few months of this posturing, a newly emboldened Bush, emulating F.D.R.'s derision of the isolationists "Martin, Barton and Fish," will be moved to denounce "Rangel, Dingell and Frank." This will be the signal for new Republican leaders, like Mike Pence of Indiana, to take up the tactic of Harry Truman by denouncing "the do-nothing 110th Congress." At the same time, as the 2008 primaries loom, the Trumanesque Bush will measure his reduction of troops in Iraq by the ability of the Iraqis to take over their own defense.

That's when the new Democratic majority will suffer great stress. Senator Hillary Clinton evoked "the vital, dynamic center" in her victory speech, and Representative Rahm Emanuel was the model of non-hubristic responsibility during the delighted Democratic deluge. But it's hard to imagine Nancy Pelosi, Howard Dean, Kerry-Gore-Edwards campaigners and the whole loser left holding still into the snows of New Hampshire.

Into that incipient split of the new Congressional majority will march John McCain, Rudy Giuliani, Mitt Romney and the other conservative, internationalist hopes. So cheer up, my fellow right-wingers, especially those of you who have grown too accustomed to winning every election night. Sometimes we have to suffer a loud, corrective slap before readying the political counterpunch.

Speaker Pelosi (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Tuesday's Democratic election victory was by any measure decisive, yet in the perspective of history also unsurprising. In the sixth year of a two-term Presidency, Americans rebuked Republicans on Capitol Hill who had forgotten their principles and a President who hasn't won the Iraq war he started. While a thumping defeat for the GOP, the vote was about competence, not ideological change.

This is not to minimize the Democrats' victory, which they deserve to savor after several frustrating election nights. Credit in particular goes to Rahm Emanuel and Chuck Schumer, who led the House and Senate efforts to pick candidates who could win in GOP-leaning states. Their leaders, notably Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi, also kept in check their ideological ambitions to make Tuesday a referendum on Republican governance. It was a shrewd strategy.

All the more so because the GOP gave them so much ammunition. By our count, at least eight GOP House seats fell largely due to scandal; campaign-finance ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff probably cost Conrad Burns his Senate seat in Montana. These columns have spent several years warning Republicans that their overspending, corrupt "earmarks" and policy drift would undermine their claim as the party of reform. On Tuesday they did.

The GOP "base" voted in respectable numbers, but enough of it voted for Democrats to make the difference. At 32%, the self-identified conservative share of the electorate was down only slightly from 2004 (34%), and the liberal share of 21% stayed the same. What changed is that the GOP won fewer conservative and independent votes. * * *

Democrats were able to exploit this frustration even without offering much of their own agenda. While this worked in the campaign, it leaves in doubt how Democrats will use their new power. In the minority, they could assail "George Bush's war" and threaten impeachment to mobilize their base without fear of being held responsible. Now they will have to govern. For Ms. Pelosi, this will mean deciding how much deference to give to the Great Society liberals who will soon run most House committees. Henry Waxman, David Obey, Pete Stark, Ed Markey, John Conyers, Barney Frank: These are sons of the Sixties who helped drive the Carter and Clinton Presidencies off a cliff.

They represent the soul of the Democratic House but not the desires of most voters in the 15 seats or so that provided their margin of victory on Tuesday. To sustain their majority in 2008 and beyond, Democrats will have to hold such seats as those won in eastern Pennsylvania by pro-military veterans Admiral Joe Sestak and Chris Carney, or in North Carolina by pro-life, anti-gun control Heath Shuler.

We doubt voters in those seats chose Democrats with a goal of "censuring" Mr. Bush, much less impeaching him, or because they want a tax increase or an unseemly retreat from Iraq. Flooding the Beltway with subpoenas and partisan hearings may be cathartic for the Bush-hating left, but it won't send a signal that Democrats are different from the DeLay Republicans. If Ms. Pelosi sides with the antiwar Jack Murtha against Maryland's moderate Steny Hoyer in the race for House Majority Leader, Republicans will be overjoyed at this signal that the old liberals are back in charge.

In the Senate, probable Majority Leader Harry Reid faces a comparable choice. His predecessor, Tom Daschle, lost the majority and later his own seat in large part because he played the role of obstructionist, especially on judges. Democrats might note that they gained Senate seats this year after having confirmed two Supreme Court Justices and taking judges off the table as a dominant election issue. At the very least, immigration and education are two areas where Democrats should be able to find common ground with Mr. Bush.

The biggest question mark, and responsibility, for Democrats is on Iraq and the war on terror. They could do themselves and the country much good by working with Mr. Bush on a strategy toward achieving victory in Iraq as well as against al Qaeda. This means more than bromides about a "phased withdrawal" of troops next year, which won't encourage Iraq's militias to disarm; and it means more than Mr. Murtha's "redeployment" to Okinawa or somewhere else where the world would see that the U.S. has given up on Iraq.

The Democrats could be most constructive by taking up the call of Senators Joe Lieberman and John McCain to do whatever it takes to win in Iraq. If this means more troops, Iraqi or American, they should call for them. And if it means spending more to build a larger American military in this era of the global terrorist threat, they should do that too. This would not sit well with many on the antiwar left, but then Ned Lamont lost to Mr. Lieberman once their contest moved to an electorate larger than the Democratic primaries.

In Tuesday's exit polls, for all of their other woes, Republicans still had an advantage over Democrats of seven percentage points as the party more likely to keep the country safer from terrorism. Since this threat isn't going away, Democrats won't help their image going into 2008 by opposing warrantless wiretaps against al Qaeda or the rest of the antiwar agenda. They would be smarter to make themselves partners in giving institutional permanence to Mr. Bush's best post-9/11 policies.

All told, the Republicans deserved the electoral drubbing they received. Democrats will now have to prove they deserved the majority that GOP failure has handed them.

The Democratic House (NYT)

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

There was only one explanation for the crazy-quilt combination of victories around the country that gave the Democrats control of the House of Representatives last night: an angry shout of repudiation of the Bush White House and the abysmal way the Republican majority has run Congress.

It was a satisfying expression of the basic democratic principle of accountability. A government that performs badly is supposed to be punished by the electorate. And this government has performed badly on so many counts.

The Republicans created their defeat by focusing obsessively on the right-wing "base," ostracizing not only the Democrats but their own party's more moderate legislators. The conflict between the extremist House and the conservative Senate created a phony center, far to the right of the general public's idea of where the middle ought to be. Yesterday, moderate Republicans in heavily Democratic states were done in by their party's excesses. In Rhode Island, more than 60 percent of the voters told pollsters that they liked their Republican senator, Lincoln Chafee. But he was soundly defeated anyway.

The Democrats won a negative victory, riding on the wave of public anger about Republicans. The new House majority will certainly call the administration to account on any number of issues, but it will have to do far more than run investigations if it is to build on its victory.

For years now, the Democrats have been not only the minority party, but a particularly powerless minority, elbowed out of virtually any role other than that of critic. The House Democrats will have to shift from the role of tactical opposition to shadow government. They will have to pass bills — bills that might not make it into law, but that would provide a clear idea of what their party would do if it were really in control.

And while they are trying to build a new majority, the Democrats need to remember what happens when a party in power loses its way.

Message Of 2006: Moderates Fed Up With Polarization (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

The 2006 election results were a rebuke not just to President Bush and Congressional Republicans but to radio talk-show hosts and other right-wing polarizers.

The right managed to win seven more anti-gay marriage referendums across the country, but it was repudiated on Iraq, immigration and excessive religiosity.

At the same time, while Democrats won control of the House and possibly the Senate, they did so by capturing the votes of moderates and independents, whom they could lose easily with demonstrations of wretched excess.

It's encouraging that Bush and incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and likely Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) are talking the language of bipartisan cooperation, but Democrats will be strongly tempted to exercise their passions against the president and his policies.

Exit polls showed that, once again, self-identified moderates made up a near-majority of the electorate — 47 percent — and this group split 62 percent to 36 percent Democratic — a 9-point Democratic gain from 2002 and 8 points above 2004.

Only 21 percent of voters identified themselves as liberals and 32 percent as conservatives. Liberals supported Democrats nearly 90 percent of the time, while conservatives voted Republican by less than 80 percent.

While Republican and Democratic candidates held their partisan base voters by margins above 90 percent, independents went Democratic by a margin of 58 percent to 38 percent, a 10-point gain over 2002 and 9 points over 2004.

Clearly, these elections were a classic "six-year itch" referendum on the incumbent president — and that Bush lost.

The scale of this loss was on par with the post-war average for such elections: close to 30 House seats versus the average of 32, and likely six Senate seats compared to the average of eight.

DOJ_NMG_0092142

In elections when the president's popularity was low because of war, scandal or recession, however, the average is 47 House seats and eight Senate seats.

Democrats did not campaign on a distinct positive agenda, but rather against Bush and the Iraq War and for an ill-defined "new direction."

Bush, of course, failed to win a majority of the popular vote in 2000, yet began governing as though he had won a smashing mandate. Largely because of his response to terrorism, he managed to defy history by increasing his party's majorities in two subsequent elections.

But he has turned himself into one of the most polarizing presidents in American history. And history has at last caught up with him.

The loudest message from the elections is that the nation wants a change of policy in Iraq. By a margin of 57 percent to 41 percent, voters said they oppose the war.

By 59 percent to 34 percent, voters said the war has not improved American security, and by 56 percent to 37 percent, they called for withdrawal of some or all U.S. troops, as opposed to maintaining current levels or sending more.

Yet full withdrawal is a distinct minority position — 30 percent — and Democrats won't have the country's support if they force it. Encouragingly, they say they won't.

The clearest repudiation of the loud right came on the issue of immigration. By a margin of 57 percent to 38 percent, voters said they wanted illegal immigrants who work in the U.S. to be allowed a chance to apply for legal status and not be deported.

Voters in Arizona rejected two of the nation's most vociferous immigration restrictionists, Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R) and Minuteman founder Randy Graf (R).

House Republicans massively bought into the talk-show claque's agenda by rejecting Bush's Latino-friendly proposal for comprehensive immigration reform, and they've suffered important damage as a result.

Bush managed to capture 44 percent of the Latino vote in 2004, according to disputed exit polls, but this year Hispanics went Democratic by a margin of 72 percent to 27 percent, 10 points higher than in 2002.

If Republicans and Democrats are looking for an issue around which to demonstrate they can unify and accomplish something, they could use the lame-duck session of Congress to pass the comprehensive Senate immigration bill.

The exit polls also suggest that a revolt took place this year against the right's infusion of religious dogma into politics — as in the effort to keep brain-damaged Terri Schiavo alive and Bush's veto of expanded federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

Some of the biggest gains scored by Democrats over 2002 election results were among people who attend church a few times a month (a 16 percent Democratic gain), a few times a year (10 percent) or never (13 percent).

At the same time, the rapid spread of anti-gay-marriage constitutional amendments in the states is the consequence of overreaching by liberal courts that have short-circuited the political process on a deeply felt social issue.

Democrats also gained 10 points among white males, possibly reflecting the fact that only 29 percent of voters said their personal finances were in better shape than they were two years ago and that 68 percent said they were barely maintaining their standard of living or were falling behind.

Democrats and Republicans have to work together to improve workers' ability to cope with the high-tech global economy. Democrats will be tempted to be as isolationist on trade as Republicans have been restrictionist on immigration, but that would be a losing proposition.

Democrats and Republicans have a lot of tasks they can unite around — reauthorizing the State Children's Health Insurance Program and No Child Left Behind, redirecting oil company subsidies to alternative energy research, trying to reach an accommodation on out-of-control entitlements and expanding opportunities to attend college.

Possibly the most arresting single statistic in the exit polls was the finding that a plurality of voters — 40 percent — believe that the next generation of Americans will experience a life "worse than today," while only 30 percent expect it to be better and 28 percent about the same.

This means that voters are discouraged not only about America's present but also its future. The message of the elections is that the country wants its politicians to stop squabbling for partisan advantage and restore the American dream.

Chastened Ike Provides Worthy Model For Bush (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, November 9, 2006

In the days leading up to the midterm elections, the president sounded a dire warning. The nation would face "innumerable obstacles to steady progress" if Democrats wrested control of Congress from Republicans, he said in a speech to supporters.

But when the votes were counted the American electorate didn't heed his words, and the president quickly tried to position himself as a healer, not a divider. "If there are any roadblocks thrown in the way of cooperation, I am not going to be responsible," he said at a post-election news conference.

If none of this sounds familiar to you, that's understandable. The president I'm talking about is Dwight D. Eisenhower, not George W. Bush. And the midterm elections were in 1954, not the ones held two days ago.

In that political sea change, Democrats picked up 19 seats in taking over the House and two seats in seizing the Senate. Like Eisenhower 52 years earlier, Bush tried to frighten voters in order to keep Republicans in power. Democrats "want to take more of your own money because they think they can spend it better than you can spend it," he said in Billings, Mont., five days before the elections.

That kind of talk might have rallied the base, but it didn't win the day for Republicans.

Maybe that's because a lot of voters thought Bush was being disingenuous with such criticism of Democrats. After all, it has been on his watch that a record federal surplus has turned into a huge deficit. Or it might be that while Bush was trotting out that old Republican scare tactic, voters worried more about the quagmire he's gotten us into in Iraq. He should not be tone deaf to this reality.

It's not enough for the president to try to appease voters with grudging talk of his willingness to work with a Democratic majority in the House, and possibly the Senate — as he did at his news conference Wednesday. Nor will having Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld walk the plank do it. He must accept the judgment of the voters that this nation must get out of Iraq — and their expectation that he reach a quick compromise with Congress on how to withdraw from this unpopular war.

"We shall have much to do together; I am sure that we shall get it done, and that we shall do it in harmony and goodwill," Eisenhower told the freshly minted Democratically controlled Congress during his 1955 State of the Union address.

And he apparently kept his word. Six months after that speech, Time magazine said of him: "No U.S. president has worked harder than Dwight Eisenhower to maintain friendly and constitutionally proper relationships with Congress."

When Congress challenged some of his proposals, the magazine reported that same July that "Eisenhower has resolutely resisted efforts to drag him into every political dogfight on and off Capitol Hill. He has always remained a step above the scuffle. This has dismayed some of his closest supporters, who thought that he would gain more by getting into the fight. There is every evidence, however, that this position above the brawl is a strong point in his popularity with U.S. voters."

Bush, who is far from popular with the electorate, would do well to be guided by Eisenhower's behavior rather than any urge he might have to go toe-to-toe with the Democrats. He needs to start acting more like the Texas governor he once was — a politician who was a lot better at bridging this nation's political divide — than the combative president he has been.

Many lessons can be learned from the drubbing that Republicans took at the polls this week. But none is more compelling than this: Americans don't want the fate of this nation to rest solely in the hands of George W. Bush and the Republican Party he leads.

Meeting At The Middle (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

American voters, in their wisdom, ended an era on Tuesday. They rejected a poorly conceived war policy in Iraq that has weakened the United States. They rejected a harshly ideological approach to politics that cast opponents as enemies of the country's survival. They rejected a president so determined to win an election that he was willing to slander his opponents by saying: "The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses." The voters decided there was no decency in that.

No longer will the national tragedy of Sept. 11, 2001, be used to undermine the opposition party. It was only after he was forced to do so by an electoral defeat that President Bush called for genuine bipartisanship yesterday. Imagine what the world would look like if he had done that a year or two ago.

And no longer will we pay attention to political strategists who assert that swing voters aren't important and that independents and moderates don't matter. If Democrats are to make good use of the power they have been granted, they need to remember that last point. This election was the revenge of the center no less than it was the revenge of the left. The decisive votes cast on Tuesday came from moderates and independents, whom the exit polls showed favoring Democratic House candidates by about 3 to 2.

Nancy Pelosi and the other Democratic leaders face a genuinely complicated political calculus. On the one hand, Democrats would not have won without the intense dedication of their partisan and ideological base. Among self-identified Democrats, the party's House candidates won by about 13 to 1. Liberals went about 8 to 1 Democratic. This energy was critical to the outcome.

But many of the party's successful candidates ran as moderates, and Democrats hold power on the basis of a loan of votes from middle-of-the-road Americans who simply could not stomach Bush Republicanism anymore. The loan can be recalled at any moment.

The good news for Democrats is that their candidates, moderates and liberals alike, ran on two common themes: that the Bush Iraq policy had to change and that the Washington establishment simply does not understand the personal struggles and economic insecurities confronting so many Americans.

On Iraq, the president, not Congress, controls the essential levers of power, especially since Democrats have made clear that they will not use the one instrument they have, to cut off funding for the war, and they are right not to do so.

What they should do is use the coming report from the commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic House member, to force a genuinely bipartisan approach to extricate us from Iraq at the lowest cost possible.

Tuesday's vote can help by making clear to the Iraqi government that there is a limit to American patience. The Shiite majority in Iraq must take more steps to reconcile with the Sunni minority. Our allies in the Arab world need to step up and help, because the American people will not tolerate endless engagement in Iraq. And the Democrats should encourage the administration to engage with all the nations in the region that have reason to fear an Iraqi civil war. That includes Syria and Iran.

The other obligation of this new majority is to answer the economic discontent that helped build its victory. Republicans prayed that the economy would matter in this election. Their prayers were answered in an odd way: Two-fifths of the voters told the pollsters that the economy was "extremely important" in their voting decision -- and they voted 3 to 2 for Democratic House candidates. A lot of Americans are losing ground, and they spoke up.

As long as Republicans control the White House, Democrats will not be able to pass far-reaching measures to deal with worries about pension benefits, health insurance and job security. What needs to begin is a long struggle to create a new social contract that will protect and lift up the tens of millions of Americans for whom globalization is more threat than promise.

It's worth pushing hard-to-veto legislation increasing the minimum wage, expanding health-care coverage and fixing the Medicare drug benefit. These steps need to be combined with hearings on more ambitious measures that would force the Washington establishment to come to terms with grass-roots economic discontents.

This election creates an exceptional opportunity to move from blind ideology to problem-solving and from stupid divisiveness to a politics of remedy and reconciliation. The Democrats had better make it work.

Lobbying Firms Preparing For Major Hill Realignment (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Democratic lobbyists, flush with the excitement of a victorious Election Day, already are looking to share in the spoils.

DOJ_NMG_0092145

The Democratic rout of Republican rule in Congress also spelled a definitive end of years of GOP dominance of K Street. Jubilant Democratic lobbyists spent the day after the elections basking in their glow, but also beginning to ponder a new order that restores them to relevance.

"It's started," said veteran Democratic lobbyist Chuck Brain. "Within a couple days, it will be full-fledged, with companies asking, 'What are we doing?' and 'Can we still represent our interests?'"

Companies will have some adjusting to do, lobbyists from both parties agreed. Many have spent the better part of a decade responding to a Republican pressure campaign to hire more Republican lobbyists and to direct more of their campaign contributions back to the GOP. But the movers behind that effort were pushed off the stage during this Congress, when former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) was forced to resign and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) fell short in his re-election bid.

Several Democratic lobbyists agreed that the program, dubbed the K Street Project, created an inertia that now will benefit their ranks, as corporate offices seek to ramp up contacts with the new party in control. But even so, many Democratic K Streeters were careful to say their party — which made lobbying and ethics a major campaign issue this year — will not seek to impose its own similar effort to help that process along.

Marty Russo, a former Democratic Congressman who's now CEO of lobbying giant Cassidy & Associates, said the nature of lobbying itself will change under Democratic rule.

"We're going to go back to a system where you have to work your way through the legislative process," he said. "Lobbyists are going to have to be able to talk to more Members of Congress about more substance, and that's the way it should be. It's going to make us work harder."

Nevertheless, even in the past several weeks before the election outcomes were certain, Democratic lobbyists for hire reported a surge in interest among potential clients.

"Over the last 10 days, there's been a significant uptick in incoming calls and interest in finding out more about what we're doing," said Dan Tate, a veteran of former President Bill Clinton's administration who now lobbies at Capitol Solutions. "It's clear that people are assessing their needs and starting to put together what their prospective teams are going to look like."

Lobbyists said that interest is coming in part from the energy and pharmaceutical industries, both of which have invested heavily in Republican majorities. Over the course of this campaign cycle, both sectors were cast by Democrats as corporate bogeymen, and party leaders have promised a number of measures to roll back GOP-sponsored favors.

Scrambling to throw up some defenses, companies in those sectors have made a number of strategic hires in recent months. Among others, ExxonMobil added Louis Finkel, a former Democratic House aide, to its in-house staff. Shell Oil inked a deal with former Democratic House leadership aide Steve Elmendorf. And the all-Democratic firm Nueva Vista Group has signed on to represent the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

One Democratic lobbyist said it is unclear whether those hires will put off Democratic lawmakers who are determined to rein in the industries. "In the pharma and energy fields, you can help them prepare for the likely assault, but it's too early to tell whether or not you can actually demonstrably help them," he said.

Meanwhile, all-Republican lobbying firms that have enjoyed robust growth under the GOP Congress must decide whether to rewrite their business plans or stay the course. While lobbyists at these shops acknowledged the situation will remain fluid as the dust settles from the election, several added that they are considering upending their partisan models by adding Democrats.

"We're talking to our clients and trying to figure out what their needs are, and we'll meet their needs, whatever they are," said Matt Keelen, a partner at Valis & Keelen. The firm currently contracts out certain projects to Democrats. The American Continental Group, which already has a full-time Democrat on staff, likewise said it is examining its options.

"We're always looking at ways to evolve so that we can continue to help our clients achieve their government relations objectives in the 110th Congress," said partner Carl Thorsen.

Others pledged to stick with their all-Republican format. Barbour Griffith & Rogers, the largest firm of this type, was founded in the early 1990s, when Republicans were out of power on both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. Loren Monroe, a top lobbyist at the shop, said the firm can continue to grow by helping companies block Democratic-sponsored legislation they oppose.

DOJ_NMG_0092146

Similarly, the all-GOP firm Fierce, Isakowitz & Blalock has no plans to alter its strategy. “We like to be part of the extended Republican family,” partner Mark Isakowitz said. “That’s who we are and that’s not going to change.”

And the Ashcroft Group, the firm founded by former Attorney General John Ashcroft, will stay busy helping companies and their top executives prepare for tough hearings and investigations they expect Democrats to conduct. “It will be a subpoena-rich environment,” said senior adviser Juleanna Glover Weiss.

But firms that are already bipartisan signaled that they will be looking to adjust the partisan balance in their ranks by adding new Democrats. At Clark & Weinstock, said Ed Kutler, a top lobbyist and a former House Republican leadership aide, the partners have been looking to add high-caliber Democrats.

“We have already been talking to senior level Democrats and plan to talk to more to augment our strong offering on the Democratic side of the aisle,” he said.

Word Of The Day: 'Bipartisan' (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

As former House member Gerry Sikorski (D-Minn.), now head of the government practice at Holland & Knight , put it, some of his fellow Democratic lobbyists have a nice "jump to their step" today after the Democratic takeover of the House.

But then, he said, everyone must get down to the fact that "it's a bipartisan process largely."

No one seems to be echoing the bipartisan-lobbying mantra more than the business community, which, while not monolithically Republican, tended to support more Republicans than Democrats, not leaving it with such great credentials with the new Democratic leadership in the House.

Indeed, today, Harold McGraw III , chairman of the Business Roundtable and chief executive of McGraw-Hill Cos., is talking to the Wharton School of Business on "The Real World Is Neither Red Nor Blue" and laying out the group's agenda for Congress.

BRT is also taking out newspaper ads today on the theme, one of which is a photo of former presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton with the line: "If they can put aside their differences after an election, so can you."

John Castellani , president of BRT, said the group of CEOs is not partisan and notes that officials recently met with members of the "Blue Dog" Democrats, a group of conservative party members, over breakfast.

Bill Miller , political director of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, acknowledged that "yesterday was a down day for the business community," but he added that the chamber has supported some Democrats, particularly Rep. Melissa L. Bean (Ill.), and Democrat-turned-independent Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.).

He also noted that many of the new Democrats have a "Blue Dog" profile, or are at least moderates, and said the chamber is eager to work with the Democratic leadership. "Our door is open, and we hope their door is open as well," Miller said.

Todd Stottlemyer , chief executive of the National Federation of Independent Business, said in a statement after the elections that such small-business issues as affordable health care, a complex tax code and burdensome regulation are not partisan issues.

"We're committed to doing our part to work with all lawmakers to find real solutions for America's job creators. NFIB supported pro-small-business candidates in both parties, and small-business owners will now look to the Congress to get the job done," he said.

NFIB, which was active in the campaigns, endorsed 268 candidates for the House and Senate, mostly incumbents -- overwhelmingly Republicans. NFIB spokesman Michael J. Donohue said the group endorsed 12 Democrats.

The new leadership and lawmakers will also provide "new opportunities," according to James Greenwood , head of the Biotechnology Industry Organization -- BIO -- and a former GOP House member from Pennsylvania. Greenwood said that BIO has emphasized a bipartisan lobbying operation. "If we can explain the science and the economics, reason will prevail," he said.Democrats Change Face of New York

Winds of Democratic change have most certainly hit New York.

McK enna Long & Aldridge recently snagged Richard S. Gordon , a national and New York Democratic figure, for its national government affairs practice and New York law office. Earlier this year, McKenna Long merged New York's Plunkett & Jaffe , a GOP law firm where Gov. George Pataki (R) was a partner. William F. Plunkett Jr. is one of Pataki's top political advisers.

Gordon has served as director of policy and planning for then-Indiana Gov. Evan Bayh and is a senior adviser to the All-American PAC, chaired by now-Sen. Bayh. Part of his New York connection: Gordon was executive director of Friends of Mario M. Cuomo, directing the former New York governor's political activities in the state. Most recently, Gordon ran his own law firm in New York.

Other members of the firm's government affairs group include: Marcia Hale and Keith Mason , former Clinton White House director and deputy director, respectively, of intergovernmental affairs; Eric Tanenblatt , former chief of staff to Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R); former House member Buddy Darden (D-Ga.); and former senator Zell Miller (D-Ga.).Here and There

Also moving around . . . Amy McKennis Mistri left the legislative affairs office at the Department of Homeland Security, where she was a deputy assistant secretary, to join Global USA Inc. She is chairing the government relations and consulting shop's homeland security group, naturally. Earlier, she worked for the Cellular Telecommunications and Internet Association and for Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.).

GOP Hill veterans R. Adam Shepherd and Christopher L. Minakowski have signed on with Alcalde & Fay. Shepherd was legislative director for Rep. Charles H. Taylor (R-N.C.); Minakowski was legislative counsel for Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.).

Catherine P. Bennett has left Pfizer Inc., after 27 years as a government affairs lawyer, and joined the Venable law firm. Before joining Pfizer, she worked on legislative issues for the National Security Council. (Odd fact: After the NSC, she did research for "The White House Years," a Henry Kissinger memoir.)

Josh Gottheimer , a former Clinton White House speechwriter and most recently director of strategic communications at Ford Motor Co., has been named worldwide executive vice president at Burson-Marsteller , where he will be global chair of the corporate and public affairs practices.

Dems Win VA, Senate (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

Democrats wrested control of the Senate from Republicans Wednesday with an upset victory in Virginia, giving the party complete domination of Capitol Hill for the first time since 1994.

Jim Webb's squeaker win over incumbent Sen. George Allen gave Democrats their 51st seat in the Senate, an astonishing turnabout at the hands of voters unhappy with Republican scandal and unabated violence in Iraq. Allen was the sixth Republican incumbent senator defeated in Tuesday's elections.

The Senate had teetered at 50 Democrats, 49 Republicans for most of Wednesday, with Virginia hanging in the balance. Webb's victory ended Republican hopes of eking out a 50-50 split, with Vice President Dick Cheney wielding tie-breaking authority.

The Associated Press contacted election officials in all 134 localities where voting occurred, obtaining updated numbers Wednesday. About half the localities said they had completed their postelection canvassing and nearly all had counted outstanding absentees. Most were expected to be finished by Friday.

The new AP count showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236. Virginia has had two statewide vote recounts in modern history, but both resulted in vote changes of no more than a few hundred votes.

An adviser to Allen, speaking on condition of anonymity because his boss had not formally decided to end the campaign, said the senator wanted to wait until most of canvassing was completed before announcing his decision, possibly as early as Thursday evening.

The adviser said that Allen was disinclined to request a recount if the final vote spread was similar to that of election night.

The victory puts Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., in line to become Senate majority leader. He has led the Democrats since Tom Daschle, D-S.D., was defeated two years ago.

Report: Allen Set To Concede (WT)

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

U.S. Sen. George Allen, R-Va., reportedly plans to concede, as news organizations late Thursday projected Democrat Jim Webb has won their Senate contest.

A Webb victory would hand control of the Senate over to the Democrats.

NBC News Wednesday said Webb had enough votes to win. Sources within the Allen campaign told CNN Wednesday that Allen might concede Thursday because a Wednesday canvas of votes suggested there was little chance that a recount would change the outcome.

"The senator has no intention of dragging this out," the source told CNN.

Webb appeared before supporters early Wednesday and told them, "I'd like to say the votes are counted, and we won."

With 99 percent of the vote in, Webb led Allen by 50 percent to 49 percent with just a few thousand separating the two. Under Virginia law, the second-place vote-getter is entitled to a recount if the winning margin is less than 1 percent of all the votes cast.

The Washington Post said voter turnout was moderate to heavy in the Washington suburbs of Northern Virginia, which would be good news for Webb.

In Alexandria, Arlington and Falls Church, registrars said voter turnout may have broken records for a midterm election.

Allen was expected to show strength in the other areas of Virginia, where returns are traditionally slow.

The war in Iraq was a central issue in the race, the Post said. Webb portrayed Allen as a rubber-stamp senator for President George W. Bush's war strategy -- forcing Allen to moderate his support for the war and say "mistakes have been made."

Virginia's Next Senator (WP)

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

CONTROL OF the U.S. Senate now hangs precariously on Democrat James Webb's slim lead over Republican Sen. George Allen in Virginia -- an edge of about 7,000 votes out of more than 2.3 million cast. Unsurprisingly, for those who remember the Florida playbook from 2000, the party that's ahead is acting as if the result is a foregone conclusion, while the party that's trailing is positioning itself for challenges by raising doubts about malfunctioning voting machines and other supposed problems. Only this time, with the Democrats poised for victory and the Republicans on the ropes, the roles are reversed.

There is cause for concern here but also reason for relative confidence. The concern stems from the fact that with the stakes so high, lawyers from both parties will be pouring into the state, threatening to make a spectacle of an election that -- so far, at least -- seems to have been well run, fair and an accurate measure of the voters' will. The good news is that recent history in Virginia suggests the state knows a thing or two about how to conduct an orderly, circumscribed, confidence-building election review -- and produce an unblemished winner.

Just a year ago, the campaign for Virginia's attorney general yielded a Republican victory in a race much closer than the Webb-Allen contest. But even after six weeks of post-election scrutiny, retabulation, double-checking, error-spotting and an official recount, the victor's final margin -- 360 votes out of 1.94 million cast -- had shifted by scarcely 1,000 votes from that recorded 24 hours after the polls closed. Compared with that, Mr. Webb has chalked up a landslide. Moreover, Virginia's procedures for reviewing, verifying and recounting the vote, spelled out in state law, leave precious little room for mischief and far-fetched legal challenges.

Yesterday, Ed Gillespie, the former Republican National Committee chairman who is advising Mr. Allen, suggested that the GOP is not ready to concede a victory by Mr. Webb. Despite the absence of any reported major irregularities in Tuesday's vote, he mentioned unspecified problems with voting machines; power outages in some polling stations; and a vote shift in Stafford County's tally that favored Mr. Allen. "Let the process play itself out in a dignified manner," said Mr. Gillespie, who was a key GOP strategist during the Florida recount of 2000. "The votes need to be accurately counted. Only at the end of that process is a winner declared."

Fine: The canvassing should proceed. State law allows for a recount in tight races, and that might be justified providing Mr. Allen can show some real reason for it. Inevitably as the votes are retallied, some human error will turn up -- it always does. But it is critical to bear in mind that not a scrap of evidence has emerged so far to challenge the basic integrity of Virginia's Senate vote on Tuesday. Barring some significant error or surprise, Mr. Webb will be the state's next junior senator.

Democrats Claim Senate Control (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, expected to become the next speaker, vowed yesterday to put aside partisanship and usher into Congress fiscal discipline and ethical integrity, while her party put the final touch on its electoral victory by apparently winning control of the Senate.

Democratic electoral gains grew yesterday to 29 House seats, with 10 other races still in doubt. On the Senate side, they claimed victory yesterday in the last three states needed to take their gains to six seats.

Missouri Sen. Jim Talent conceded defeat to Democrat Claire McCaskill this morning.

Montana Republican Sen. Conrad Burns did not throw in the towel despite trailing Jon Tester in the final unofficial tally. Virginia Sen. George Allen was close enough to Democrat James H. Webb Jr. that he could demand a recount. But several news organizations, including the Associated Press, called the two races for the Democrats.

"This new Democratic majority has heard the voices of the American people," Mrs. Pelosi said yesterday, one day after Democrats stripped Republicans of about 30 House seats and staked a claim to the final three seats needed to take the Senate.

"We will make this the most honest, ethical and open Congress in history," she said, alluding to promises the Republican class of 1994 made but failed to deliver on.

As Mrs. Pelosi laid out her vision for the 110th Congress, stunned House Republicans began behind-the-scenes maneuvers for a major shake-up of their leadership.

By midafternoon, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said he would quit the top post and other Republicans emerged to challenge current party leaders.

"The days of the do-nothing Congress are over," Sen. Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, in line to become majority leader, said in a statement issued after the AP called the Virginia race for Mr. Webb.

Earlier yesterday, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip and in line to head his party because Majority Leader Bill Frist is retiring, played down the impact of possibly losing the chamber.

"In the Senate, the minority is never irrelevant unless it falls down into the very small numbers. I don't think, as a practical matter, it's going to make a whole lot of difference in the Senate, being at 49," he said.

Republicans, including party leaders, acknowledged yesterday that the party had wandered far from its commitment 12 years ago to clean up corruption, shrink the federal government and slash irresponsible spending. Majority Leader John A. Boehner, who announced yesterday that he would run for minority leader in Republican leadership elections next week, said the party must recommit itself to those principles.

"Our voters stopped thinking of us as the party of principle because we lost our commitment to and confidence in our core principles," the Ohio Republican said in a letter to his colleagues yesterday. "We fell into the trap of exploiting the marginal advantages of majority control instead of constantly advancing those principles.

"Many of our voters wondered whether instead of changing Washington, Washington had changed us," he said, reminding fellow Republicans that he'd been part of the 1994 takeover of Congress. "And the [Rep. Mark] Foley scandal, along with other brazen betrayals of the public trust by other members, cemented in voters' minds the picture of a party that had lost its way. The renewal of our reform commitment was too late, and too limited, to reverse our party's fate."

Rep. Mike Pence, an Indiana Republican who announced yesterday that he would challenge Mr. Boehner for the party's top post in the House, was no less scathing.

"We did not just lose our majority, we lost our way," he said. "While the scandals of the 109th Congress harmed our cause, the greatest scandal in Washington, D.C., is runaway federal spending."

DOJ_NMG_0092150

Sen. Tom Coburn, the Oklahoma Republican who has railed against Republican-sponsored pork barrel spending such as the $200 million "bridge to nowhere," said this week's election results were "a rejection of corrupt, complacent and incompetent government."

"This election does not show that voters have abandoned their belief in limited government; it shows that the Republican Party has abandoned them," Mr. Coburn said. "In fact, these results represent the total failure of big-government Republicanism."

Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, yesterday restated her commitment to accomplishing five major goals within the first 100 hours of Democratic reign in the House. Democrats promise to immediately enact all the September 11 commission recommendations for fighting terrorism, raise the minimum wage, cut interest rates on student loans, provide more funding for embryonic stem-cell research and repeal some subsidies for the oil industry.

She also promised to include Republicans in the process of drafting and passing legislation more than the Republican majority had included Democrats.

"Democrats are not about getting even," she said. "Democrats are about helping the American people get ahead, and that's what our agenda is about."

The San Francisco lawmaker repeated her previous warnings that calls by some liberals to impeach President Bush are "off the table." She and Mr. Bush plan to have lunch today at the White House.

She will also have to contend with a caucus that includes many more conservative Democrats who bridle at many of her liberal positions. In his statement announcing that he would step down, Mr. Hastert gave a nod to those Democrats who toppled so many Republicans.

"I take some comfort in the fact that a majority of the winning candidates ran on a platform of common-sense conservatism, be they Republican or Democrat," said the Illinois Republican. "That bodes well for the future of our nation."

Mrs. Pelosi is expected to be formally re-elected as House Democratic leader and nominated for speaker when the party caucus meets Nov. 16. Mrs. Pelosi is likely to be unopposed, but other Democratic leadership posts may be contested. Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland and John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania are expected to vie for the majority leader post.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who led the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, blamed the Republican losses on a number of factors, including ethics and their "blind loyalty" to Mr. Bush.

"Every member or district that had an issue related to the professional conduct of that member switched and became Democratic," the Illinois Democrat said. "That was eight seats, half of the 15 you needed" for Democrats to take control.

As clearly elated as Mr. Emanuel was yesterday, he couldn't help but enjoy a bit of self-deprecating humor.

"Democrats haven't been this happy since 2000 when CNN declared Florida for Al Gore," he said. But "that only lasted an hour for us."

Mr. Emanuel's counterpart, New York Republican Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, had far less to celebrate but took a stab of his own at humor when he arrived late for a press conference.

"I would have been here just a little quicker, but I had to get my life preserver, life jacket, off," he said, intended as a reference to the downpour outside. Reporters assumed, however, it was an analogy for his own electoral survival.

Asked whatever happened to the "permanent majority" Republicans have promised, Mr. Reynolds replied: "We're going to take a two-year hiatus."

Webb's Small Lead Holding Up As 'Senator-Elect' Starts Staffing (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Nov. 8 -- Virginia's Democratic Senate candidate, James Webb, claimed the title of senator-elect Wednesday and began organizing his congressional staff, while Republican incumbent George Allen declined to concede but was described as "realistic" about the outcome if he seeks a recount challenging Webb's thin lead.

With control of the U.S. Senate hanging in the balance, Allen dispatched teams of lawyers and operatives across Virginia in search of the votes he would need to win. Early in the day, Allen did not appear ready to relinquish his claim to an office he once saw as a springboard to the White House.

"Let the process play itself out in a dignified manner," said Ed Gillespie, a former national Republican Party chairman, speaking for the Allen campaign in front of the Virginia party headquarters. "The votes need to be accurately counted. Only at the end of that process is a winner declared."

But Webb continued to lead by approximately 7,300 votes with virtually all of Virginia's 2.3 million ballots counted Wednesday evening, and Republicans said there appeared to be little hope that glitches or math errors might uncover new GOP votes. Gillespie said Allen was "realistic," and an e-mail sent late Wednesday said the senator would make a statement "at the conclusion" of the statewide canvass of votes. The e-mail said "more details will follow from the campaign" early Thursday.

Several Republicans who are close to Allen or involved in a potential recount said privately that they doubted Allen could overcome Webb's lead, which stood at 13 times as large as George W. Bush's lead over Al Gore in Florida in 2000.

"I don't see the votes there," said one Washington Republican who has been advising Allen and spoke on condition of anonymity because he didn't want to undermine the senator's message. "It's like the old saying: 'If you're not the lead dog, the view doesn't change.' "

On Wednesday night, the Associated Press called the election for Webb, after the wire service contacted election officials in all of Virginia's 134 localities and said about half had completed their post-election canvass. The AP showed Webb beating Allen by 7,236 votes.

At Webb headquarters in Arlington, sleepy volunteers answered constantly ringing phones with a cheery new greeting: "Hello, Senator-elect Webb's office."

Still, teams of Democratic and Republican lawyers and volunteers traveled across Virginia to monitor the canvass, in which the preliminary tallies from Tuesday night are confirmed or adjusted over the next several days.

Jean Jensen, the secretary of the State Board of Elections, said the local boards would mail the final results to her by 5 p.m. Monday. There is not likely to be much significant movement in the vote totals until then, if at all. Jensen must officially certify the results by Nov. 27.

Aides said a weary Webb was spending time with his family and friends. Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner (D) spoke with reporters on Webb's behalf.

"I know that Senator-elect Webb is looking forward to joining Senator John Warner [R-Va.] and, I think, working on the issues he talked about in the campaign, ranging from how we deal with Iraq to economic fairness to trying to make sure we get our country fixed," Warner said. "I think he will be a great addition to the United States Senate."

Warner said Webb was moving forward as a newly elected senator, despite the fact that Allen had not conceded. "Our expectation is that this will continue to be a margin of thousands," Warner said.

Late Wednesday afternoon, Webb announced that his transition team would include state Del. A. Donald McEachin (D-Richmond); Owen Pickett, who represented the Hampton Roads area in Congress from 1987 to 2000; and Tom Lehner, who was chief of staff to former senator Charles S. Robb (D-Va.).

Within hours, Webb issued his first official statement, praising President Bush's decision to accept the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Webb's campaign platform included a new course in Iraq, but he had declined to call for Rumsfeld's firing.

"I am pleased that we will have a new secretary of defense, but I believe that the new Senate should be the body that examines Bob Gates' qualifications for confirmation," he said in a reference to Bush's choice to succeed Rumsfeld.

Gillespie declined to say whether he thought Webb's quick action was appropriate. "The fact is, we always knew this was going to be close," he said. "It's a closely divided commonwealth. We're not surprised by the outcome."

County election boards throughout the state began the canvass Wednesday, a procedure that state officials said is undertaken regardless of the margin of victory or the possibility of a recount.

In a stuffy third-floor conference room at the Fairfax County Government Center, 12 two-person teams started examining returns generated by 1,230 voting machines in the county's 225 precincts. The process is expected to take three days, and officials plan to certify the results and ship them to the state by Sunday.

"The canvass is not over until everything has been checked and double-checked," said Margaret Luca, secretary of the Fairfax Electoral Board.

Seated at four rows of desks, the canvassers examined piles of paper strips that looked like last week's grocery receipts -- printouts of vote totals from each machine.

They were checked against tallies kept in poll books, the computer printouts listing everyone registered in a given precinct, and a form called the official statement of results, which is filled out by the chief election officer at the end of the evening.

Statewide, things seemed to be moving along with only minor incidents. In the basement of the Prince William County courthouse, for example, election workers found that one precinct had underreported its Webb vote by 10.

Lawyers for both parties said those kinds of tiny changes would not alter the election's outcome. But Gillespie charged that the Allen campaign had received initial word of other, more serious problems, including broken-down voting machines, power outages and other irregularities.

He noted that a precinct in Stafford had overstated votes for Webb by about 1,300 votes Tuesday night. The error was corrected Wednesday morning, leaving Webb with his 7,300-vote lead. "It was me," said Stafford County Registrar Ray Davis, who acknowledged accidentally writing the wrong number onto his tally sheet. "I was fatigued. We didn't check the figures last night."

Jensen, a Democrat appointed by Warner, denied the Allen camp's claims of voting machine breakdowns and other serious problems, calling them routine Election Day glitches that were quickly resolved.

"I get a little concerned that they're exaggerating, when there were lawyers for both parties in my office all day and into the night," Jensen said. Reported problems ranged from sample ballots printed in the wrong color to scattered malfunctions of voting machines that were replaced with backups. "They all got fixed."

The last of the absentee votes was counted by Wednesday afternoon, Jensen said. The only community that still had not reported complete results by last night was Isle of Wight, a county on the James River in Tidewater where a voting machine froze and has not been able to print out the tallies. About 200 votes are outstanding, officials said.

Also outstanding are provisional ballots, which are given to voters whose names do not appear on voter rolls but who say they should. Such people are allowed to vote on a paper ballot, subject to later verification of their right to vote. In last year's governor's race, there were about 5,000 provisional ballots cast, but only 18 percent were confirmed, Gillespie said.

Jensen said she did not know how many provisional ballots had been cast on Tuesday.

Some alarmed observers called the Board of Elections late Wednesday to report that several counties suddenly showed new, unreported precincts. Jensen said the precincts were added in preparation for tallying provisional ballots.

But the frantic questions from the public highlighted the intensity and the stakes of the Virginia race. Asked how she would handle a possible recount in a race the country is watching closely, Jensen said, "Sure, I'm nervous." But she said last year's recount in the contest for attorney general would serve as a dry run.

"I'm nervous about dealing with all the lawyers," she said. "They will FOIA [submit Freedom of Information Act requests for] everything but the pictures on the wall. That will be the biggest challenge."

Webb Claims Victory, But Counting Continues In Va. (USAT)

By Mimi Hall And Laura Parker

USA Today, November 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. — Democrat Jim Webb laid claim to a Virginia Senate seat Wednesday, but Republican Sen. George Allen refused to yield as elections workers across the state double-checked returns in a razor-close election.

The Associated Press declared Webb the winner late Wednesday after canvassing elections officials statewide. That result would leave Democrats with control of the Senate — and therefore the entire Congress. If Allen prevailed in a vote challenge, the houses would be split between the parties.

Both candidates kept quiet Wednesday after an emotional and frustrating election night that saw them trading miniscule leads hour-by-hour. Webb inched ahead at the very end, culminating a sometimes vicious campaign marked by character attacks and negative ads.

On Wednesday morning, Allen's supporters were quick to point out that Webb had an exceptionally thin lead — the Associated Press reported 7,236 votes separated the two out of 2.3 million cast, just three-tenths of 1%. Unofficial tallies on the Commonwealth of Virginia's website indicated late Tuesday that roughly 5% of precincts hadn't yet reported.

Michael Traugott, a University of Michigan political science professor who worked for the now-defunct Voter News Service, pointed out that the AP relied on actual votes for its call, not exit polls. That, he said, is reassuring.

But Traugott said he is concerned that about half the localities contacted by the AP had not completed their canvassing. He said the political leanings of those localities are crucial in determining whether the call for Webb was a smart one.

Former Virginia governor Mark Warner, a Democrat, declared that Webb "will be a great addition to the United States Senate."

And in a page from President Bush's political playbook from the contested 2000 election, Webb took steps to try to seize victory before it had been officially declared. Early in the day Wednesday he named three members of his transition team, and his campaign headquarters staff started referring to him as "Senator-elect."

Even after the Associated Press called the race in Webb's favor, Allen said he wouldn't back down until a canvassing effort by state officials was over.

"At the conclusion of those efforts, Senator George Allen plans to make a statement regarding the outcome," read a statement released by the Allen campaign.

Allen adviser Ed Gillespie said Allen picked up nearly 1,500 votes that had inadvertently been awarded to Webb in one county.

Allen's "mood is realistic," Gillespie said of the one-term senator who saw a solid lead evaporate in August amid charges of racism. But "obviously when you're operating with a margin of three-tenths of 1%, there's reason for hope."

Once the canvassing operation is complete, the state's elections board will prepare to meet on Nov. 27 to certify the election. Only after that can the presumed loser request a recount.

Gillespie wouldn't say whether Allen would demand a recount.

"It's conceivable to me that on Nov. 27, you'll be asking Mr. Webb whether he will be seeking a recount," he said.

No candidate who has gone into a statewide recount ahead by several thousand votes has ever come out on the losing end when it was over, Warner said.

In Virginia Race, 'Gail For Rail' May Be A Spoiler Candidate Says She Offered To Endorse Webb, Allen; 26,000 Votes Went Green (WSJ)

By JUNE KRONHOLZ And AMY SCHATZ

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Gail Parker may have helped decide which of two Virginia gentlemen goes to Washington, which goes home and who controls the U.S. Senate.

Two weeks ago, Ms. Parker, a 59-year-old Independent Green Party of Virginia candidate, says she offered to swing her support in the Virginia Senate race to either the Democratic or Republican candidate. In return, she wanted them to back her pet issue: high-speed rail across the traffic-clogged state.

"I was willing to endorse the candidate who would earn it the old-fashioned way," says Ms. Parker.

But neither man was much interested in her offer, she says. Now it looks like her "Gail for Rail" campaign could have been a factor in deciding which party controls the U.S. Senate.

On Tuesday, Ms. Parker collected about 26,000 votes -- which could have given either Republican Sen. George Allen or Democratic challenger Jim Webb a decisive victory.

As it is, Mr. Webb seems set to replace Mr. Allen after taking a lead of just 7,000 or so votes. With most precincts reporting, Mr. Webb led Mr. Allen with a vote of 1,173,805 to 1,166,488, and the Associated Press last night declared Mr. Webb the winner, based on its survey and analysis of votes counted and ballots remaining. A Webb victory would give Democrats control of the Senate.

Mr. Allen refused to concede yesterday and said he would wait for a full review of the vote, but it didn't seem likely that the totals could change significantly. Absentee ballots have already been counted. That leaves in doubt only the provisional ballots -- that is, those cast by voters who, for one reason or another, may not be eligible to vote.

Such votes are collected locally, so there was no way to know yesterday how many are outstanding. In the 2004 presidential election, the Virginia state elections board says, 4,000 provisional ballots were cast, and only 700 accepted -- not enough to overcome Mr. Webb's lead.

Ms. Parker acknowledged from the beginning that her campaign lacked the steam to win, but says she hoped it would work up enough noise about rail travel to prompt the two leading candidates to pledge support.

Transportation is a hot topic in Virginia, where rapid growth has left taxpayers sitting in traffic. The Census Bureau says the typical Northern Virginia commute is at least a half hour. Virginia's budget for rail transport is $23 million a year.

Since January, Ms. Parker, a retired Air Force Reserves major, says she has logged more than 40,000 miles campaigning around the state in her gray Volkswagen Jetta. She had no paid staffers and personally collected 8,000 of the 10,000 signatures that she needed to get on the ballot.

She says she raised just $1,200 in donations and according to a Federal Election Commission report, she financed much of her campaign through an $18,472 personal loan. "Maybe I should have spent more time trying to raise money," she said yesterday.

Ms. Parker, who ran unsuccessfully for the Virginia General Assembly last year, says she ran a few radio ads during her Senate bid, but mostly campaigned by greeting voters personally. She printed her pamphlets at Staples and ran the campaign from her Alexandria condo. Her campaign photo was taken last December at Glamour Shots, a mall photo studio that specializes in soft-focus, windswept portraits. Even before the last votes were counted yesterday, Ms. Parker and her Jetta had left the state to visit her daughter in Oklahoma.

"Our campaign was about faith, about family and about being fiscally conservative. I have faith we can balance the budget and also build high-speed rail in Virginia," she said in an interview, staying on message even after the campaign had ended.

The Webb campaign says it did try negotiating with Ms. Parker but came to the conclusion she wasn't seriously interested in endorsing him. "There never seemed to be any clear intent on her part to endorse," says Webb campaign spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. She says that Mr. Webb is in favor of finding ways to improve the state's traffic congestion and "obviously, he respects [Ms. Parker's] opinion on the matter and her passion for the issue."

Calls to Mr. Allen's campaign, press and Senate offices weren't returned.

Ms. Parker attended Mr. Webb's pre-election rally Monday in Roanoke in a subtle show of support, she says, but didn't endorse him. She bristles at suggestions that her quixotic campaign might help decide control of the Senate. "This is politics," she says. "This country is about discussing issues and informing voters."

Ralph Nader, whose own third-party candidacy in 2000 is thought by some commentators to have helped swing that race to President Bush, agrees with her.

"Everyone has an equal right to run," he says. "Obviously, Webb and Allen took a lot more votes from her than she took from them."

Ms. Parker's votes represent 1% of the state's total.

The congressional elections' most successful independent candidates were Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman and Vermont's Bernie Sanders. An Illinois Green Party candidate, Rich Whitney, also turned in a respectable performance with 342,000 votes, or 10% of the state's total. Maryland Green Party candidate, Kevin Zeese, director of a national antiwar group, collected 2% of the state's vote.

Mr. Allen's chances of overturning his apparent loss seem unlikely. In Virginia, a recount "is largely about checking the math," says James Alcorn, a lawyer with the Virginia State Board of Elections.

Voters in much of the state used touch-screen voting machines, which record votes on memory cards with a backup count on an internal memory. The state's 2006 election law says that in a recount, the vote totals from the memory cards are to be looked at again to make sure they were read correctly the first time.

The memory cards in each machine record an image or "screen shot" of each ballot. But there's no provision in the law for looking at the image during a recount. And in any event, only the machine makers could do that because they have kept access to their software a trade secret.

Challenges based on the state's voting equipment also seem fairly remote. Mr. Webb's last name didn't appear on the summary page of many voting machines -- a glitch that brought howls from his campaign before the election. But at least initially, Mr. Allen seems to have faced no similar disadvantage that might be the basis for a challenge.

Ms. Parker says she plans to write thank-you notes to supporters when she returns from Oklahoma and will run for office again -- although she's not sure for what job. "Politics in Virginia is a noble pursuit," she says.

Elections Help Sort Out Playing Field For 2008 (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — The elections this week transformed not only Congress but the playing field for the 2008 presidential race. Some contenders self-destructed, one went home and a meteor streaked onto the radar in the form of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

There were two things, however, that didn't change: the contenders leading the polls on both sides.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., won a resounding re-election victory after raising nearly $40 million — more than any other Senate candidate this year. She isn't yet talking about her future, which is widely presumed to include a presidential bid but could involve a leadership role in a possibly Democratic Senate.

Some analysts praise her campaign skills but say they wouldn't be surprised if she chooses the latter, given the difficulties of a White House run. “She comes with baggage that no other candidate has and the ability to mobilize Republicans against her that none of the other Democrats can match,” says Peverill Squire, a political scientist at the University of Iowa.

The Republican front-runner, Arizona Sen. John McCain, campaigned and raised money for candidates nationwide while also building a network for his White House bid. Though supportive of President Bush on Iraq, his disagreements with Bush about immigration policy, prisoner abuse and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's performance kept his maverick image alive.

While former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani also does well in polls and barnstormed the country, “right now it's hard to see another Republican who has similar stature” to McCain, Squire says.

A lesser known Democratic hopeful, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, is forming a presidential campaign committee today, the Des Moines Register reported, making him first into the race on either side. “He wanted to make sure we had a good result in Iowa before taking the official step,” Vilsack aide Jeff Link told the paper. Democrats took over the Iowa Legislature and Democrat Chet Culver was elected to succeed Vilsack.

One Republican who had laid foundations for a national campaign now faces political oblivion: Virginia Sen. George Allen, whom the Associated Press declared the loser Wednesday in his re-election race against Democrat Jim Webb, based on a canvass of election officials. Allen's candidacy unraveled after he called an Indian-American “macaca,” triggering examinations of his racial views, and reacted with anger and bad jokes to questions about his mother's newly revealed Jewish roots.

Another politician who pushed the self-destruct button: Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry. His remark appearing to denigrate the education level of troops in Iraq, which he called a bungled joke, reminded Democrats of Kerry's shortcomings as their 2004 nominee. The Iraq comment was “the final straw” for some, says Dean Spiliotes, a political scientist at Saint Anselm College in Manchester, N.H.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who is going home to Tennessee in January to ponder a GOP presidential run, presided over a loss of seats and controversies such as congressional intervention in end-of-life decisions for Terri Schiavo, the Florida woman in a vegetative state. Frist's association with Bush and his performance as leader also could hurt him. “He handled the job badly,” Squire says.

Republicans lost governorships under Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's leadership of the Republican Governors Association. At home, Romney is being succeeded by a Democrat, Deval Patrick.

Two red-state Democrats, former North Carolina senator John Edwards and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, solidified their standing in ways that may pay off later.

Edwards fought for minimum-wage hikes and strengthened ties with labor. Bayh helped Indiana Democrats oust three House Republicans and helped Democrats capture the legislature in Iowa, a key primary-season state.

DOJ_NMG_0092156

Illinois' Obama, who is half Kansan and half Kenyan, generated big crowds even as his short résumé raised questions.

If the freshman senator decides to proceed, says Squire, "he's going to find out that it's a tough business. He's had the fun part already, and the painful part is coming up."

Outcome Shakes Up '08 Calculus For McCain, Clinton And Others (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Tuesday's election earthquake is recasting the 2008 campaign landscape, leaving both parties' early presidential front-runners on firmer ground while exposing fault lines that could upend their campaigns.

The power shift that gave Democrats control of the House of Representatives and possibly the Senate was a clear call by voters for new -- and bipartisan -- approaches on issues ranging from the Iraq war to fiscal discipline to ethics in government. That realignment could open the door to candidates who are independent, unorthodox or have a history of working across party lines.

Sen. John McCain, an early Republican favorite, proved more popular on the stump with his party's candidates than President Bush did -- newly-elected Republican Gov. Charlie Crist skipped a last-minute rally in Florida with the president to tour that state with the Arizona lawmaker. Mr. McCain also raised millions of dollars for his colleagues. But his advocacy for continuing the Iraq campaign -- and perhaps sending in more troops -- sharply conflicts with the antiwar message sent by voters this week.

Democratic Sen. Hillary Clinton was also a popular fundraiser on the campaign stump, and she transferred millions of dollars from her bulging campaign account to candidates and party committees to help the Democratic team. She was re-elected in New York by a landslide, with 67% of the vote -- including support from 20% of Republicans and 25% of conservatives, demonstrating a potential for broad appeal. But the sudden rise of Illinois Democratic Sen. Barack Obama threatens her superstar status and could produce a formidable primary challenger for the nomination. And she too has some baggage from her vote to authorize the Iraq invasion.

The 2008 presidential campaign landscape was changed in other substantial ways by this week's midterm elections. Voters showed impatience with partisanship, negative attacks and corruption, which ranked in exit polls on a par with Iraq among voters. Nearly every candidate tainted by scandal was vanquished by voters bent on sending Washington a message and cleaning house.

Indeed, the results could be seen as an opening for a third-party presidential campaign, and one politician who has generated considerable speculation about his intentions is New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg. The Republican mayor of a majority Democratic city is a social moderate and a fiscal conservative, who is seen as having a successful record of management and coalition-building. And he has a large personal fortune to underwrite a campaign.

The internal forces in the Democratic and Republican parties were also shaken up by the campaign. Democratic presidential primaries tend to force candidates to cater to the liberal base, but the party won big Tuesday in part by recruiting more-conservative candidates. And party leaders think the election gives them an opening to build stronger links with the white and Hispanic voters who backed their candidates in greater numbers in this election.

The Republican coalition appears to be fracturing, with social conservatives possibly weakened. Indeed, the two leading social-conservative candidates in the Republicans' presidential-contender roster -- Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and Virginia Sen. George Allen -- were knocked out of the running. Mr. Santorum was defeated; Mr. Allen is trailing and the Associated Press last night predicted from returns that he had lost, even though he has yet to concede. "The picture is pretty obscure for '08 from our perspective," said Tom Minnery, an aide to Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson, a leading voice in the party's social-conservative wing.

Mr. Allen's diminished standing also removes the favorite candidate of many fiscal conservatives. He is one of only two senators endorsed by Club for Growth, an activist Republican antitax group. "We're waiting" to see a new candidate emerge, says Pat Toomey, the club's president. Mr. McCain, who initially opposed the Bush tax cuts, is deemed insufficiently reliable.

Mr. Toomey said his wing of the party is still reviewing the record of Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who also impressed party activists with his midterm campaigning. They remain skeptical that a law adopted on Mr. Romney's watch penalizing businesses that don't provide health-care coverage will meet their standards.

To fill those holes, social conservatives began taking another look at Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, both of whom would have to drastically ratchet up their presidential-campaign machinery to become competitive. On the fiscal side, activists may try to recruit South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, who was re-elected on Tuesday and hails from a state in the party's early primary lineup.

The election fallout also could encourage a long-shot candidate such as former House Speaker Newt Gingrich to jump into the race. On the flip side, the diminished influence of the religious right on the midterms could buoy the camp of moderate former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, another sought-after personality this cycle.

The Democrats' candidate roster was also rearranged some.

An eleventh-hour gaffe by Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry hurt his positioning as the alternative to Sen. Clinton. In a campaign rally, Mr. Kerry seemed to suggest the soldiers in Iraq are uneducated. Conservatives and the White House seized on the comment, which the senator said was actually a botched joke about the brainpower of President Bush. Still, he was forced to apologize and his party was knocked off its message in the critical final week of the campaign.

"John Kerry was scoring a lot of points in New Hampshire," says party activist Jim Demers. "He was helping out candidates and doing very well. His statement just sent shockwaves through the party."

The Democrats also are without a high-profile antiwar candidate who could harness the activist and voter support for that position evident in the campaigns. North Carolina's John Edwards could be best positioned to do that. He has forthrightly said his vote authorizing the war was a mistake and he was a popular fund-raising headliner throughout the midterm campaign.

Mr. Obama could also try to woo that constituency. He wasn't in the Senate at the time of the war vote. Bob Borosage, co-director of the Campaign for America's Future, a liberal activist group, said Mr. Obama had his members "eating out of his hand" during one recent appearance, but the senator gave little hint of his ideas on Iraq. "Once he starts taking positions, it might get more difficult," Mr. Borosage said.

A string of Democratic gubernatorial victories in the Midwest could provide a Democratic nominee with strong allies and networks in Republican strongholds. The most notable victory was in Ohio, a state Mr. Bush won by a tiny margin in 2004.

Democrat Eliot Spitzer's victory in New York is likely to help boost the party's coffers, Republican finance experts concede. That could be critical because political-money experts are predicting that serious contenders are expected to have raised $100 million by the end of next year -- nearly $10 million a month. The reason for the escalating cost is that no serious candidate is expected to sign up for matching public dollars, which are given to candidates who agree to limit their spending.

The rise of a Democratic-controlled Congress also means the debate over dominant issues such as Iraq will necessarily change. John Samples, an analyst at the libertarian-leaning CATO Institute, said Republicans may be more anxious to find a way to resolve the Iraq situation "so they don't have to go through this again in 2008, so they can take it off the table."

Iraq makes the campaign tricky for both Mr. McCain and Ms. Clinton. In 2004, Mr. McCain appeared with Mr. Bush on the campaign trail, lending his considerable credibility on war issues to the Iraq mission. This cycle, the former Navy officer and Vietnam War prisoner did so again on behalf of fellow Republican incumbents.

Tuesday night, Mr. McCain acknowledged the antiwar sentiment evident in the returns and said he shared voters' "frustration." But Mark McKinnon, a leading adviser to the Bush-Cheney campaigns, said it is unlikely Mr. McCain will drastically shift his call for continued involvement in Iraq.

"He's not taking a popular position on it, which is typical of McCain," Mr. McKinnon said.

Ms. Clinton, who has become a vocal critic of the White House's management of Iraq, could also face pressure to adjust her stance. "Someone in the Democratic Party is going to have to take the lead in changing the policy if they are going to be perceived as acceptable leader on the issue," said Mr. Demers, the party activist.

In Victory For Stocks, Dow Posts Another Record By KAREN RICHARDSON (WSJ)

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, shaking off early postelection declines, rallied to a record close following the news of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation.

Stocks initially traded lower -- particularly health-care-related shares -- as investors weighed the impact and remaining uncertainty surrounding the results of the midterm elections. But the momentum reversed to the upside after the first headlines about the resignation of Mr. Rumsfeld, who has come in for criticism for his handling of the war in Iraq; after a pause, stocks rose again after President Bush's subsequent news conference discussing the election and pledging to work with the new Congress.

The Dow, down nearly 55 points before the news developments, erased that loss and more, closing up 19.77 points, or 0.2%, to 12176.54 -- handily beating its previous record, set Oct. 26. It is up nearly 14% this year. Dow components American Express, Boeing and DuPont each rose more than 1%.

The S&P 500 edged up 2.88 points, or 0.2%, to 1385.72, up 11% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 9.06 points, or 0.4%, to 2384.94, up 8.1% this year.

"The fact that a new secretary of defense could help bring the war to some kind of resolution opens the door for change," said Larry Peruzzi, stock trader at Boston Company Asset Management. "Even more than the economy, the war and the housing sector are the biggest negatives for the Republicans."

News of the sweeping Democratic congressional victories had an effect in many corners of the market. SLM, a firm better known as Sallie Mae that facilitates loans between borrowers and student-loan providers, sank 4.8% to $47.21 as investors worried that a Congress controlled by Democrats might reduce student-loan interest rates and cut out middlemen like SLM.

Health-care and pharmaceutical stocks also took a hit over jitters that the Democrats would keep their vow to cut drug costs in federal health plans. Pfizer sank 1.6%, Eli Lilly fell 0.9%, and Johnson & Johnson fell 1.1%. Merck stock slid 3.4%, but was also weighed down by its disclosure of tax disputes involving billions of dollars.

Investors bid up some alternative-energy and biotechnology stocks they expected would benefit from Democratic support. VeraSun Energy, which produces and markets ethanol, rose 9%, while StemCells, a microcap firm that specializes in stem-cell research, gained 10%. Some Dow energy companies also rallied, such as power-generator AES, Duke Energy, FirstEnergy, PG&E and TXU.

The day's stock movements aren't likely to be sustained over the longer term, since the new legislation and regulations investors are anticipating to affect certain stocks and sectors could take far longer than expected.

"Generally, it's been a classic knee-jerk, postelection reaction," said Ken Fisher, chief executive of Fisher Investments, which manages about $30 billion. "We've moved out of a period of extreme political hostility into a short-term afterglow."

DOJ_NMG_0092159

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, not including the U.S., rose 1.37 points, or 0.59%, to 230.80.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were up. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.86 billion shares, as 2,082 issues advanced and 1,201 declined.

Bond prices rose. The 10-year Treasury note gained 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.639%. The 30-year bond rose 13/32 to yield 4.731%.

The dollar strengthened. In late New York trading, the currency rose to 117.80 yen, from 117.70, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2760 from $1.2771.

Gridlock Not Good For Stocks After All? (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, November 9, 2006

NEW YORK — The rallying cry on Wall Street after the Democrats' power grab is that political gridlock caused by divided government is good for financial markets.

Stock market action Wednesday supported that line of thinking. In the first day of trading after the Democrats regained control of at least one branch of Congress, the Dow Jones industrial average rose 20 points and finished with a record closing high of 12,176.54.

But some Wall Street economists and investment strategists contend that two years of potential legislative inertia might not be the best thing for financial markets in the long run. In a report titled "Wrong Time for Gridlock," for example, Stephen Roach, chief economist at Morgan Stanley, says the U.S. can't afford not to tackle pressing economic concerns, the major one being the bulging budget deficit.

"It is just smug to say that no action is good news," Roach says. "We have major issues on the agenda, and we can't afford to have Washington asleep at the switch."

Conventional wisdom on Wall Street says it is unlikely that any major legislation would get passed in the next two years, given the Democrats' slim majority in Congress and the ability of President Bush to veto any bills he does not favor. As a result, the status quo would be maintained, reducing the threat to the investor community as well as specific stocks or industry sectors that could be adversely affected by new laws that take a bite out of profit.

For example, there is little chance that Democrats will be successful in boosting the investor-friendly tax rates on dividends and capital gains that are set to expire in 2010. It also means Democrats would have difficulty pushing through a bill that would allow the government to negotiate Medicaid drug prices with pharmaceutical companies or slapping a windfall profits tax on big oil companies.

"This election doesn't mean much," says Greg Valliere, chief political strategist at Stanford Washington Research Group. "Congress is still basically tied, and Bush has a veto. The big change would come in the 2008 presidential election."

Two years of uncertainty and gridlock would "come with a price," says Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America. Key risks to markets — the Iraq war, the possibility that foreign investors will reduce their holdings in U.S. securities, a looming health care crisis and our dependence on foreign oil — all require the attention of Washington now, he says.

If these challenges are not addressed soon, Quinlan adds, it "will come back to haunt the U.S. financial markets at some point."

McCain Quits Post At College For The Deaf (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 (AP) — Senator John McCain has resigned from the board of trustees of Gallaudet University, the world's premier university for the deaf, after disagreeing with its decision to revoke the appointment of its incoming president, a university spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0092160

The chairwoman of the Gallaudet University board, Brenda Jo Brueggemann, has also resigned, the spokeswoman, Mercy Coogan, said.

Mr. McCain, an Arizona Republican, wrote to outgoing President I. King Jordan on Monday, describing the board's decision as unfair, Ms. Coogan said.

The Washington Post reported Wednesday that Ms. Brueggemann, a professor at Ohio State University, resigned and that she said in an e-mail message that she had thought about quitting since Oct. 29, when the board voted to revoke the appointment of the president, Jane K. Fernandes, after a month of demonstrations and hunger strikes by students.

Ms. Brueggemann, who had supported Ms. Fernandes, wrote in a message posted Wednesday on the university's Web site that her personal life and work had suffered since May, when she became the board's chairwoman. She took the job after the interim board chairwoman, Celia May Baldwin, resigned after protests over Ms. Fernandes's appointment in May.

Students and faculty members had criticized Ms. Fernandes, saying she was autocratic and unable to tackle some of the university's long-term problems as provost.

Ms. Fernandes, 50, has said she became a lightning rod for those frustrated about changes in deaf culture. She had spoken about expanding Gallaudet, known for its expertise in and adherence to American Sign Language, to all kinds of deaf people — those with cochlear implants, those who speak and those who do not sign very well.

But some students were worried about preserving sign language and perhaps being left behind if other forms of communication became more prevalent on campus.

The board is scheduled to meet Saturday on campus to discuss the process of choosing an interim president.

'A Better Way' (WP)

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

IT IS TOO BAD that Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr.'s concession speech in his failed Democratic bid for the U.S. Senate came at an hour when most people had gone to bed. Not only was he gracious, but Mr. Ford delivered an important plea for a bettering of the American political process:

"What people want more than anything, and what I heard and I know candidates all around the country heard . . . [was] a hunger, and they sensed a great appetite on the part of the American people for something much better and far more dignified and greater than what we'd given them."

Mr. Ford knows firsthand -- to use his phrase -- how "demeaning and debasing" politics can be, having been the target of a scurrilous ad in which a suggestively dressed white woman is seen coming on to him. Mr. Ford is black. Unfortunately, that ad was not an aberration but rather an embodiment of the seedy standards that infected this political year.

Consider the Election Day disgrace of Maryland's top two elected officials sanctioning the use of a clearly false campaign flier and then compounding the insult to the targeted Prince George's County audience by using out-of-state homeless people to distribute the material. Or Sen. George Allen's misuse of fictional writings to impugn the character of his Democratic opponent in Virginia. There also has been the introduction of sleazy new practices such as robo-calls designed to annoy and deceive voters and a greater use of push polls aimed at spreading inaccurate information about candidates.

Politics is rough and tumble, and negative campaigning has always had a place in American campaigns. But, as The Post's Michael Grunwald recently reported, an ugly low was established this year, partly because candidates could pretend they had nothing to do with the more disgraceful practices financed through independent expenditures by national parties and other groups. The worst offenders this year were Republicans, but that probably was because they were the ones on the defensive.

Once the votes are counted, memories fade -- until the next election cycle. Mr. Ford laid out a challenge to both the winners and the losers to figure out "a better way." That's not a bad start for a Democratic agenda.

Russia Rejects European Iran Sanctions (AP)

By Henry Meyer

AP, November 9, 2006

Russia has rejected European-proposed U.N. sanctions aimed at forcing Iran to halt its suspected nuclear weapons drive, but Moscow appears to be applying its own pressure by threatening to delay a key nuclear power project.

DOJ_NMG_0092161

Analysts say the Kremlin is determined not to push Iran into a corner like North Korea — blaming tough U.S. policies for Pyongyang's recent nuclear test — but Tehran's refusal to compromise has led to growing impatience in Moscow despite the two countries' close commercial ties.

"President Putin is angry at (Iranian President Mahmoud) Ahmadinejad but he understands that it's probably too late to do anything now," said Georgy Mirsky, chief researcher at the Institute for World Economics and International Relations in Moscow.

A planned visit to Moscow by Iran's Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki was abruptly postponed on Wednesday, a move seen as a diplomatic snub reflecting Iranian annoyance at Russian hints of a delay to the construction of the country's first nuclear power station.

However, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said later Wednesday that he will visit Russia in a day or two, describing Russia's position on the proposed sanctions as "logical and principled." He did not say with whom he would hold talks in Moscow.

In a speech to supporters in northern Iran, meanwhile, supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei remained defiant, saying his country would continue to acquire nuclear technology.

"The Americans open their mouth and close their eyes and say whatever they want, such as 'the world opposes enrichment,'" Khamenei said, referring to Iran's enrichment of uranium, which the United Nations has said must cease.

"In a glorious way, the Iranian nation — with awareness, an informed generation and reason — has challenged Western fabrications and will go ahead strongly," Khamenei added in his address to thousands in Semnan, 155 miles east of Tehran.

Experts say Moscow could be using its $1 billion contract to build the plant in the southern city of Bushehr as a lever of pressure on Tehran.

"Russia is not ready to support fully-fledged sanctions against Iran but it is looking for ways to persuade the Iranians to be more transparent in their nuclear research activities," said Anton Khlopkov, deputy director of the Moscow-based PIR Center, which specializes in nonproliferation.

Russia, which along with China has veto power as a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, has been the main obstacle to efforts by Western nations to punish Iran for its refusal to halt sensitive uranium enrichment activity.

Moscow has crossed out large sections of a U.S.-backed U.N. Security Council draft resolution proposing broad sanctions on Tehran's nuclear and missile programs, according to a document obtained by The Associated Press.

Russia's changes would weaken demands that Tehran stop working on a separate reactor that can produce plutonium and that Iran allow tougher U.N. inspections of its nuclear program. They also would delete any reference to Iran's Bushehr nuclear plant, said U.N. diplomats in Vienna, Austria, who demanded anonymity because the Russian amendments had not been officially announced.

The announcement that Mottaki's trip was postponed came after a senior Russian nuclear official said Wednesday that Russia would shortly review the timetable for completing construction of Bushehr, which already has been repeatedly delayed.

Sergei Shmatko, head of Russian state company Atomstroiexport, which is in charge of the project, said that work so far was on schedule.

He added, however, that an assessment of the targets for Bushehr to be conducted later this month "will determine the final timetable for its launch," according to the ITAR-Tass news agency.

In September, Russia agreed to ship fuel to Bushehr by March 2007 and launch the facility in September. Fuel from the plant potentially could be diverted and used to produce bombs. Iran claims its nuclear program is peaceful.

But on Tuesday an unidentified Russian nuclear industry official was quoted as saying by Russian news agencies that Russia could postpone the timetable if Iran fails to meet commitments that were not specified. According to ITAR-Tass, the official said one of the problems is that Iran has not adhered to a payment schedule.

Russia Proposes Weakened Iran Sanctions (AP)

Russia has crossed out large sections of a U.N. Security Council draft proposing broad U.S.-backed sanctions on Tehran's nuclear and missile programs, according to a document obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press.

The paper outlines Moscow's proposed amendments to a Security Council draft resolution drawn up by Britain and France and broadly endorsed by the United States. Russia's changes weaken the draft resolution's demands that Tehran stop working on a reactor that can produce plutonium and that Iran allow tougher U.N. inspections of its nuclear program. They also delete any reference to Iran's Bushehr nuclear plant, which Russia is helping build.

In a draft presented earlier this month, the United States reluctantly agreed to European proposals to exempt Bushehr from sanctions, in attempts to placate Moscow and gain its support for sanctions meant to punish Tehran's refusal to freeze uranium enrichment.

But U.N. diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the Russian amendments had not been officially announced, said the Kremlin wanted no mention whatsoever of Bushehr. That stance was meant to reflect Russia's view that the plant should not be linked to international concerns that Tehran might be trying to develop nuclear arms.

Much of Moscow's 11-page document consists of passages in the original Western draft struck through by Russian negotiators, reflecting Moscow's insistence on reducing sanctions to the minimum needed to directly target enrichment, which can generate both nuclear energy or be used to make the fissile core of warheads.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said he did not want to discuss specifics of the dispute but told reporters: "There are a lot of differences, no doubt about it."

"Obviously we've got to get some direction from capitals, given the disparity," he said, adding that the five permanent U.N. Security Council members — the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France — planned another meeting later in the week.

Other senior Security Council diplomats also acknowledged the divide.

"Clearly, I think in a number of difficult areas the differences cannot be bridged, so I believe there should be more reflections in the capitals," China's Ambassador Wang Guangya said Tuesday.

In contrast to the Russian amendments, the European draft resolution orders all countries to ban the supply of material and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs and to impose a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in those programs.

It would exempt from restrictions the initial nuclear power plant being built by the Russians at Bushehr but not the nuclear fuel needed for the reactor. It also would limit assistance to Iran by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, to food, agriculture, medical and humanitarian programs. And it would ban countries from teaching or training Iranians in disciplines that would contribute to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

Sharpening the dispute with Russia, the United States has proposed amendments that would strengthen the measures proposed by Britain and France.

In September, Russia agreed to ship fuel to Bushehr by March 2007, adding to concerns of the U.S. and others over Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

Moscow's draft also was lenient on Arak, an Iranian heavy water research reactor scheduled for completion in 2009.

One of the byproducts of heavy-water reactors is plutonium, which can be used in building nuclear weapons. In the Western draft, the council "decides that Iran shall suspend work" on the Arak facility. The Russian version instead "calls upon Iran to reconsider" its construction.

Similarly, while the Western draft "decides ... that Iran shall without delay" implement its Additional Protocol with the IAEA, the Russian version only "urges" Iran to implement the agreement that would allow the International Atomic Energy Agency to more thoroughly probe Tehran's nuclear program.

Israeli Shelling Kills 18 Gazans; Anger Boils Up (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Steven Erlanger

DOJ_NMG_0092163

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

BEIT HANUN, Gaza Strip, Nov. 8 — Israeli tank shells killed 18 Palestinians, including 8 children and 6 women, at a cluster of houses here on Wednesday, one of the largest single losses of life in Gaza in years.

Some Hamas leaders called for a suicide-bombing retaliation inside Israel and, unusually, for the United States to be taught "hard lessons" as well.

"Nothing happened," mumbled Isra Athamnah, 5 years old, who was pocked with shrapnel and in shock. The news that her widowed mother, Sanaa, 35, was dead and that she was now an orphan did not sink in.

Others described how a tank shell had hit a home here in northern Gaza, sending members of the extended Athamnah family outside before dawn. The next volleys struck them as they crowded in a narrow alley between the houses. The dead ranged from less than a year old to 70 years old, witnesses said.

Israeli leaders expressed regret. They have been on the defensive over their performance in the war against Hezbollah in Lebanon and the more than 300 Palestinians killed in operations in Gaza since the summer.

Defense Minister Amir Peretz ordered a halt to artillery attacks in the densely populated Gaza Strip, which are intended to prevent Palestinians from launching rockets into nearby Israeli cities, and an immediate investigation. Initial findings suggested a misfire, the commander of the south, Gen. Yoav Galant, told Israel's Channel 2 television.

After largely observing a unilateral truce that it declared a year and a half ago, Hamas called for renewed suicide bombings. Khaled Meshal, the leader of Hamas's political bureau exiled in Syria, said Hamas would answer the deaths with "deeds, not words."

Hamas's military wing also said in a statement that the United States should be taught "hard lessons" for supporting Israel. The threat, though vague, was an unusual escalation for Hamas, an Islamic-based militant group that has pointedly portrayed its fight as being against Israel alone. It was immediately disavowed by Ghazi Hamad, the spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government in Gaza.

The Israelis had just pulled out of Beit Hanun on Tuesday morning after a six-day operation in which they effectively occupied the town and fought battles with militants, many of them from Hamas. At least 52 Palestinians were killed, some 22 of them believed to be civilians, and one Israeli soldier was killed in the operation, which was aimed at stopping Palestinian rocket fire into Israel.

Nonetheless on Wednesday, according to the army, 13 rockets were fired into Israel.

The Israeli military said it had launched a preventive artillery barrage in response to about 10 rockets fired in the previous 24 hours.

This is not the first time Israeli shelling has gone awry, hitting houses in Beit Hanun and nearby Beit Lahiya. And it is not the first time that errant rounds have led to a halt or delay in efforts to find new paths of dialogue between Israel and the Palestinians, and among the Palestinian factions themselves.

The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, and Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, both of whom gave blood for the victims and visited them in hospitals, have been engaged in two days of supposedly climactic talks on a government to replace the one run by Hamas, which is isolated internationally.

The intention is to have a government of "national unity," made up of experts and technocrats approved by the various parties, in the hope that Western aid and Palestinian tax money will again begin to flow. The Palestinian Authority has been unable to pay full salaries for nine months.

The idea was also to have the new government release an Israeli soldier captured on June 25, which would prompt Israel to free hundreds of Palestinian prisoners and to arrange a long-delayed meeting between Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

But this latest shelling, on top of the Beit Hanun operation, which Mr. Abbas and Mr. Haniya had already called a "massacre," caused Mr. Haniya to request a pause in the talks for three days of mourning.

In June, a similar cycle followed another apparently errant Israeli shell that killed Palestinian civilians, including seven members of a single family, the Ghaliyas, who were enjoying a day at the beach. The Israelis said they were shelling areas where rocket teams had fired into Israel, and denied that the shell that killed the Ghaliyas was theirs.

But no Palestinian believed the Israeli denial, there was never any conclusive alternative explanation and the military wing of Hamas announced that it was ending the cease-fire against Israel. The Hamas government belatedly went along, and Hamas started firing rockets again toward Israel, instead of simply supplying them to others.

More important, the Hamas military wing took part in the capture of the Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, later in June, setting off the political crisis that surrounded — and has outlasted — Israel's summertime war against Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Only days before the June shelling, Mr. Abbas and Mr. Olmert met together informally in Petra, Jordan, and promised to have a formal meeting within two weeks, actually setting a date for June 28, to begin their relationship afresh. Mr. Olmert promised Mr. Abbas to release 600 prisoners then. But with the capture of Corporal Shalit, the Hamas government found itself unable to repudiate the actions of its own military wing, apparently directed from Syria by Mr. Meshal.

Hamas later said it would reinstate the truce with Israel, but it might now break it again, and more decisively, because its experiment in government appeared to be foundering.

"I don't believe in the rockets, but their reactions cannot be justified," Mr. Abbas said of the Israelis. "We totally condem n the international silence and any acts that can be used as justification for the Israeli massacres."

Leaders at the United Nations and the European Union, and in Russia, Britain and Italy, did condemn the incident. "It is hard to see what this action was meant to achieve and how it can be justified," said the British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett.

Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the White House National Security Council, called for restraint by all parties, adding: "We deeply regret the injuries and loss of life in Gaza today. We have seen the Israeli government's apology and hope their investigation will be completed quickly."

A similar statement was issued in President Bush's name.

Witnesses said the shelling began about 5:30 a.m. Ali Athamnah, 29, a doctor, said he heard the crash of a shell, then glass from a window spattered on his face. He looked down from his second-story balcony and saw one relative, Ahmad, wounded and scores of other family members running outside.

Then the other shells hit, and he did not see the crowd standing anymore. "They just left — they withdrew," he said, walking over puddles filled with blood, spattered human remains and sandals, many belonging to children.

"Children! Women! Parents!" said Abu Ahman, 42, a rescue worker who lives on the street and arrived right after the rockets hit. "I can't find the words that describe this action — legs of children, head of a small girl."

At the Kamal Adwan Hospital, Maali Athamnah, 27, the aunt of the newly orphaned Isra and two other siblings who survived, Islam, 14, and Muhammad, 3, who broke both his legs, broke into tears reading a list of the dead, nearly all of them relatives. Another 80 people were wounded.

Ms. Athamnah said she did not support the militants' firing rockets into Israel. But she said: "Just think who is firing them: those who lost family members to Israel. And think about these kids now. They will be the rocket firers in the future. No mother, no father. No house. They will be the next ones to fire the rockets."

On Wednesday night, Israeli rockets killed Ahmed Awad and another Hamas member in Gaza City. Mr. Awad was said to be a rocket maker and the son-in-law of the Hamas foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar.

In the West Bank on Wednesday, Israeli soldiers killed four gunmen and a civilian during a raid near Jenin, Palestinian security officials said.

Israeli forces also killed a Hamas gunman and a 17-year-old civilian near the Jabaliya refugee camp in Gaza, hospital officials said. The Israeli Army said soldiers had shot three gunmen after being attacked with an antitank missile.

'Shells Kept Falling' On Gaza Apartment, Killing 17 In Family (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

BEIT HANOUN, Gaza Strip, Nov. 8 -- Islam al-Athamnah was asleep on a foam mattress next to her brothers and sisters, crowded together like puzzle pieces on the floor of their top-story apartment. Uncles and cousins slept in the levels beneath, her mother and father in an adjoining room.

"Then something hit us," Islam, 14, recalled from a hospital room with sky-blue walls. "The windows shattered, and then a second shell hit the house. It was all smoky. We were using our hands to find the kids."

Palestinian emergency workers and frightened neighbors pulled scores of Islam's wounded relatives from the ruins of their home in the frantic hours after the 5:30 a.m. blasts, which witnesses here said came from Israeli artillery fire.

Palestinian health officials said 20 civilians were killed, 17 of them from Islam's extended family. At least seven of the dead were children asleep at the time of the blasts, which left heavy jagged shrapnel on rooftops and in living rooms.

More than 60 people were wounded, including Islam's 5-year-old sister, Israh, and 3-year-old brother, Mohammed, who tossed in a hospital bed here with thickly bandaged legs, crying for his wounded mother. Islam's father, two grandparents, an uncle and many cousins were among the dead.

"I just grabbed who I could and ran," said Islam, her face freckled with dozens of pinprick shrapnel wounds. "I was lucky because more shells kept falling."

The blasts along Hamad Street, which witnesses said numbered between four and 10, ripped through several generations of a family of farmers, doctors and taxi drivers who live near fruit orchards on the northern edge of this town. A grandfather died along with his 23-year-old son and 1-year-old granddaughter. Three brothers died. So did two sisters.

The mourning tents that appeared throughout this agricultural town became the venues for public despair, nationalist fervor and strident anger toward the Jewish state and its ally, the United States, which provides Israel with roughly $2 billion annually in military aid. Palestinian leaders called for three days of mourning across the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, as well as international pressure to stop Israel's operations in this town of 28,000 people.

"We expect the international community to intervene," said Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government. "But the United States bears direct responsibility for this by giving Israel the green light. We don't expect anything from them."

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert expressed regret for the incident, and the Israeli military announced a suspension of artillery fire into Gaza, designed to suppress the frequent Palestinian rocket fire directed at Israeli cities, pending an investigation.

The inquiry will be led by Maj. Gen. Meir Kalifi, deputy chief of ground forces, who headed the June investigation into an explosion on a Gaza beach that killed six members of the Ghaliyah family. He concluded that Israel was not responsible for the blast, although a Human Rights Watch investigator said the explosion most likely came from a fired artillery shell.

In a statement, Israel's military said that "the responsibility for any civilian casualties lies with the terrorist organizations" firing rockets toward Israel. Six of the crude rockets landed in Israel on Wednesday despite the recent intensive military operation here intended to stop them.

In a separate incident in the West Bank town of Yamoun, near Jenin, Israeli soldiers in civilian clothes killed four fighters from the military wing of the Fatah movement and one civilian. As night fell here, an Israeli airstrike on a car in northern Gaza killed two gunmen from Hamas's military wing, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, bringing the day's toll to 27 dead.

"Our response to these crimes and these massacres has to be unity," said Mahmoud Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority and head of Fatah. "I condemn anyone who launches rockets. It is fruitless and gives an excuse, not a reason, for the Israeli massacres, which have no justification."

Abbas is in Gaza for talks with Hamas to form a national unity government, hoping to end economic sanctions that have been in place against the Palestinian Authority since the radical Islamic movement took power over its ministries in March. The United States, the European Union and Israel classify Hamas, which does not recognize the Jewish state's right to exist, as a terrorist organization.

Palestinian officials warned that the deaths in Beit Hanoun would increase tensions between Fatah and Hamas, especially the harder-line Hamas leaders in exile.

Khaled Meshal, head of Hamas's political wing in Damascus, Syria, called on "all the factions of the resistance, despite the difficulties on the ground, to respond."

"This is an Israeli act of escalation and provocation that will have a negative impact both internally and bilaterally," said Hanan Ashrawi, a Palestinian legislator from the Third Way movement. "The consequence of this unleashed violence against a civilian population will be yet, unfortunately, another circle of violence."

DOJ_NMG_0092166

In a statement faxed to news agencies here, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades said that "America is providing the political and financial cover" for Israel's military operations. It called on supporters "around the world to teach the American enemy a hard lesson."

Abu Obaida, a spokesman for Hamas's military wing, said in a telephone interview later that "our only theater of operation is in Palestine and only against the Israeli occupation." He added, "We appeal to the American administration to apply one standard of humanity to Israelis and Palestinians."

In Washington, President Bush said in a statement: "We send our condolences to the families of all those affected. . . . We call on all parties to act with care and restraint so as to avoid any harm to innocent civilians."

Israel withdrew most of its forces here Tuesday after a six-day operation that left dozens of homes in ruins, sidewalks crumbled, lampposts toppled and backyard orchards torn up by bulldozers. Al-Nasser Mosque, site of a standoff between Israeli forces and Palestinian gunmen, lay in ruins, only its turquoise-tipped minaret still standing.

Israeli Group Demands Inquiry Into Attack (FT)

By Harvey Morris In Jerusalem

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Israel's leading human rights organisation has demanded a criminal investigation into the army's shelling of northern Gaza on Wednesday that killed 18 Palestinian civilians, most of them women and children.

As international leaders expressed a mixture of concern and outrage at the latest additions to a mounting death toll in the Gaza Strip, the B'tselem organisation said it was gravely concerned that the action constituted a war crime.

Amir Peretz, Israeli defence minister, ordered a halt to shelling pending an internal military inquiry to determine whether tank fire had strayed from its intended target.

Whatever the outcome of the investigation, the incident prompted fresh questions about Israel's military tactics in Gaza where hundreds of people, including 96 children, have died this year while the number of Israeli civilian casualties of Palestinian attacks has dwindled to a handful. Israeli tanks had ostensibly been targeting areas used by militants to fire rockets into southern Israel.

Instead, up to 10 shells hit a residential area of the town of Beit Hanoun, blasting two apartment buildings in the early morning. Sixteen members of a single family were among the dead.

Some of the casualties were hit by secondary shellfire as they left their beds to survey the scene of the initial explosions.

In a statement, the army said: "Initial information shows that the artillery fire was directed at a location distant from the one reportedly hit."

Mr Peretz and Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, issued a statement that referred to the "tragic results" of the action and offered humanitarian aid.

The shelling was denounced as a massacre by Palestinian officials. In a rare public display of unity, Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority's Fatah president, and Ismail Haniyeh, its Hamas prime minister, donated blood during a joint visit to a hospital where some of more than 50 wounded were being treated.

Mr Haniyeh earlier called off a formal meeting with Mr Abbas at which they were to have had further talks on the formation of a national unity government. The PA declared three days of mourning for the victims.

Javier Solana, European Union foreign policy chief, said in a statement he deplored the Israeli military operation. "These military operations must be halted."

Margaret Beckett, UK foreign minister, said she was "gravely disturbed" by the deaths and that Israel must respect its obligation to avoid harming civilians. "It is hard to see what this action was meant to achieve and how it can be justified."

Alvaro de Soto, UN special envoy in the region, said he was "shocked and appalled".

Foreign leaders had previously expressed concern at a week-long Israeli invasion of Beit Hanoun that ended on Tuesday in which more than 50 Palestinians were killed.

DOJ_NMG_0092167

The army opted for a ground operation after intensive shellfire failed to stem the launching of rockets into southern Israel. The almost daily barrage of home-made missiles continued on Wednesday, with two striking the southern Israeli town of Sderot and injuring one person.

Although the relatively crude weapons have caused few injuries, the Israeli government has vowed to continue its efforts to stamp out the attacks. Officials say no state would allow its citizens to be targeted in such a way without responding.

Some Hamas officials warned on Wednesday that militants now would resume suicide bombings inside Israel. Khaled Maashal, head of the movement's Damascus-based exiled leadership that controls its military wing, said the response to the Beit Hanoun killings would be "by deed not words".

Hamas Leader Calls Off Israel Cease-fire (AP)

By Diaa Hadid

AP, November 9, 2006

Hamas' exiled leader on Wednesday called off a cease-fire with Israel and militants threatened to attack Americans after 18 members of a family, including eight children, were killed in an Israeli artillery barrage on a densely populated Gaza neighborhood.

It was the highest number of Palestinian civilians killed in a single strike since fighting erupted six years ago, and undermined Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's attempts to form a more moderate government and renew a peace process with Israel.

Abbas condemned the "terrible, despicable crime," and the international community criticized the deaths. Israel, promising a swift inquiry, expressed regret for harming civilians.

The shelling occurred early Wednesday as residents were sleeping in the northern Gaza town of Beit Hanoun, the focus of a weeklong military offensive aimed at stopping rocket fire. Israeli troops had pulled out of the town just 24 hours earlier, and the rocket attacks resumed almost immediately.

The Israeli shells landed around a compound of four apartment buildings on a small side street. The explosions left holes in the buildings, owned by four brothers from the al-Athamna family, and sent panicked residents scurrying outside. Additional salvos landed, hitting the people and flooding a dusty alleyway in a pool of blood.

"Shells were fired directly onto the people who were rushing out of the house," said Akram al-Athamna, a relative of the victims. "There was blood everywhere."

Another family member, 14-year-old Asma al-Athamna, said she saw her mother, older sister and brother-in-law die as they fled their home. "I was behind them and I was wounded," the weeping girl said from her hospital bed. Her 2-year-old niece, Malak, lay in an adjacent bed, recovering from shrapnel wounds to her face.

The family is prominent in Beit Hanoun and includes several doctors and professionals. Family members said they had fled during the Israeli offensive, returning home after Tuesday's pullout.

Bits of dismembered bodies were plastered to walls of the damaged buildings and lying on the ground. A woman's head scarf, children's boots and slippers, and a pair of jeans — all burnt — were strewn outside.

Weeping relatives gathered outside the homes. One man dipped his hand in victims' blood and smeared it over his face. "God avenge us, God avenge us," he wailed.

A young man, standing in the bloodied alleyway, said an infant girl had been blown to pieces. "I tried to look for her head, I tried to look for her head," he shrieked, then sank to the ground, weeping.

Health workers said some 60 people were wounded, including 26 children.

In Damascus, Syria, Khaled Mashaal, the exiled leader of Hamas, said the group would no longer honor a February 2005 truce and called for renewed attacks on Israel. He urged other militant groups to join the struggle.

"The armed struggle is free to resume, and the resistance is dictated by local circumstances," he told a news conference. "There must be a roaring reaction so that we avenge all those victims." Other major militant groups pledged to follow suit.

The declarations raised the prospect of a new wave of suicide bombings and large-scale fighting with Israel. Although violence has persisted since the truce declaration, including the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier by Hamas-linked militants in June, there has been a sharp drop in fighting. Hamas has not carried out a suicide bombing since August 2004, after killing scores of Israelis in such attacks over the previous four years.

Despite the rhetoric, Hamas would be taking a gamble by resuming large-scale violence. The group won legislative elections this year and has been struggling to win international legitimacy. Already boycotted by the U.S., Europe and Israel, Hamas would risk further international isolation.

Perhaps with this in mind, Hamas leaders in Gaza quickly distanced themselves from a call by the group's military wing for Muslims around the world to strike at "the American enemy." Hamas has historically confined attacks to Israeli targets.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert expressed regret at the loss of civilian life and offered humanitarian aid.

"The unintentional tragedy that happened today in Beit Hanoun is one that the Israel Defense Forces will investigate to make sure that such events do not recur," said Miri Eisin, Olmert's spokeswoman.

She said, however, that Israel would press on with its efforts to halt Palestinian rocket attacks. She also dismissed the latest Hamas threats, saying militants have continually tried to attack Israelis. Six rockets landed in Israel on Wednesday, wounding two people, the army said.

Initial findings showed that the army had fired artillery at a target some 500 yards away from the residential area.

"Our estimate is that it was something connected with the aiming devices, or the alignment, or the balance between them, or our radar's location of the shell hit," Maj. Gen. Yoav Galant, head of Israel's southern command, told Channel 2 TV. "Our investigation is concentrating on these points," he said.

In Gaza, Abbas said the killings jeopardized peace prospects. "We tell the Israelis, you are not seeking peace at all, but are destroying all chances for peace. You must therefore bear all the consequences of these crimes," he told Palestine TV.

However, Abbas also criticized the Palestinian rocket launchers, saying they invited tough Israeli reprisals. "We are against those that justify Israeli actions," he said. Hamas angrily accused Abbas of caving in to Israeli pressure.

Despite the attack, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas met Abbas for talks on forming a coalition government, but no agreement was reached. Haniyeh had called for suspending the talks after the shelling.

In a rare gesture of unity, the rival leaders also visited victims in a Gaza hospital together and donated blood. Both men also declared three-day mourning periods throughout the West Bank and Gaza.

The civilian deaths drew swift condemnations around the world. France and Russia warned of an escalation of hostilities, and the British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, said "it was hard to see what this action was meant to achieve and how it can be justified."

President Bush called on "all parties" to act with restraint. Noting that Israel has begun an investigation, he said, "We hope it will be completed quickly and that appropriate steps will be taken to avoid a repetition of this tragic incident."

The U.N. Security Council scheduled an open meeting Thursday at the Palestinians request. Palestinian U.N. observer Riyad Mansour said Palestinians want a resolution that condemns recent Israeli attacks and calls for an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, a cease-fire, and deployment of U.N. observers.

Spontaneous demonstrations erupted across Gaza and the West Bank. Black smoke billowed into the skies of northern Gaza as protesters set tires ablaze. A mass funeral was expected Thursday.

Israeli police, fearing revenge attacks, stepped up their alert level, mobilizing forces across the country.

In separate fighting Wednesday, Israeli troops killed four Palestinian militants in northern Gaza. And in the West Bank, Israeli forces ambushed a group of Palestinian gunmen, killing four militants. A 30-year-old civilian also died in the shootout.

Hamas Ends Truce Following Israeli Bombing Campaign In Gaza (MCT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

McClatchy Newspapers, November 9, 2006

BEIT HANOUN, Gaza Strip - Omar Athamna and his family crawled into their beds Tuesday night in the quiet following an Israeli military campaign that killed more than 60 Palestinians in their small farming town.

Their sense of calm proved to be short-lived. Just before dawn on Wednesday, an Israeli artillery barrage slammed into the Athamnas' neighborhood, killing at least 17 members of the extended family, including seven children, as they tried to escape.

The attack decimated the Athamna clan, stunned the Gaza Strip and threatened to spark a renewed suicide bombing campaign in Israel.

"I am not a militant, but I will be a militant to fight them now," Omar Athamna said as he sat near the spot where three of his brothers, two cousins, aunt, uncle, grandmother and other relatives were killed.

In Syria, exiled Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal declared an end to the group's self-imposed 18-month-old cease-fire with Israel and said the group would respond with "deeds, not words."

As international condemnation mounted, Israel halted its artillery shelling of the Gaza Strip and vowed to launch a swift investigation.

"It is clear a serious mistake was made and it is being examined," Deputy Defense Minister Efraim Sneh told Israel Radio. "Artillery needs to be used in cases where it is helpful, but it needs to be used carefully, as it is not accurate."

Yoav Galant, the head of Israel's southern command, told Israel's Channel 2 that the artillery was supposed to hit fields 500 yards from the homes and said the investigation would look into whether the radar or targeting systems had failed.

The shelling surprised the residents of Beit Hanoun, who'd just emerged that morning to survey damage caused by a six-day Israeli operation meant to quash Palestinian militants who fire rudimentary rockets into southern Israel. The operation ravaged parts of the town of 30,000 near the Israeli border.

Survivors of Wednesday's shelling described a morning of carnage and confusion:

The first shell slammed into the roof of the four-story Athamna home on the outskirts of Beit Hanoun around 5:30 a.m.

Frightened parents bundled up their children as a second shell slammed into one of the children's rooms. One mother tossed her infant daughter to relatives from a second-story window and rushed to grab her other children before being felled by another blast. The third shell slammed into a concrete stairwell as family members were trying to escape. But it was the fourth shell that caused the most damage. It exploded in the narrow street outside the home where the family members were gathering.

A sense of profound shock, grief and anger rippled through Beit Hanoun as word spread that at least 17 people had been killed in the attack.

In the hours after the shelling, witnesses said, one relative slumped by a large pool of bloody water in the street and wailed as he smeared it on his face.

The four-story home was ravaged. Dust covered teddy bears in one room while shards of concrete coated scattered mattresses in another.

The attack briefly united Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, who set aside their differences over the formation of a new unity government to visit survivors of the attack.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for Haniyeh, echoed Hamas leader Mashaal's appeal for renewed attacks on Israel.

"It is not fair that people in Tel Aviv are sleeping quietly," Hamad said after visiting the blast sites. "It is our right that they should taste the same pain that we feel here in Gaza."

Hillel Frisch, a senior research associate at the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies, said the attack could push frustrated Palestinians toward the hard-line groups Israel is trying to undermine.

"I would say this action, and others like it, are intensifying a process that has been going on for four years of strengthening Hamas at the expense of Fatah and turning the Palestinian movement into a religious nationalist or even religious-revolutionary movement - distancing the Palestinians from any peace process," he said.

Israel's shelling is part of a months-long campaign against Palestinian militants who've fired hundreds of rudimentary rockets into southern Israel. While the rocket attacks haven't killed any Israelis in the past 15 months, the persistent threat hangs over Israeli towns close to the Gaza border.

In response, Israel has fired tens of thousands of shells into the northern Gaza Strip fields and towns that the Palestinian militants have used as launching pads.

"We are launching these metal pipes which we call rockets, which do not hurt them at all," said Zakaria Kafarna as he stood in a hospital room where one of his cousins was being treated for shrapnel wounds. "It is not worth all this."

DOJ_NMG_0092170

In the past year, more than 53 Palestinians who weren't involved in fighting Israel have been killed by Israeli artillery and tank fire, according to statistics compiled by the Israeli human rights group B'Tselem.

Until Wednesday, the most contentious incident took place in June when eight Palestinians picnicking on a Gaza Strip beach were killed while Israel was shelling the waterfront. An Israeli military investigation concluded that the victims weren't killed by shells fired that day, but American human rights researchers strongly challenged the official findings.

Democratic Leader In Senate Calls Bush's India Deal A Priority (BLM)

By Judy Mathewson And Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, November 9, 2006

``India is the largest democracy in the world," the Nevada Democrat told reporters today in Washington. ``We want to work with them, and this is important we move along that line." At the White House, President George W. Bush said securing congressional approval for the accord is also high on his agenda.

``I'm trying to get the Indian deal done," Bush said.

The agreement is a major initiative of Bush's foreign policy, an effort to expand a strategic relationship with the fastest-growing major economy after China. While the measure enjoys bipartisan support, the agreement was mired in a procedural squabble in the Senate when lawmakers adjourned at the end of September.

Passage in the lame-duck session would be a win for nuclear-industry suppliers such as Fairfield, Connecticut-based General Electric Co. and Monroeville, Pennsylvania-based Westinghouse Electric Co., which are in line to supply India with equipment. The bill exempts India from U.S. laws that bar technology transfers to countries that haven't signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Reid said the India accord is one of five things he wants to accomplish in the lame-duck session before the new Congress begins in January. However, the agreement still faces additional hurdles before it can go into effect.

House Version

If it passes, the Senate measure would have to be reconciled with a version the House passed in July, or else the legislation will have to be introduced again next year.

``We just have to keep our fingers crossed," said Graham Wisner, who lobbied Congress to pass the bill on behalf of the U.S.-India Business Council in Washington. ``The thought of having to go through the whole process again is enough to make me want to jump off a cliff."

A U.S. State Department delegation is in New Delhi this week to address possible sticking points, including whether India must cede the right to conduct nuclear weapons tests, a person familiar with the negotiations said.

The U.S. has said cooperation would end if India conducts a nuclear test, while the Indian government has said it will only agree to a voluntary ban.

Another step that must be cleared is agreement between the SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> United Nations nuclear watchdog and India on a regimen for international inspections. And the Nuclear Suppliers Group, a 45-nation forum dedicated to limiting the spread of atomic weapons, must also sign off on the deal.

India and the U.S. agreed to the deal's broad outlines on March 2. It would require India, for the first time, to open some of its power plants to UN inspectors.

The agreement also marks a turnabout for the U.S., which has barred nuclear exports to India since that country tested an atomic bomb in 1974 without signing the nonproliferation treaty.

U.N. Urges U.S. To End Cuba Embargo (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, November 9, 2006

The U.N. General Assembly voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to urge the United States to end its 45-year-old trade embargo against Cuba after defeating an amendment calling on Fidel Castro's government to free political prisoners and respect human rights.

It was the 15th straight year that the 192-member world body approved a resolution calling for the U.S. economic and commercial embargo against Cuba to be repealed "as soon as possible."

Cuba's Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque told the assembly "the economic war unleashed by the U.S. against Cuba, the longest and most ruthless ever known, qualifies as an act of genocide and constitutes a flagrant violation of international law and the charter of the United Nations."

Perez Roque said the embargo has caused $86 billion in economic damage to Cuba since it began.

U.S. deputy ambassador Ronald Godard later said that to claim the embargo adversely affects the Cuban people ignores "the truth" that the Cuban government has systematically denied "the human, economic, labor and political rights of its people over 47 years."

"We maintain this embargo to demonstrate our continuing call for economic and political freedom for all Cubans," Godard said.

The embargo, aimed at toppling Castro's socialist system, was imposed after the failed CIA-backed Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961. It has been steadily tightened under President Bush.

Delegates in the General Assembly chamber burst into applause when the vote flashed on the screen — 183 in favor to 4 opposed, with 1 abstention. Joining the United States in voting "no" were Israel and the South Pacific nations of the Marshall Islands and Palau. Micronesia, also in the South Pacific, abstained.

In Cuba, state-run television showed Foreign Ministry officials cheering when the vote was announced.

"This confirms once again by the U.N. itself that the embargo is totally illegal and wrong and needs to be suspended," said Hipolito Rodriguez, a customs worker in Havana.

The General Assembly voted on the resolution soon after defeating an amendment by Australia stating that the U.S. laws and measures "were motivated by valid concerns about the continued lack of democracy and political freedom in Cuba."

It also would have called on Cuba to release all political prisoners, cooperate with international human rights bodies, respect the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and comply with all human rights treaties to which it is a signatory.

Australia's U.N. Ambassador Robert Hill said his country proposed the amendment in hopes that if Cuba met its obligations, "we would not need to return to this issue every year," he said.

Perez Roque called Australia the "lackeys" of the United States for introducing the amendment, which he claimed was drafted in Washington.

U.S. Seeks To Form Ties With Nicaragua (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, November 9, 2006

The State Department said Wednesday that it looks to establish "positive relations" with the Nicaraguan government of President-elect Daniel Ortega, a former rival who won Sunday's presidential elections.

Spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said cooperation with Ortega and his Sandinista colleagues will be "based on their action in support of Nicaragua's democratic future."

Ortega has said he wants to maintain relations with Washington while forging closer ties with Cuba and Venezuela. During the campaign, he also projected a far more moderate image compared with his days as a Marxist-Leninist firebrand.

The Reagan administration forcefully opposed Ortega when he was president during the 1980s, backing anti-communist rebels who took up arms against him. Both Washington and Managua seem intent on a more amicable relationship during Ortega's second time around.

"We respect the decision of the Nicaraguan people," Gallegos said, alluding to the elections.

On Tuesday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack suggested that Ortega may have a stake in maintaining good relations with the United States.

He noted that Nicaragua is part of a U.S.-Central American free trade agreement. In addition, he said the United States has a $175 million program aimed at rural development in a northeastern Nicaraguan region sprinkled with strong pro-Sandinista sentiment.

DOJ_NMG_0092172

In Havana, Cuban President Fidel Castro welcomed Ortega's victory. He said the outcome "fills our people with joy, at the same time filling the terrorist and genocidal government of the United States with opprobrium."

In Caracas, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said he and Ortega would be "uniting as never before" to construct a socialist future.

In the runup to the election, administration officials issued warnings that Nicaraguan democracy could be imperiled if Ortega prevailed in the balloting. The comments seemed to contradict the professed neutrality of the State Department in the election.

U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said in October that Nicaraguans "must reject the politics of corrupt and discredited caudillos (strongmen) who robbed Nicaragua of its prosperity and who still pose a threat to the bright future that Nicaragua has before it today."

He said U.S. aid and trade programs "will be endangered" if "anti-democratic forces prevail."

Paul Trivelli, the U.S. ambassador in Nicaragua, said Ortega "is a tiger that has not changed his stripes." He added that the Sandinistas and an allied party "hijacked" Nicaraguan democracy by manipulating the election ground rules in ways that favored them.

Chavez Leads Gloating Over Vote (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez yesterday led a global chorus of Bush administration critics gloating over the outcome of Tuesday's midterm elections, but some foreign leaders expressed concern over what the Democratic victory will mean on issues such as global trade and the Middle East.

Latin American populists, European leftists and Islamic fundamentalists were all quick to point to the U.S. vote as a repudiation of Mr. Bush's aggressive, go-it-alone approach on Iraq and the global war on terror.

The resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld also sparked praise from leaders of countries from the heart of what Mr. Rumsfeld once memorably dismissed as "Old Europe."

The Democratic sweep ranks as "the beginning of the end of a six-year nightmare for the world," 200 members of the Socialist bloc in the European Parliament declared in a joint statement yesterday.

Said Italian Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema, "A cycle has ended. The cycle of pre-emptive wars, of unilateralism, ends in great failure."

With Mr. Bush still in charge of U.S. foreign policy for another two years, the pugnacious Mr. Chavez was one of the few world leaders to comment publicly on the elections.

"It's a reprisal vote against the war in Iraq, against the corruption" inside the Bush administration, he told reporters in Caracas. "All this fills us with optimism."

Informed of Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation as he was speaking, Mr. Chavez said, "Heads have started to roll. The president should resign on moral grounds, and Rumsfeld should go to jail."

Iran's state-controlled television said in a commentary that U.S. voters were rejecting "Bush's wrong strategy in the Middle East," as well as "financial corruption in the United States."

Sudan, which has clashed with the United States over the humanitarian crisis in its Darfur region, is hoping for "relations of cooperation, not confrontation" with the chastened U.S. administration, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs al-Samani al-Wasiyla said.

The celebration was not universal, with some foreign commentators worrying that the new Democrat-led Congress will be more protectionist on trade and will disappoint those hoping for a major U.S. shift on issues such as Iraq, North Korea, global warming and the International Criminal Court.

Jose Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, the European Union's executive arm, urged the United States to make a "renewed commitment" to revive faltering World Trade Organization talks for a new global trade pact.

A spokesman for Mexican President Vicente Fox said the Democratic gains could soften the U.S. stand in talks on illegal immigration.

"We hope this new makeup of Congress can be a catalyst for the U.S. government working toward a migration reform with the characteristics proposed by Mexico," spokesman Ruben Aguilar said.

Mr. Bush's diminished clout also was a cause of concern for some allies.

Japanese press commentators worried that a weakened Mr. Bush will not be able to push through major trade deals or stick to the hard line he has taken against North Korea's nuclear-weapons programs. Analysts in India predicted Democrats may demand new concessions in the massive civilian nuclear pact Mr. Bush has championed, putting the deal in doubt.

Alexander Pikayev of the Moscow-based think tank Scholars for Global Security noted that U.S.-Russian relations historically fared better under Republicans than Democrats.

"As a result of the election, we expect the political struggle in the United States to toughen, and this may lead to sudden, spontaneous jumps of the American elephant in the international arena," he told a Moscow radio interviewer yesterday.

Foreign leaders closely aligned with Mr. Bush, including British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Australian Prime Minister John Howard, were undercut by the U.S. vote.

John McDonnell, a leftist member of Mr. Blair's ruling Labor Party and a critic of the Iraq war, said the U.S. results "mean that Blair is now totally isolated in the international community."

Venezuela Groups Get U.S. Aid Amid Meddling Charges (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Nov. 8 — Since President Hugo Chávez returned to power after a brief coup in 2002, the United States has channeled millions of dollars to Venezuelan organizations, many of them critical of his government. This aid has become a key issue in the presidential election next month amid claims of American interference in the domestic political system.

“Washington thinks it can buy regime change in Venezuela,” said Carlos Escarrá, a constitutional lawyer and a leading legislator in the National Assembly who has been pushing for tighter regulation over the American financing of Venezuelan groups. “This is an affront to our sovereignty as a nation that is not docile to Washington’s interests.”

He echoed recent comments from other high-ranking officials and from Mr. Chávez, who has a double-digit lead in most polls over his main opponent, Manuel Rosales, the governor of Zulia State. Mr. Chávez rarely refers in public to Mr. Rosales by name, instead framing his campaign as a choice between his government and the Bush administration.

American diplomats here have remained largely quiet in commenting on the election, which is scheduled for Dec. 3, in contrast to the active role American officials played in Nicaragua before the election of Daniel Ortega earlier this week. Government officials here exploit any example of American efforts to counter Mr. Chávez’s influence as evidence of what they see as a looming confrontation with Washington.

For instance, Vice President José Vicente Rangel has organized an event this week to publicize the release of “Bush vs. Chávez: Washington’s War Against Venezuela,” a book by Eva Golinger, an American lawyer who has become famous in Venezuela for detailing the American financing of groups here.

The United States Agency for International Development has distributed about $25 million to various Venezuelan organizations over the last five years, according to officials involved in the projects. The funds have been channeled to the Venezuelan groups through private and public entities from the United States that have opened offices in Caracas.

These include Development Alternatives Inc., a Bethesda, Md., company that works closely with the State Department in dispersing funds around the world, and the International Republican Institute and the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs, two Washington groups that have carried out training for emerging political leaders in Venezuela.

Documents obtained from the United States government under the Freedom of Information Act point to numerous grants made by the United States in the past two years to groups whose activities are viewed as critical of Mr. Chávez’s government. The international development agency withheld the names of many of the grant recipients, saying that the disclosure of their identities could put them at risk of political retaliation.

All of the grants were channeled through Development Alternatives, which worked on behalf of the Office of Transition Initiatives, a little-known branch of the international development agency that started operating in Venezuela after the April 2002 coup.

O.T.I., which was created in the 1990s to push for democratic change in the former Soviet Union, normally finances activities in strife-torn countries like Liberia, Nepal and Sri Lanka. Its only operations in Latin America are in Venezuela and Bolivia, two countries that have developed an alliance based in part on shared distrust of the United States.

Mr. Chávez has repeatedly lashed out at the United States government's activities, mixing his attacks with unsubstantiated claims that the Bush administration is financing covert intelligence operations aimed at strengthening his opponent's campaign. This criticism has played well among the president's political base, where anti-American sentiment has flourished since Mr. Chávez was briefly removed from power in a coup in 2002 with the Bush administration's tacit approval.

Officials from the agency for international development did not withhold all of the identities of its grant recipients in Venezuela, as if to point out that some of the aid went to groups receiving charity in the form of baseball equipment and roofing materials. One $15,728 grant for a nutrition program went to the municipal government of Baruta, an area of Caracas whose mayor, Henrique Capriles Radonski, is an outspoken critic of Mr. Chávez.

American officials here and in Washington say the aim of the assistance is to bring opponents and supporters of Mr. Chávez together to discuss ways to prevent the erosion of democratic freedoms.

"U.S. activities, as has been publicly discussed on numerous occasions, focus on strengthening civil society in Venezuela, which is a critical element for any healthy democracy," David Snider, an international development agency spokesman in Washington, said in a statement.

"These nonpartisan activities are no different than those activities that U.S.A.I.D. supports in many other countries throughout the world," he added.

But some grants were directed at organizations whose stated objectives seemed to look for potential weaknesses in Mr. Chávez's administration. One $33,304 grant in March 2005 was called "Land Redistribution Dos and Don'ts," and required its unidentified recipient to investigate agricultural policies in areas where the federal government had been carrying out land expropriations.

Other grants had what appeared to be an objective of building support for potential rivals to Mr. Chávez. A $47,459 grant, for instance, was made in July 2005 to an organization whose goal was to meet with organizations to build a "democratic leadership campaign."

The agency's grants in Venezuela have raised concern among some political analysts who see parallels in efforts by Washington to destabilize the socialist government of Salvador Allende in Chile in the early 1970s or attempts to influence the domestic political system of Nicaragua in the 1980s.

"I wouldn't feel comfortable with the Chinese government doing something like this in the U.S.," said Jeremy Bigwood, an international policy analyst at the Center for Economic Policy and Research in Washington. Mr. Bigwood filed a pending lawsuit against the agency for international development this year asking that it name its recipients. He said not doing so changed it from a "civilian to a clandestine service."

Meanwhile, a backlash to the American financing has been building. Prosecutors filed conspiracy charges against leaders of Súmate, a voter education group, after it received $31,000 from the National Endowment for Democracy, another entity backed by the United States government that distributes money to groups in Venezuela.

A proposed law is also making its way through the National Assembly that would regulate international financing of nongovernmental organizations. The bill, which has been criticized by anticorruption groups like Transparency International, has been held up until after the election.

Increased scrutiny by the government here of the American financing has been described as hypocritical by some analysts at a time when Venezuela has increased its own foreign aid in an attempt to influence the political direction of countries like Bolivia and Nicaragua.

DOJ_NMG_0092175

"The thinking goes that if it's for the revolution, then by definition it is correct," said Aníbal Romero, a professor of political science at Simón Bolívar University. "But if the money comes from Washington, then it's definitely wrong."

Mexico's Calderon Heartened By Outcome Of U.S. Elections (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon said yesterday that Democratic gains in Congress could lead to "room for improvement" in U.S.-Mexican relations, a suggestion that headway may be made on immigration and other bilateral issues.

At a White House meeting with President Bush today, Calderon, who takes office on Dec. 1, is expected to express Mexico's disappointment with the decision by the outgoing Republican-controlled House and Senate to approve a 700-mile fence along the Mexican-American border, an effort to stem the flow of millions of migrant workers.

During a meeting yesterday with Washington Post reporters and editors, Calderon said the outcome of Tuesday's midterm elections allowed for "some room for improvement in terms of bilateral relations."

"I know President Bush is facing a difficult moment," he said. "But I think there is an opportunity. After the elections, I hope Americans and Congress will have a chance for rational debate."

Calderon, a Harvard-educated economist and a member of the conservative National Action Party, made job creation a central platform of his campaign. He returned to that theme yesterday, saying that new jobs and foreign investment in Mexico would be more effective than a fence as a tool against migration.

His predecessor, current President Vicente Fox, made the same arguments against the fence, to no avail.

"Now maybe you have people crossing the border looking for capital," Calderon said. "We need capital crossing the border looking for people."

Calderon also said that the North American Free Trade Agreement had been a boon for Mexico but that more needed to be done to make the economy more competitive. He said that only by reducing tariffs, eliminating other regulations and enforcing the rule of law could Mexico be seen as a destination for foreign investment.

Mexico also has recently been suffering from increased violence. Calder?n acknowledged the months-long protests that have shut down the city of Oaxaca and expressed hopes that order would be restored. His home state of Michoacan, as well as the neighboring state of Guerrero, have seen a wave of violence, including decapitations, shootings and bombings. Much of that violence has appeared to be drug-related.

Yesterday, the president-elect acknowledged that there had been "a deterioration in the environment in Mexico."

"Probably, the main challenge I will have to face is how to strengthen institutions and the rule of law and to stop the loss of respect in authority."

Calderon, 44, waged an intense campaign against Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the populist former mayor of Mexico City. The results of the July 2 vote were contested, leading to weeks of appeals to electoral courts and protests in the capital's streets by Lopez Obrador supporters. Calderon was declared president-elect Sept. 5.

Yesterday, Calderon suggested that divisions created by the controversy were fading. He also expressed hope that, as a former member of the National Congress, he would be well-positioned to reach out to the opposition.

Bush To Meet Mexican President-elect (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

President Bush will find out today if good fences do make good neighbors when he sits down with Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon for their first face-to-face conversation.

The two men say they will talk about free trade, economic growth and security -- but the hottest topic is likely to be immigration, and Mr. Bush's signature two weeks ago on a bill to erect 698 miles of fence on the international boundary between the two nations.

Mr. Calderon criticized the fence yesterday in a meeting with Hispanic groups, saying he sees "the U.S.-Mexico border not covered in walls and barbed wire, but as an area of opportunity and prosperity for Mexicans and Americans both."

Neither side would say whether the fence was specifically on today's agenda. Mexican officials said it was more important at this stage that the two men have a chance to meet and establish a relationship, and Mr. Calderon tried to play down expectations this week, calling it a chance "to establish a first contact."

A White House official said having the meeting even before Mr. Calderon's Dec. 1 inauguration "reflects the importance we attach to continued strong ties with our hemispheric partner and neighbor."

The Mexican president-elect made his first international visit last month to Canada to meet with Prime Minister Stephen Harper on the day Mr. Bush signed the fence act. The visit was a clear signal, said Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, a Washington-based think tank.

"That was noted by everyone. That was noted as almost a sign of aggressive sovereignty on Calderon's part," Mr. Birns said.

At a press conference after that meeting, Mr. Calderon was harshly critical of the fence, and he isn't the only leader protesting. Over the weekend, leaders from Latin America, Spain and Portugal, meeting in an Ibero-American summit, said the fence "incites discrimination and xenophobia."

Mr. Bush previously has spoken with Mr. Calderon by phone, calling in the days after Mexico's election to congratulate him on securing the most votes, even though he had not yet been declared the winner.

At 44, Mr. Calderon will be among the youngest presidents in Mexico's history. He is from the same party as outgoing President Vicente Fox, who is leaving because of Mexico's one-term limit on the office.

Like Mr. Fox and, for that matter, Mr. Bush, Mr. Calderon studied at Harvard, earning a master's degree in public administration from the Kennedy School of Government.

Mr. Birns said today's meeting could be the beginning of a productive working relationship because the two men need each other. In addition to border issues, he said Mr. Bush also might take the opportunity to sound out Mr. Calderon, a former energy secretary, on energy policy.

"They can help each other, and the help is largely on the border, but I also think Bush may very well make a reference to energy because that in a sense is even more important to Bush right now," Mr. Birns said.

Asked recently about Mr. Calderon's statements on the fence, White House press secretary Tony Snow focused on the cooperation both nations have shown on the border in fighting drug trafficking. Mr. Snow also said Mr. Bush is considering a host of measures on the border.

"The president understands the sensitivities, but on the other hand, he also understands the importance of securing the border," Mr. Snow said.

Immigration Expected To Dominate Calderón-Bush Talks (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

Posted November 09, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/1109/p25s01-woam.html Immigration expected to dominate Calder?n-Bush talks Mexico's conservative president-elect, Felipe Calder?n, makes his first White House visit Thursday.

By Sara Miller Llana | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

MEXICO CITY

The nearly 700 miles of fencing President Bush authorized for the US-Mexican border two weeks ago could overshadow other issues when Mexican president-elect Felipe Calderón makes his first visit to the White House on Thursday.

Unlike recently elected leftist leaders in Latin America, Mr. Calderón is a pro-business, US-friendly candidate who narrowly won July's presidential election against a leftist leader.

Yet, the additional fencing Mr. Bush approved threatens to create a political barrier even before Calderón officially takes office on Dec. 1.

On a recent trip to Canada, Mexico's president-elect compared the fence to the "Berlin Wall," the former barrier between Communist East and democratic West Berlin.

DOJ_NMG_0092177

"The most important thing for him is to end the monothematic tone [between the two nations]," says Luis Rubio, president of the Center of Research for Development, a think tank in Mexico City. He says the US-Mexican relationship, dominated by drug trafficking in the 1980s, now is being driven by differences over US immigration policy.

The US border fence, meant to enhance security and deter illegal immigration, is one step in a comprehensive immigration reform plan that Bush hopes can later include a guest-worker program and amnesty plan for some undocumented immigrants. Half of the estimated 11 million undocumented migrants living in the US are believed to be Mexican.

Monday, Calderón said the US-Mexican relationship is the "most delicate, most complex, and most important" in terms of Mexican foreign policy.

He did not say whether he would reiterate Mexico's objection to the law authorizing a major extension of the fence, which Mexican officials say will cause more deaths by making it even harder for would-be immigrants to cross the border. "The only thing [the wall] will do is create more death," says legislator José Edmundo Ramírez Martínez, an opposition Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) member and secretary of the immigration committee in Mexico's Congress.

Immigration was not among the main issues on the original agenda for Thursday's meeting. White House spokesman Tony Snow said last month that the discussion would focus on competitiveness, free trade, economic growth, and security in North America.

Calderón may have wanted to avoid immigration altogether given the failure of outgoing president and fellow National Action Party (PAN) party member Vicente Fox to get what he called the "whole enchilada": Mexico's leader had hoped to convince the Bush administration to push through the guest-worker plan and a path to citizenship for many undocumented Mexican workers.

"We didn't even get a nacho," says Mr. Ramírez Martínez.

Bush's move to authorize the fence underscored the Fox administration's failure to help Mexicans working illegally in the US and appears to have forced his successor to make it a priority. "If the US had not passed a law authorizing 700 miles of fencing, he could almost ignore immigration entirely. It was such a failure for Fox," says David Shirk, director of the Transborder Institute at the University of San Diego. "Now he can't ignore it."

Mr. Shirk says Calderón's No. 1 task should be to address the economic inequality in Mexico underscored by the country's July presidential race. Leftist candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador, who attracted the nation's poor, lost by half a percentage point and challenged the legitimacy of the election during a seven-week sit-in in Mexico City.

"The way [Calderón] rose to power requires his single-minded focus be on economic development if he is to legitimatize his presidency," says Shirk. He'll need to "enlist US support in a variety of ways to make it happen."

Calderón has floated a plan to put the country on the list of the world's fastest growing economies. "Mexico 2030" aims to help reduce extreme poverty by boosting annual per-capita income from $8,000 today to $30,000 over the next 25 years. Calderón hopes that improving conditions at home will reduce the number of Mexicans seeking opportunities in the US.

Calderón's top foreign adviser, Arturo Sarukhan, said Friday that the president-elect plans to meet in Washington with officials at the Inter-American Development Bank and the World Bank. Under discussion: programs that will create infrastructure and capitalize on the $19 billion Mexican immigrants in the US send home each year.

Ramírez Martínez, the lawmaker, says it is imperative that the president-elect discuss the wall with US officials. "We want him to go to the meeting with an agenda to talk about a migration policy - not just economics, commerce and free trade, but a new discussion about a migration policy."

Mexican Leader Assails Border Fence Plan (AP-Y)

By George Gedda

AP, November 9, 2006

Preparing for a meeting with President Bush, Mexican President-elect Felipe Calderon made clear Wednesday his unhappiness with U.S. border security measures, saying the two countries need "bridges for progress and not walls that isolate and divide."

DOJ_NMG_0092178

U.S. steps to stem the flow of migrants across the border were expected to dominate Bush's discussions with Calderon, who takes office Dec. 1.

Mexico has been highly critical of the U.S. plan to build a 700-mile fence along the border. Bush signed the law authorizing the fence on Oct. 26.

Calderon noted that barbed wire is also part of the U.S. border control apparatus.

The border region "should not be a zone of barbed wire but a zone of opportunities," Calderon said, according to a translation of his remarks.

He spoke to a gathering of some 200 Hispanic leaders here. He meets with Bush on Thursday after a breakfast meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Also scheduled to attend the breakfast were Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Calderon acknowledged Wednesday that illegal border-crossings into the United States are an unpleasant issue for both countries.

"Migration is not a desirable issue for anybody," he said. "It awakens enormous sensibilities in the United States and was at the center of the debate in the (Tuesday) elections.

And, he said, "it takes away the most daring part of our population and divides our families."

In a statement issued Wednesday from Mexico City, U.S. ambassador Antonio Garza said Bush and Calderon planned to discuss border problems caused by criminals and narco-traffickers.

Other possible topics, Garza said, include further reductions in limits to free trade and finding ways to ensure "how both people and goods can cross our border in a legal, orderly, and more efficient way."

Turkey Given Month To Rescue EU Bid (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And George Parker In Brussels And Vincent Boland In Ankara

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Turkey was on Wednesday given a month to rescue its bid to join the European Union, as Brussels sought to allay public concerns that the EU is expanding too far and too fast. In response, Ankara said it was up to the 25-nation bloc to keep the negotiations alive.

“It is clear that Turkey is not fulfilling its obligations,” Philippe Douste-Blazy, France’s foreign minister, said yesterday. Unless Ankara changed its behaviour, “it seems to me necessary to review Turkey’s EU membership timetable”.

The issue is set to come to a head at an EU summit next month. But Olli Rehn, EU enlargement commissioner, held out hope that the looming “train wreck” over Turkey’s membership could yet be averted. “While there’s a will, there’s a way,” he said.

The European Commission had been considering whether to recommend the formal suspension of three or more of the 34 remaining negotiating “chapters” of Turkey’s membership talks because of Ankara’s failure to meet a key EU demand over Cyprus.

On Wednesday Mr Rehn announced that the Commission would not make a recommendation at this stage.

Officials said that Brussels would probably set out the likely penalties for Turkey in early to mid-December, ahead of the EU summit. But Mr Rehn’s staff fears that if the EU takes too tough a stance with Ankara, either the talks will prove impossible to revive or Turkey will choose to walk away.

“At this point, much of the responsibility for continuing the [EU] accession process lies with the EU rather than with Turkey,” said the Turkish government in an official statement. Ankara added that the issue of Cyprus should not be linked to its own membership bid.

But the Turkish statement appeared to acknowledge that its preparations for EU membership needed to be stepped up. “We will correct the problems stemming from implementation,” said Abdullah Gul, Turkish foreign minister.

Wednesday’s Commission report highlighted the issue that could bring the negotiations to a halt – the country’s refusal to open up its ports to vessels from Cyprus, which is an EU member but which does not have diplomatic ties with Ankara.

The report also criticised Turkey for letting the pace of reform slow and expressed its concern over prosecutions of writers and journalists for criticising "Turkishness" and the Turkish state. The report voiced the Commission's concern that Turkey's judiciary was not yet sufficiently independent, that its military was not fully under civilian control and that some cases of torture were still being reported.

Mr Rehn said he hoped the Turkish parliament would amend the article in the country's penal code that the Commission believes restricts freedom of speech. He added that a Finnish attempt to broker a deal between Turkey, Cyprus and the self-styled Republic of Northern Cyprus was "the last opportunity to make serious progress for some years to come on this issue".

Such a deal would remove the biggest threat to Turkey's candidacy. However, many EU diplomats believe the likelihood of a Finnish breakthrough is slim. A ministerial meeting scheduled for last Sunday to reach a deal was cancelled.

Under the Finnish proposal, the Northern Cypriot port of Famagusta would come under EU management and be opened to trade with the rest of the EU. At the same time, the UN would take charge of the neighbouring town of Varosha, to which the internationally recognised Greek Cypriot government lays claim.

Mr Rehn also addressed wider public fears about the pace of EU expansion with new guidelines for future enlargements, but insisted the EU should not slam the door on any country with ambitions to join the club.

His paper on the union's "capacity to integrate new members" said any future enlargement should only come after the union had modernised its creaking institutions, probably by salvaging parts of the moribund EU constitution.

Learning the lessons of the difficult negotiations with Bulgaria and Romania – which will join the EU on January 1 – Mr Rehn said that future talks would have to tackle crime and corruption at an earlier stage.

But both he and José Manuel Barroso, European Commission president, have resisted pressure from politicians in France, Germany and elsewhere to make the EU's "absorption capacity" a new condition for membership and have refused to define the eventual eastern borders of the club.

Turks' Bid To Join Europe Stalls On Cyprus And Rights, Official Warns (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky And James Kanter

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

ISTANBUL, Nov. 8 — The governing commission of the European Union on Wednesday issued its strongest warning yet to Turkey to open its ports to Cyprus and make more progress on human rights or face a possible suspension of talks over allowing the country to join the organization.

Speaking after the release of a report highly critical of Turkey's efforts to make changes requested by the European Union, Olli Rehn, the union's expansion commissioner, delivered what appeared to be an ultimatum to Turkey: soften the intransigence over Cyprus or risk the collapse of the European Union bid.

"Failure to implement obligations will affect the overall progress of negotiations," Mr. Rehn warned. "This is likely to be the last opportunity to make real, serious progress for some years to come on the issue of Cyprus."

Turkey has refused to meet an end-of-year deadline set by the European Union to open its ports and airports to the Greek-speaking part of Cyprus, which belongs to the organization. Turkey insists it will not compromise on Cyprus unless the European Union lifts a trade embargo against the northern Turkish side of Cyprus.

The report, which also highlighted shortcomings on issues like minority rights and freedom of speech, did not call for an immediate halt in the talks with Turkey. But European Union officials said the harsh tone of the report made it increasingly likely that a summit meeting of European Union leaders in mid-December would at least consider a partial suspension of the negotiations.

"The pace has slowed during the past year and significant further efforts are needed," the report said.

The Turkish prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, sought to play down the criticism. "For us, the E.U. process maintains its importance," he said. "Our aim is to achieve the maximum possible. Our struggle will continue."

A poll published here on Tuesday by the International Strategic Research Organization showed that two-thirds of Turks would rather suspend membership talks with the European Union than give ground over Cyprus. "If the E.U. fulfills its promise to end the isolation of Northern Cyprus, then we will open our ports," said Egemen Bagis, a senior adviser to Mr. Erdogan and a member of the governing Justice and Development Party. “If European leaders want reforms to continue in Turkey, if they want their safety to be assured in an unstable region, if they want to assure an alternative energy supply, then they should show us some encouragement,” he said.

In the cafes, mosques and streets of Istanbul, the overwhelming feeling was indifference. “Here we go again, yet another report from the E.U. criticizing us,” said Gurol Yilmaz, 24, a waiter at a cafe in the bustling Taksim neighborhood. “Most Turks don’t really care. The E.U. will never accept a Muslim country.”

Membership talks between Turkey, with 70 million people, and the European Union cannot continue apace if Turkey fails to meet its obligations toward the organization by the end of the year, the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, warned Wednesday. “Otherwise, the E.U. will have to draw the appropriate consequences,” she said. “A simple ‘Let’s keep on going as before’ will not be possible.”

The report also rebuked Turkey for its failure to meet minimum standards on human rights and cited concerns over the rights of women, Kurds and religious minorities.

Disease Expert From China Is Nominated As WHO Director (WSJ)

By Betsy McKay

Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

The World Health Organization nominated Chinese infectious-diseases expert Margaret Chan to lead the United Nations health agency, underscoring China's rising prominence and mounting pressure on the Chinese government to improve its cooperation on global health crises such as avian flu.

The landslide victory by Dr. Chan, 59 years old, over four other finalists in voting by WHO's 34-country executive board essentially assures her of a 5½-year term as the next director-general of the agency, one of the most important leadership positions in public health. The nomination faces a vote today by the full WHO governing body; no one proposed by the executive board has ever been rejected for the top job.

China campaigned hard for Dr. Chan. The push, led by Vice Premier Wu Yi and President Hu Jintao, was unusual because the five permanent-member countries of the U.N.'s Security Council, which includes China, traditionally haven't backed candidates to lead WHO. Sha Zukang, China's ambassador to Switzerland, said Dr. Chan's selection is a landmark for China. "We know there are great responsibilities and high expectations," he said.

While it isn't clear exactly what swayed 24 of 34 countries to support Dr. Chan in four rapid rounds of voting in a closed-door meeting in Geneva, she is known for having a combination of scientific skill, on-the-ground experience and political dexterity that will be needed to navigate challenges such as halting the spread of pandemic flu.

China has been criticized for failing to disclose cases of avian flu and severe acute respiratory syndrome, and for not sharing virus samples that could speed research and vaccine development. The Chinese government has been more forthcoming recently, and its staunch support of Dr. Chan's candidacy suggests officials are willing to make further changes.

"This is a moment of personal honor and deep personal responsibility," Dr. Chan said in a brief speech yesterday. "I do not take this lightly." She insisted during her campaign that she wouldn't bend to Chinese political interests.

A top official at China's Ministry of Health said yesterday that government officials "try our best to cooperate with the international community."

When asked whether China would try to influence Dr. Chan, a former schoolteacher who got a medical degree from the University of Western Ontario in Canada, the official responded: "No one from China will say we will sacrifice ourselves to meet the expectations of other parties...If the WHO, when they are dealing with the relations with China...don't take into consideration the Chinese people, there will be a problem."

The U.S. is one of the countries believed to have voted for Dr. Chan, who emerged as the heavy favorite in five rounds of voting Monday that narrowed the field to five finalists.

Mike Leavitt, U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Services and leader of the U.S. delegation in Geneva, said he is "confident she will ensure WHO's role as the premier global health agency, guided by scientific excellence and well-prepared to meet the many challenges it faces."

DOJ_NMG_0092181

As Hong Kong's top health official, Dr. Chan showed the mettle to make controversial decisions, including culling 1.5 million poultry feared to be spreading the H5N1 avian-flu virus to humans in 1997. The move exacted a brutal economic toll on farmers but helped stamp out the world's first outbreak of the virus. That strategy now is the standard approach to controlling avian flu.

TERRORISM NEWS:

3 Alleged Hamas Militants Go On Trial For Terror Plot (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092185

(AP) - AMMAN, Jordan-Three Hamas militants went on trial Wednesday for conspiring to attack Israeli businessmen, Jordanian intelligence officers and various other locations in Jordan.

Ayman Naji Daraghmeh, 34, Ahmed Abu Rabee, 27, and Ahmed Abu Thiyab, appeared in court but did not submit pleas because they have not appointed lawyers. The trial adjourned to Nov. 15 to allow the defendants time to obtain counsel.

The defendants were also charged with illegal possession of weapons and ammunition.

In April, Jordanian authorities arrested 20 alleged Hamas militants on suspicion of monitoring Jordanian intelligence officers and foreigner tourists to plan for possible attacks. Authorities released all but the three, apparently for lack of evidence.

Al-Daraghmeh gave authorities the location of several weapons caches, the indictment sheet said.

The three, Jordanians of Palestinian origin, confessed in May on Jordanian state TV to conspiring to carry out terrorist attacks and to acquiring weapons and ammunition for Hamas. Al-Daraghmeh said he received he received orders from a high level Hamas leader living in Syria.

Hamas denied the accusations, claiming Jordan was attempting to undermine the Palestinian government, which it leads.

The militants were also charged with monitoring and photographing the Israeli embassy, the residences of the ambassador and other staff, as well as the offices of Jordanian businesses that have dealings with Israeli companies.

If convicted the three men could face the death penalty.

Four To Change Pleas In Northwest Ecoterrorism Case (AP)

By Jeff Barnard

AP, November 9, 2006

GRANTS PASS, Ore. (AP) — Four people awaiting trial on charges they were part of an ecoterrorism cell that caused $20 million in damages from firebombings around the Northwest are due in federal court on Thursday to change their pleas.

Attorneys for the defendants and the prosecution refused to comment on terms of the plea agreements that will be put before Judge Ann Aiken in U.S. District Court in Eugene.

A total of 13 people were indicted out of Eugene as part of an investigation known as Operation Backfire. Six have pleaded guilty, agreeing to testify against the others, and three are fugitives. A 14th person, Prescott, Ariz., bookstore owner William C. Rodgers, described as the leader of the cell, committed suicide in jail just before he was to be sent to Oregon to face charges.

Related cases are being prosecuted out of Washington and California.

The Oregon defendants were charged with arsons from 1996 to 2001 that were claimed by the Earth Liberation Front and the Animal Liberation Front in Oregon, Washington, California, Wyoming and Colorado.

Authorities said a Eugene-based group calling itself The Family set firebombs around the Northwest to stop logging, wild horse roundups, genetic engineering of plants, sport utility vehicle sales and the expansion of a Vail, Colo., ski resort into endangered lynx habitat.

For years, investigators came up with little more than the remains of five-gallon plastic buckets that had been filled with diesel and ignited with homemade timing devices.

The firebombings stopped after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Then a special taskforce adopted a cold case approach and convinced an informant to go to members of The Family with a hidden recording device.

Nathan Frazer Block, 25, of Olympia, Wash., is charged with conspiring to commit arson and topple a high-voltage electric transmission tower in Central Oregon just before the change of the millennium, setting fire to SUVs at the Romania Chevrolet Truck Center in Eugene in 2001 and attempted arson and arson at the Jefferson Poplar Farm in Clatskanie in 2001.

Jonathan Christopher Mark Paul, 40, of Ashland, a wildland firefighter and animal rights activist, is charged with conspiracy to commit arson and topple the electrical tower, and setting fire to a horse slaughterhouse in Redmond in 1997.

Daniel McGowan, 32, of New York City, who was working for a nonprofit law firm helping abused women when he was arrested, is charged with conspiracy to commit arson and toppling the electrical tower, setting fire to the Superior Lumber Co. office in Glendale in 2001, and attempted arson and arson at the tree farm.

Joyanna L. Zacher, 28, of Olympia, Wash., is charged with conspiracy to commit arson, toppling the electric tower, firebombing the SUV dealership, and attempted arson and arson at the tree farm.

Democratic Victory May Kill Surveillance Bills (GOVEXEC)

DOJ_NMG_0092186

By Andrew Noyes, National Journal's Technology Daily

Government Executive, November 9, 2006

The new Democratic-led House could bode well for the civil-liberties crowd. The most pressing issue for the 110th Congress will be quashing efforts they say would allow the continuation of an eavesdropping program authorized by President Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Caroline Fredrickson, director of the Washington office for the American Civil Liberties Union, said the shift in leadership may mean "a very profound change" in how lawmakers address the electronic wiretapping initiative of the National Security Agency.

Before recessing for the mid-term election, the House passed a bill, H.R. 5825, to overhaul rules for wiretaps without warrants. The Senate companion measure, S. 2453, did not get a floor vote.

Bush pushed hard in the run-up to the election for Congress to codify the program, Fredrickson said. "I think that is dead."

The House now can move ahead with "what it should have been doing right from the beginning," she said, which is figuring out the broadness of the program's scope, how many Americans have been spied on and what has been done with the information.

Lawmakers first must return for a short, post-election session, which she said could be "rife with danger." "It provides the greatest opportunity for late-night maneuvers," she said, adding that the ACLU will be vigilant in "scrubbing" any bills that pass.

Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, said her group will look to the new Congress to "be more skeptical of the president's claims that it's necessary to sacrifice civil liberties for national security."

Before House Intelligence or Judiciary committees take action on NSA spying or similar proposals that arise, she said she hopes they will "engage in the kind of vigorous oversight, investigation and fact-finding that really has been absent in the last four years."

There will probably not be "dramatic rollbacks of national-security-related legislation," like the controversial sections of the USA PATRIOT Act that were reinstated by the 109th Congress, Harris said. One provision involves a special subpoena power that lets the FBI scour library and Internet provider files without search warrants.

George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley said he looks to the new House to exercise meaningful "oversight after a long and dangerous hiatus." Given the "largely comatose" status of the current Congress, a "great deal of improper or potentially criminal conduct" could have been ignored, he said.

The question of whether Democrats will fight hard on issues like torture and criminal rights for detainees also was on the minds of civil-liberties advocates. Fredrickson said the party will be "pretty cautious" with an eye toward winning the 2008 presidential election, and Turley agreed.

The party may be calculating "how they can avoid doing anything that's controversial," Fredrickson said, which would be "a real shame" because voters asked for change. "They don't want just a passive Democratic Party," she said.

Lisa Graves, deputy director for the Center for National Security Studies, said missteps that have been taken by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, a partnership between the FBI and local law enforcement agencies aimed at tackling terrorism, also must be examined. In particular, she cited reports revealed through Freedom of Information Act requests that the task force has spied on Americans who oppose the Iraq war and other administration policies.

One proposal offered this year would halt funding for the NSA's warrantless wiretapping and "help restore the rule of law," Graves said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Rights Panel Weighs FBI Tactics In Hamoodi Search (COLTRIB)

By MATTHEW LeBLANC

Columbia (MO) Tribune, November 9, 2006

The Columbia Human Rights Commission will consider asking the city council to approve a resolution in support of an Iraqi-American man whose southwest Columbia home was raided by the FBI.

Hamoodi

Federal agents in September searched the Woodberry Court home of Shakir Hamoodi. The FBI has since repeatedly declined to give a reason for the search involving the 54-year-old grocery store owner who also has been an outspoken critic of the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0092187

At a meeting last night, supporters of Hamoodi urged commission members to accept a draft resolution that calls for the government to speed up its investigation and publicly release its findings. The measure also asks the FBI to apologize to Hamoodi and his family for searching the home.

Steve Jacobs, a peace activist who spoke last night at the meeting, said the resolution does not claim Hamoodi did nothing wrong. He said the measure was designed to show support for Hamoodi and the local Muslim community.

"We feel like one of our own is being unnecessarily targeted for harassment," Jacobs said. "We think these sort of symbolic actions would go far to show the FBI that we support" Hamoodi.

After hearing a speech by Jacobs that portrayed Hamoodi as a business owner and charity worker caught in a web of investigative excess, commission members expressed some reservations about whether forwarding the resolution to the city council would be appropriate.

In the end, the human rights panel agreed to consider the measure - but only with the consent of Hamoodi, who was not present.

Glenn Glasgow, who represents the Fifth Ward on the commission, said commissioners typically receive complaints from those who believe their rights have been violated. After that, he said, an investigation is conducted.

Hamoodi has not contacted the commission.

"Even in the absence of a complaint, all we really have are a lot of conclusions about what happened to Shakir, but nothing from him," Glasgow said.

Commission Chairwoman Marie Glaze said the panel would contact Hamoodi and then review the resolution. A report would later be sent to the city council.

"We're going to do this as quickly as we can," Glaze said.

Hamoodi said yesterday he was "surprised" at the show of support, but did not say whether he would agree to the resolution.

It is also unclear whether the city council would agree to accept the resolution. In the past, the panel has been reluctant to vote on issues that do not directly involve things related to city policy.

City Counselor Fred Boeckmann cautioned that "the commission does not have jurisdiction over the FBI" and questioned the usefulness of a resolution.

"It seems like the right thing to do in our society," Hamoodi supporter Jeff Stack said yesterday.

Jeff Lanza, a spokesman for the FBI office in Kansas City, declined to offer more information on the Hamoodi case.

F.B.I. Evacuates Part Fort Hood Housing Development (NBC6CTX)

NBC 6 Central Texas, November 9, 2006

Part of a housing development on Fort Hood remained evacuated through Wednesday night.

An F.B.I. spokesperson said a soldier returned from Iraq and noticed items missing from his luggage.

Replacing those items was a jar filled with an unfamiliar substance. The soldier called Fort Hood authorities.

Initial testing by the F.B.I. and Fort Hood showed it might have dangerous materials, but upon further testing, it was found not to be hazardous.

Fort Hood is still investigating its origins. Residents from the Kuma Village were housed off post for the night, but are allowed to return home Thursday.

Agency Considers A-Plants' Vulnerability (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov 8 — With construction of many new nuclear reactors under discussion, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is grappling with the question of whether they should be designed to withstand a Sept. 11-style airplane attack.

The commission has told its staff to study the vulnerabilities of the four new reactor designs, two of which it has already approved. But it has decided not to make the nuclear power industry meet security requirements any tougher than those for existing plants, which were designed before suicide airliner attacks, and even before the development of such airplanes.

Planes are not on the list of weapons that reactors must be prepared to survive. One of the five commissioners, Gregory B. Jaczko, has called for the panel to require design changes to reduce vulnerability, but the other four seem unpersuaded.

Speaking about protection against aircraft attacks, Mr. Jaczko said in an interview, "We've left it in the hands of Transportation Security Administration, the Federal Aviation Administration and the reactor vendors, who are building these plants, to do what they think is right in this area, and to me that's clearly not the answer."

"We should be requiring they design these plants to withstand such attacks," he said.

One of one of the four new reactor designs, called the European Pressurized Reactor, is advertised as being less vulnerable to planes.

The commission has required that operators of reactors that are already producing electricity plan what steps they would take in case of airplane attacks to mitigate the effect and minimize releases of radiation. Mr. Jaczko said that improving the new designs before concrete was poured could sharply reduce the number of "mitigating actions" the operators would have to take a plane.attack.

But another member of the commission, Edward McGaffigan Jr., said, "We think we've done enough."

In analyzing security, nuclear engineers talk about multiple components that an attacker would have to reach and disable, which they call "target sets." New reactors, Mr. McGaffigan said, have "a terribly complex set of target sets that makes it highly improbable that a terrorist would succeed."

The commission should not make companies that want licenses to build and operate plants treat an airplane attack the way they would treat an earthquake, flood or other external threat for which they are already designed, he said.

A senior staff member of the commission said, "We want to be able to stand up to answer the logical question: 'Guys, did you look at the aircraft?' We want to be able to say yes, and we're confident that there is no issue, or if there is an issue, we've taken appropriate measures."

The staff member said the commission was stopping short of setting new requirements. He said he could not be identified because he was talking about matters that the five commissioners had not yet settled on.

At the Nuclear Energy Institute, the industry's trade association, Adrian Heymer, senior director for new plant deployment, said designers had analyzed existing plants and made many changes that cost little but made the new designs more difficult to attack. But, in general, Mr. Heymer said, protecting against terrorism was a government function.

"Refineries, tall buildings, those are the responsibility of federal government to protect," he said.

The commission is scheduled to meet on Thursday at its headquarters in Rockville, Md., to discuss licensing procedures for new reactors.

At the Union of Concerned Scientists, an advocacy group, David Lochbaum, a nuclear engineer, said that in the early 1980s the commission had convened outside experts to talk about hardening new reactors against plane crashes.

Industry experts, Mr. Lochbaum said, talked about some simple steps. For example, backup electricity generators could be positioned on two sides of the plant instead of in one place. Control rooms could be put in less vulnerable spots, and the pools that hold radioactive spent fuel could be hardened. The studies were classified after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, he said.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, a critic of the nuclear power industry and the commission, says more should be done. In a statement, Mr. Markey said the commission should not only require design features to protect against airplane attacks but should also consider attacks by large truck bombs.

The commission has required substantial changes at existing reactors but has been reluctant to consider the threat of terrorism in the same way it handles other risks. For example, it has refused to consider the risk of terrorism in environmental impact statements, arguing that in contrast to earthquakes or mechanical failures, it does not know what probability to apply to attacks.

A California group, San Luis Obispo Mothers for Peace, won a decision in the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit saying the regulatory commission must consider terrorism.

Pacific Gas & Electric, a California utility, has asked the Supreme Court to hear the case.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Ousts Embattled Rumsfeld; Democrats Near Control Of Senate (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher, Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

President Bush emerged from an election in which his party took what he described as a "thumping" and ousted Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday, saying that a "fresh perspective" is needed to guide the military through the difficult war in Iraq.

Speaking at a White House news conference the day after Democrats took control of the House of Representatives, and possibly the Senate, an apparently chastened and conciliatory Bush said he was nominating former CIA director Robert M. Gates to replace the long-embattled Rumsfeld.

After six years of a presidency that has been about drawing lines against the Democrats and taunting them as weak, Bush presented a sharp about-face in an appearance in the White House East Room. "What's changed today is the election is over," he said, "and the Democrats won."

Acknowledging that the elections amounted to a rebuke of Republican leadership, Bush said voters had signaled they wanted cooperation and problem-solving in Washington.

If anything, he seemed to greet defeat with an air of relief, as though the results had allowed him to abandon an all-is-well pretense that was increasingly at odds with his actual political circumstances.

He said that he had begun to contemplate Rumsfeld's exit before the election -- even while he was publicly vowing that he would keep the defense secretary through the end of his term and insisting that polls forecasting Republican defeat were wrong. "I thought we were going to do fine yesterday," Bush insisted. "Shows what I know." But "win or lose, Bob Gates was going to become the nominee."

Rumsfeld understood as well as he did, Bush said, that "Iraq is not working well enough, fast enough."

The defense secretary's removal was part of a broader White House effort to restructure Bush's presidency in the wake of the Democratic victory. Beyond the switch at the Pentagon, White House aides in recent weeks developed an agenda designed to attract bipartisan support, including an increase in the minimum wage -- a longtime Democratic priority -- as well as comprehensive immigration legislation, energy measures, and the extension of the No Child Left Behind education program.

"The message yesterday was clear," Bush said. "The American people want their leaders in Washington to set aside partisan differences, conduct ourselves in an ethical manner, and work together to address the challenges facing our nation."

Despite the sharp confrontation that has characterized his tenure, Bush "will make the best of the situation he finds," predicted Ari Fleischer, his former press secretary. "If that means he'll compromise, he'll do so. The question is, will the Republican base let him? And will the Democratic base let Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid compromise?"

Some senior voices from the Republican base already are urging Bush to forget cooperation. "I guess you're supposed to say that, regardless of whether you're actually planning on doing it. I hope he doesn't really mean it," said Grover G. Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. Instead, he said, Bush should use the next two years to define differences between the parties heading into the 2008 election.

Although the White House had insisted repeatedly that it was not making contingency plans for a Democratic victory, an official said yesterday that Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten assigned deputies Karl Rove and Joel D. Kaplan, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, counselor Dan Bartlett, and other aides to begin "quietly preparing in case this eventuality came," the official said.

The removal of Rumsfeld stunned Washington, because Bush had stubbornly resisted calls to dump his Pentagon chief for years despite rising pressure from within his own party and the ranks of retired generals. He had twice refused Rumsfeld's offered resignation during scandals over military detainment and interrogation methods, and he had rebuffed bids by his chief of staff to remove the defense secretary. Just last week, Bush declared publicly that he wanted Rumsfeld to remain at the Pentagon for two more years.

Gates served as CIA director and deputy national security adviser in the administration of Bush's father, whose foreign and defense policies have long been implicitly criticized as weak by some senior officials of the current administration. He is currently a member of a bipartisan panel headed by the former president's secretary of state, James A. Baker III, that is studying the Iraq situation and is scheduled to make policy recommendations in the next few weeks. Signaling a likely shift in Iraq policy for an administration that has been loath to make significant changes in how it wages the increasingly unpopular war, Bush yesterday made several references to the upcoming Baker report.

While emphasizing his campaign insistence that the United States cannot leave Iraq without achieving victory, Bush said that Gates "can help make the necessary adjustments in our approach." He said his national security team would meet with members of both parties in coming weeks to brief them on developments in Iraq and listen to their ideas for moving forward.

Rumsfeld earned a small army of enemies inside and outside the Pentagon during his tumultuous tenure, and his critics rejoiced at his departure yesterday. Just minutes before Bush announced the defense secretary's departure, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), suggested at her inaugural news conference as likely the next House speaker that the president dump Rumsfeld in response to the election. She and other Democratic leaders later welcomed the move and said they hoped it would prove to be the beginning, not the end, of change in Bush's leadership in Iraq.

"I hope the departure of Mr. Rumsfeld will mark a fresh start toward a new policy in Iraq," Pelosi said.

A number of Republicans were equally hopeful that the president's apparent openness would culminate in policy changes.

"This change in leadership at the Pentagon is the right opportunity for the administration to develop a new strategy," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine). "The current approach has not led to a reduction in the insurgent violence that our troops and the Iraqi people face every day."

Bush cautioned the nation's enemies not to take heart from Rumsfeld's removal or the election results. "Do not be joyful," he said. "Do not confuse the workings of our democracy with a lack of will."

Still, some of those waging the insurgency in Iraq reacted with glee to Rumsfeld's ouster. "We hope that Bush will go next, after this butcher, who's responsible for killing tens of thousands of civilian people in Iraq and Afghanistan," Abu al-Zubeir Dulami, a member of the Mujaheddin Shura Council, an umbrella organization for al-Qaeda in Iraq and other Sunni insurgent groups, said by telephone from Ramadi. "We consider it a big accomplishment for the people of al-Qaeda in Iraq."

Bush said that Rumsfeld would serve until Gates is confirmed. White House officials were exploring yesterday whether the current Senate could act on his nomination during a lame-duck session later this month or if the matter would have to wait until the new Senate convenes Jan. 3. His confirmation would raise questions about the fate of other top Pentagon officials, particularly Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England and Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence Stephen A. Cambone. Cabinet secretaries typically get to bring in their own teams.

Gates has privately expressed deep reservations about the situation in Iraq, according to at least one person who has spoken to him about it in the context of the Baker group's deliberations. "He is basically very concerned about what is happening over there, and he thought that bad mistakes were made -- and he was frustrated that the administration was unable to adjust and make the changes that he feels needed to be made."

A Meek Departure From The War Cabinet (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

With a wry smile, Donald H. Rumsfeld gently alluded to the controversies of his tenure as defense secretary, perhaps the most consequential since that of Robert S. McNamara during the Vietnam War.

Thanking the president for the opportunity to serve, Rumsfeld said in a brief Oval Office session yesterday afternoon that the experience brought to mind the words of Winston Churchill -- "something to the effect," he quipped, "that I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

It was a rare melancholy moment for the alpha male and onetime Princeton wrestler who ran roughshod over the military brass, sparred bitterly with the media and mounted fierce rear-guard battles against the State Department during a six-year run that saw him become, first, an unlikely television celebrity and then the face of an unpopular war.

Though Bush affectionately patted Rumsfeld on the shoulder as he ushered him out of the Oval Office, there was little sugarcoating the reality that the defense chief, 74, was being offered as a sacrificial lamb amid the repudiation of Bush and his Iraq policy that the American electorate delivered on Tuesday.

Andrew H. Card Jr., then the White House chief of staff, had actually recommended this course of action to Bush two years ago. The fact that the defense chief lasted so long in the job was essentially a reflection of the fact that, in firing Rumsfeld, "you are basically admitting you made some serious mistakes in the conduct of the war," observed former White House chief of staff Leon E. Panetta.

What is certain to be long debated is Rumsfeld's legacy at the Pentagon, which involved two tours. The first lasted 14 months in 1975 and 1976, when, at just 43, he served as the youngest defense secretary ever under President Gerald R. Ford and as a close ally of then-White House chief of staff Dick Cheney. (It was Rumsfeld who first recruited Cheney into the Nixon administration.)

Admirers and detractors alike credit Rumsfeld with an unusual willingness to question prevailing assumptions, such as where U.S. troops should be deployed overseas, and to shake up a Pentagon bureaucracy that he regarded as an impediment to making changes necessary to confront new and evolving threats to the United States.

Where they split is over whether Rumsfeld had the capacity to carry out true institutional change at the Pentagon, since from Day One he alienated top military brass and powerful congressional figures with his brusque manner and confusing decision-making process.

On Iraq, Rumsfeld found himself increasingly questioned by generals, lawmakers and others over miscalculations that included not planning adequately for the post-invasion occupation and failing to recognize soon enough the nature of the insurgency, as well as what they regarded as his derelict handling over the past five years of the detainee and interrogation controversies at the Pentagon.

With Rumsfeld's departure, most of the top Pentagon civilians responsible for planning the invasion and early occupation of Iraq are gone.

Early into the Iraq occupation, Rumsfeld was being compared by many military men to McNamara, resented by the military for the perception that he micromanaged matters during the Vietnam War.

DOJ_NMG_0092191

"McNamara, for four years of Vietnam going down the toilet, was absolutely convinced with a religious zeal that what he was doing was the right thing," Thomas E. White, who was Rumsfeld's first Army secretary, once said. "It wasn't until 30 years later that it dawned on him that he was dead wrong. And I think you have the same thing with Don Rumsfeld."

Aides said Bush began thinking about making a change about a month ago, increasingly convinced that he needed to do something dramatic to shake up an Iraq situation that was deteriorating by the day.

"It was an evolving process," said one senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal deliberations. "It was a cumulative effect of where we are in the war, where the president wants to take us in the next two years."

Bush brought up the subject at one of his regularly scheduled weekly meetings with Rumsfeld, the first of several searching conversations about what to do in Iraq. But the president resisted making the change until after the elections out of concern that it would get caught up in the white-hot campaigns.

In the past, Vice President Cheney resisted proposals to dump Rumsfeld, according to a book by The Washington Post's Bob Woodward. White House officials said they did not know whether he did so again this time. Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride said the vice president "doesn't discuss the advice given to the president."

Bush was already thinking about sacking Rumsfeld when he met with news service reporters on Nov. 1, but, by his own account, he decided to mislead them to preserve the secret. One reporter asked Bush if he wanted Cheney and Rumsfeld to remain through the end of his term, on Jan. 20, 2009. The president answered yes.

In fact, Bush was then busily searching for a replacement for Rumsfeld. Former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a close friend and ally of Bush's father who is heading a blue-ribbon commission studying options for Iraq, had praised Robert M. Gates to the president, but he did not recommend him for the Pentagon job, nor did he recommend that Rumsfeld be ousted, the senior official said.

Other candidates were considered, but Bush met only with Gates, on Sunday at his Texas ranch. After flying back to Washington on Election Day, Bush met with Rumsfeld in the Oval Office to tell him that he was going forward with the move. The president sat down with Gates again at the White House yesterday morning before announcing the appointment.

Although Rumsfeld contributed position papers to the Bush campaign in 2000, he was not a close member of the Texas governor's brain trust; and he was not the president-elect's first choice for defense secretary. But Bush turned to him at Cheney's suggestion, made in part as a way of providing a counterweight to Colin L. Powell, who had already been chosen as secretary of state. Conservatives were nervous about the power that the moderate, multilateralist Powell, a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, might wield over defense as well as foreign policy.

Rumsfeld's assertive voice on foreign policy matters stems from the early days of the Bush administration, when he advised the new president to limit his involvement in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and to adopt a tough line on issues including North Korea and China. Although Rumsfeld was considered less an ideologue than an unyielding iconoclast, he brought with him to the Pentagon's executive suites and advisory councils a collection of neoconservatives with strong views on the Middle East, Russia, China and other foreign policy issues. They clashed at nearly every turn with officials of Powell's State Department, setting up an internal conflict that would run through Bush's entire first term.

Rumsfeld's early efforts to speed military transformation were stymied by resistance to requested budget increases. Many in Congress -- in both parties -- were put off by his abrasive style, and he had already alienated many in the Defense Department. There were widespread rumors in the summer of 2001 that he would not last through Bush's first year. Then came the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and Rumsfeld suddenly appeared on the cover of the conservative National Review, drawn with bulging muscles and wearing a Superman costume. Once the Taliban and al-Qaeda were vanquished in Afghanistan, he quickly turned his attention to Iraq as a testing ground for his transformation ideas.

"There is an upside and a downside to Rumsfeld," said one retired four-star general who had been close to Rumsfeld and who spoke on the condition of anonymity to speak more candidly. "The upside is that he came to the job with a valid vision of the need for, and ideas about how to transform the military and to make it more suitable for the new century. The downside is that he muddled the [Iraq] war so badly that nobody is ever going to remember the upside."

Rumsfeld seemed uninterested in the ideas of others around him, particularly those within the uniformed services. By numerous accounts of those who worked with him, he did not encourage the questioning of his ideas or orders and was quick to ridicule ideas with which he did not agree.

Eliot A. Cohen, a professor of strategic studies at Johns Hopkins University who closely follows the Pentagon, offered a more sympathetic account of Rumsfeld's tenure.

"This is a guy who has devoted an enormous amount of his career to service and doing his best as he understood it," said Cohen. "To a large extent, he got turned into a scapegoat and also a caricature -- the fire-breathing bully. My experience with him is that he could be an excellent listener.

DOJ_NMG_0092192

"He deserves his share of the blame for what happened," Cohen added. "but to think that it is entirely his fault . . . would be missing the point."

Rumsfeld's account yesterday in the Oval Office of the fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan might also stand as his defense of his record: "The first war of the 21st century . . . is not well known, it was not well understood. It is complex for people to comprehend."

Rumsfeld Resigns; Bush Vows "To Find Common Ground"; Focus Is On Virginia (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg, Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — Faced with the collapse of his Republican majority in Congress, President Bush responded swiftly on Wednesday by announcing the departure of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and vowing to work with Democrats "to find common ground" on the war in Iraq and domestic issues.

With Democrats having recaptured the House and control of the Senate depending on the outcome of a single unsettled contest in Virginia, Mr. Bush, sounding alternately testy and conciliatory at a White House news conference, said he was "obviously disappointed." He portrayed the results as a cumulative "thumping" of Republicans and conceded that as head of the party, he bore some responsibility.

In Virginia, though Senator George Allen had not conceded Wednesday night, the Democrat, Jim Webb, was confident enough of victory to begin talking about transition. Mr. Allen's defeat would mean that the Democrats would control the Senate for the first time since 2002 and would control both houses of Congress.

Just days after telling reporters that he would keep Mr. Rumsfeld on for the rest of his term, Mr. Bush said that the two had agreed "after a series of thoughtful conversations" that it was time for Mr. Rumsfeld, a magnet for criticism about management of the war, to go.

The president asked Robert M. Gates, who was director of central intelligence under Mr. Bush's father, to take over at the Pentagon at a time when the administration is under intense pressure to develop a new approach in Iraq.

Senior White House officials said the Rumsfeld resignation had been discussed for weeks, coming as the violence intensified in Iraq and a growing number of critics — including Republicans — called for the secretary's firing.

Several weeks ago, with the White House's own internal polls showing Democrats making gains on antiwar sentiment, Mr. Bush and a few top aides began a series of secret meetings to discuss what he knew would be an explosive announcement.

Meanwhile, the president was holding heart-to-heart talks with Mr. Rumsfeld. As the longest-serving member of Mr. Bush's cabinet — and a member of Mr. Bush's father's cabinet as well — the defense secretary had always enjoyed Mr. Bush's unconditional public support.

The impending resignation was so closely held that the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, did not learn of it until Mr. Rumsfeld called him 45 minutes before it was announced. The White House was also wary about how the news might affect the election.

"It's like when you get asked about the dollar," one senior White House official said in describing why Mr. Bush gave no hint of the resignation when asked directly about it last week. "If you don't give the same answer every time, the markets move."

The timing of the announcement left no doubt that Mr. Bush wanted to make a dramatic demonstration of flexibility in dealing with a war that has come to define his presidency.

The White House said it had not yet determined whether to ask the departing Republican-controlled Senate to take up the Gates nomination or to wait for the new Senate, potentially in the hands of Democrats, to take it up next year. But Mr. Warner said he would like to see Mr. Gates confirmed by the end of the year, if possible.

Tuesday's vote ripped apart the political landscape in Washington just two years after Mr. Bush won re-election and declared that he intended to expend his political capital on behalf of an ambitious agenda.

While members of both parties said the election was about the war as much as anything, Republicans opened a debate about whether they had also been undone by failing to stick closely enough to conservative principles. Republicans in the House moved toward overhauling their leadership, and presidential contenders in both parties began preparing for an almost immediate start to the 2008 campaign.

Democrats picked up at least 28 seats in the House, putting them in control of that chamber for the first time in 12 years.

By midday Wednesday, Democrats had won one of the two Senate races that had been left undecided overnight, claiming a seat in Montana from the incumbent Republican, Conrad Burns.

In Virginia, the Democrat, Mr. Webb, held a lead of less than 0.5 percent of the 2.3 million votes cast, aides to Mr. Allen suggested on Wednesday evening that he could acknowledge defeat as early as Thursday afternoon.

DOJ_NMG_0092193

After spending weeks questioning Democratic approaches to the economy and national security as dangerous for the nation, Mr. Bush said he recognized "that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress" in Iraq. He said he intended to "work with the new Congress in a bipartisan way" and invited leading Democrats to meet with him at the White House beginning on Thursday.

Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who is now expected to become the first female speaker of the House, said Mr. Bush had invited her to lunch, calling her "Madam Speaker-elect."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who spearheaded his party's campaign to take back the Senate, said he had received calls from Mr. Bush's press secretary, Tony Snow, and his chief political adviser, Karl Rove, as well as the president himself. Mr. Schumer said he thought it meant the White House was serious about reaching out.

"He was gracious," the senator said of Mr. Bush. "He said, 'You did an amazing job, congratulations.' He said, 'I wish you were on my team.' And I said, 'No you don't, Mr. President.' "

In the Capitol, Ms. Pelosi vowed to use the first 100 hours of the new Congress to push through what Democrats dubbed their "Six for '06" agenda.

That program includes calls to raise the minimum wage, repeal subsidies for oil companies and incentives for companies to send jobs overseas, cut interest rates on student loans, give the government the authority to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies for lower prescription drug prices, and expand opportunities for embryonic stem cell research. On one of those issues, the minimum wage, Mr. Bush signaled there was room for a deal, as he also did on immigration.

But Democrats made it clear that their first order of business, even before taking over in January, would be pressing the Bush White House to change course in Iraq.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, called for Mr. Bush to convene a bipartisan summit meeting on Iraq. Ms. Pelosi, apparently unaware that Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation was about to be announced, called pointedly on Mr. Bush to get rid of the secretary of defense, saying it would "signal an openness to new, fresh ideas."

As Democrats turned their attention to governing, Republicans — including Mr. Bush — grappled with their losses. Although Mr. Bush had been insisting in public that he was confident Republicans would retain control of both houses of Congress, his aides said privately on Wednesday that the president knew as early as several weeks ago that Democrats were likely to capture the House, even as he hoped for an upset.

"If you look at it race by race, it was close," the president told reporters in the East Room of the White House. "The cumulative effect, however, was not close. It was a thumping."

Washington has been a one-party Republican town for almost the entire six years Mr. Bush has been president. Tuesday's election ended any talk about Republicans establishing a permanent majority in the capital and upset a power structure that extended from Congress and the White House through the network of lobbyists, interest groups and donors who have supported Republicans and their agenda for years.

"We're going to take a two-year hiatus," Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, told reporters at a morning news briefing. Of Ms. Pelosi, he said: "My goal and job will be to make sure she never sets the record that Denny Hastert set."

Mr. Reynolds was referring to the current speaker, Representative J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who has held the job longer than any other Republican in the nation's history. Mr. Hastert issued a statement on Tuesday saying he would not seek the role of minority leader in the new Democratic-controlled House.

In addition to upending the balance of power between the parties in Washington, Tuesday's election also set up a leadership scramble within the parties themselves. Two Democrats, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland and Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania have both said they will seek the position of majority leader, to replace Ms. Pelosi if, as expected, she moves up to speaker.

And there has been speculation that Representative Rahm Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee who is widely viewed as an architect of Tuesday's House victory, would seek the position of Democratic whip. Mr. Emanuel said Wednesday that he had not made any decision about the whip's race but would do so "in short order."

At the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, Mr. Bush gathered his senior aides — Mr. Rove; Joshua B. Bolten, the White House chief of staff; and Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president — in the Oval Office before 7 a.m. Wednesday to assess the new power structure on Capitol Hill.

Although the White House had been insisting for weeks that it was not planning for a Democratic takeover, those in the room were part of a small cadre of presidential advisers, also including the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, and the domestic policy adviser, Joel D. Kaplan, who had already been doing just that.

"We got thumped, it's time, let's go," Mr. Bush said, according to one person who was present at the early morning meeting. "Let's get them on the phone. Is it too early?"

DOJ_NMG_0092194

Aides to Mr. Bush said they wanted to make some fast moves to show they were nimble in the face of the new challenge and to seize at least some of the stage on a day that belonged to Democrats. At the same time, they said, they wanted to show they had heard the voters' message that it was time for a new direction in Iraq.

And they said Mr. Gates was someone the president was comfortable with; Mr. Bush considered him for the position of director of intelligence, now held by John D. Negroponte.

Mr. Gates and the president met secretly on Sunday at Mr. Bush's ranch in Crawford, Tex.; to avoid the prying eyes of reporters and low-level White House officials who were camped out in nearby Waco, Mr. Gates met senior aides to Mr. Bush in the little town of McGregor and was then spirited into the ranch, aides said.

Mr. Gates, the president of Texas A&M University, had a difficult confirmation as director of central intelligence 15 years ago because of accusations that he had slanted intelligence. Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the senior Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, pledged to give Mr. Gates "a fair and fresh look," despite voting against his confirmation in 1991.

Despite the pronouncements of bipartisanship on both sides, there were questions about how Mr. Bush would work with a party whose Senate leader, Mr. Reid, has called him "a liar," and whose House leader, Ms. Pelosi, has called him "incompetent."

Asked in an interview on ABC News about her comments that Mr. Bush was incompetent, Ms. Pelosi replied, "Incompetence in the implementation of a war is dangerous," but she quickly added that it was time to move past old conflicts.

Mr. Bush, meanwhile, was asked at his news conference how he could have been so hopeful of Republican victory in the face of polls predicting such serious losses.

"I thought when it was all said and done, the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security," the president said. "But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on."

Nomination Offers "fresh Perspective" On Iraq (USAT)

By Susan Page, Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Stay the course?

The White House announced two weeks ago that President Bush no longer planned to utter that signature phrase about the war in Iraq, and with a stunning White House announcement Wednesday that signal went beyond rhetoric: Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, an architect of the Iraq war, was stepping down.

To replace him, President Bush turned to an adviser to his father's administration, former CIA director Robert Gates, a member of the bipartisan commission that is now putting the final touches on a report with recommendations on what to do about Iraq.

Endorsing the need for a "fresh perspective," the president opened the door to changing tactics in the war, though he didn't back away from its justification.

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there," Bush told an East Room news conference. He said voters, increasing the ranks of Democrats in the House and Senate, had delivered his party a "thumpin'. "

The morning after the worst setback for Republicans on Capitol Hill since Watergate, the president sought to rescue the final two years of his tenure from being paralyzed by an increasingly violent and unpopular war.

He gave what military analyst Charles Pena calls "a peace offering" to Democratic congressional leaders who have been demanding Rumsfeld's departure for months. An hour before news of the resignation began to leak Wednesday, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill, chairman of the triumphant Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, had declared the Pentagon chief's ouster a priority for the incoming Democratic majority.

"It's clear that what we're doing (in Iraq) is not working," Emanuel said at his first news conference of the day. "We need both a new strategy and a management team, at least in the secretary, that does that."

In January, with control of one or both houses of Congress, the Democrats would have been in a position to do more than complain about Rumsfeld. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., in line to become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, told reporters Wednesday that he planned to create a subcommittee to focus on oversight and investigations of the Pentagon.

"Will this change the policy?" Skelton asked of Rumsfeld's departure. "I don't know. I certainly hope so." He added, "I'd rather have that than have a new face with the old policies of stay-the-course and keep feeding young people into the cauldron of Iraq."

Rumsfeld was characteristically wry as he stood between his boss and his intended successor in the Oval Office Wednesday afternoon.

"It's been quite a time," he said. "It recalls to mind the statement by Winston Churchill — something to the effect that 'I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof.' " Bush laughed at that.

DOJ_NMG_0092195

The brusque Pentagon chief was also uncharacteristically emotional as he finished his comments. There was an audible catch in his voice when he said the "young men and women in uniform … remain in my prayers always." Bush gave him three hearty slaps on the back as the men walked out.

A former Eagle Scout and Navy pilot, Rumsfeld was elected four times as a congressman from suburban Chicago, then served in the Nixon White House. (There, he gave a young congressional fellow named Dick Cheney a job; Cheney as vice president returned the favor a quarter-century later by putting forward Rumsfeld's name for the Pentagon post.) As President Ford's chief of staff, Rumsfeld struggled to manage the repercussions of a Watergate scandal that decimated GOP ranks in Congress in the 1974 midterm elections.

In 1975, at 43, he became the youngest secretary of Defense.

In 2001, at 68, after earning a fortune at J.D. Searle Co. and elsewhere, he became the oldest secretary of Defense. It was, he told Bush Wednesday, "a wholly unexpected opportunity."

Skelton says Rumsfeld plans to stay on the job until Gates' nomination can be confirmed by the Senate. If he does, Rumsfeld late next month will add one more milestone to his resume: the longest-serving secretary of Defense. He'll surpass the tenure of Robert McNamara, who was pushed to resign in 1968 as President Johnson struggled to manage an unpopular war in Vietnam.

Rumsfeld's legacy at the Pentagon during this tour of duty is mixed, analysts say.

"There's much that Rumsfeld did that's commendable: His focus on transformation of the military, on quicker responses, on a variety of new thinking," says Kurt Campbell, a former Pentagon and National Security Council official for President Clinton. He is now a scholar at the non-partisan Center for Strategic and International Studies. "But because of Iraq, much of his legacy is likely to be considered tragic."

Rumsfeld returned to the Pentagon determined to transform the U.S. military into a leaner, more agile and technologically sophisticated force. Critics say his insistence on a "lean" invasion force in Iraq — despite the views of Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki and others — and the failure of U.S. forces to control the looting and disorder that followed Saddam Hussein's ouster contributed to the current impasse in Iraq.

During the months after the 2001 terrorist attacks, when the United States invaded Afghanistan, Rumsfeld was a media star and a calming and unifying leader, says Barry Blechman, head of the military consulting firm DFI International and a member of the secretary's policy advisory board.

"The president made some excellent speeches, but on a day-to-day basis, it was Rumsfeld's steadfastness, determination and involvement that people saw," says Blechman. Rumsfeld's sharp rejoinders to reporters and his ruminations about "known knowns, known unknowns and unknown unknowns" made the Pentagon's televised briefings fodder for comedy routines on late-night TV.

But Rumsfeld made a "tragic mistake" in Iraq, Blechman said. "He made one big mistake, in that he believed those who said that all we had to do is get rid of (Saddam) Hussein and we didn't have to worry much about what would happen afterwards. As a result, we didn't plan properly for the period that followed Hussein's demise and made some bad decisions about how to conduct the occupation."

A half-dozen retired generals this year began publicly criticizing Rumsfeld's leadership, among them, three who had served in Iraq under Rumsfeld. An editorial in the Army Times, Navy Times, Air Force Times and Marine Corps Times (publications owned by Gannett, which also owns USA TODAY) last week called for his resignation.

Rumsfeld's resignation comes after a spike in sectarian violence during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan helped push the death toll for U.S. troops to 105 in October, the fourth-deadliest month since the invasion in March 2003.

Military commanders have shifted hundreds of American forces to Baghdad to crack down on Sunni and Shiite militias, but U.S. generals acknowledge that effort has fallen short of expectations.

Rumsfeld's departure doesn't make the policy options any less problematic, however.

"If there were easy solutions, we would have figured out what they were a long time ago," says Ivo Daalder, a national-security aide in the Clinton White House. "Everyone is looking for the Holy Grail, to withdraw with honor, to not leave the mess worse than it is today."

That may not be possible, he says. "Basically, it seems to me we either accept defeat and its consequences, or we just in one form or another continue down a course that makes us accept defeat down the road, and the consequences being larger."

The 10-member bipartisan panel is due to issue recommendations soon. Chaired by former secretary of State James Baker and Lee Hamilton, former House International Relations Committee chairman, the committee has worked with four task forces studying Iraq's "strategic environment," military and security situation, political development, and economy and reconstruction.

The members include Gates, former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor and Vernon Jordan, a former adviser to President Clinton.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, predicts the commission's options will include the substantial redeployment of U.S. forces, consultation with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, and increased political independence for Iraq's ethnic regions. The panel "will give the administration the necessary political room to be able to make a radical change," Biden says, especially with a new secretary of Defense in charge.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a critic of the war who testified before the commission, says he believes it will propose deploying U.S. troops away from the daily crossfire between Iraqi factions. "I see signals that they are talking about benchmarks and redeployment sooner rather than later," he says.

Gates is a 26-year veteran of the CIA, named by the first President Bush to head the agency. A native of Wichita, Gates is now president of Texas A&M University, where the elder Bush's presidential library is located. While Rumsfeld sometimes flares with drama, Gates personifies the circumspect analyst.

John McLaughlin, a former CIA deputy director who worked for Gates, says "it's not inconsequential" that Gates is a member of the commission.

"What we're seeing is a convergence of pragmatic people from Bush I, Bush II and Congress on the next steps" in Iraq, he says.

An unscientific sampling of opinion from members of the military who have served in Iraq and their families found a range of views about Rumsfeld.

"To be honest with you, I thought we were doing a good job in Iraq helping the Iraqi people liberate themselves from the few people who don't want us there," says Luis Valdovinos of Riverside, Calif. He left the Marine Corps last year after two tours in Iraq. He proudly remembers shaking Rumsfeld's hand when the secretary visited troops at the Al Asad base in Iraq in 2004.

Army Reserve Sgt. 1st Class Carl Church, of Hemet, Calif., is ambivalent. "My reaction is, hopefully, some good will come of it," he says of Rumsfeld's departure. "There's some good decisions (in Iraq) and there's some bad decisions. They say the commanders in the field are running things, and some people say the politicians are running things. I have no idea."

"I think we need a change and maybe some fresh perspective," says Gailo Bodenhamer of Belton, Texas, outside Fort Hood. Her husband, Army Capt. Jonathan Bodenhamer, is a company commander slated to come home next week after a second year-long combat tour in Iraq.

Maybe new leadership will mean he won't have to return a third time, Bodenhamer says.

Rumsfeld Quits; Bush Taps Gates For Post (AP)

By Robert Burns, Katherine Shrader

AP, November 8, 2006

After years of defending his secretary of defense, President Bush on Wednesday announced Donald H. Rumsfeld's resignation within hours of the Democrats' triumph in congressional elections. Bush reached back to his father's administration to tap a former CIA director to run the Pentagon.

The Iraq war was the central issue of Rumsfeld's nearly six-year tenure, and unhappiness with the war was a major element of voter dissatisfaction Tuesday — and the main impetus for his departure. Even some GOP lawmakers became critical of the war's management, and growing numbers of politicians were urging Bush to replace Rumsfeld.

Bush said Robert Gates, 63, who has served in a variety of national security jobs under six previous presidents, would be nominated to replace Rumsfeld. Gates, currently the president of Texas A&M University, is a Bush family friend and a member of an independent group studying the way ahead in Iraq.

The White House hopes that replacing Rumsfeld with Gates can help refresh U.S. policy on the deeply unpopular war and perhaps establish a stronger rapport with the new Congress. Rumsfeld had a rocky relationship with many lawmakers.

"Secretary Rumsfeld and I agreed that sometimes it's necessary to have a fresh perspective," Bush said in the abrupt announcement during a postelection news conference.

In a later appearance at the White House with Rumsfeld and Gates at his side, Bush praised both men, thanked Rumsfeld for his service and predicted that Gates would bring fresh ideas.

"The secretary of defense must be a man of vision who can see threats still over the horizon and prepare our nation to meet them. Bob Gates is the right man to meet both of these critical challenges," Bush said.

But underscoring that he would not bow to those pushing for a quick U.S. withdrawal, Bush also said, "I'd like our troops to come home, too, but I want them to come home with victory."

DOJ_NMG_0092197

In brief remarks, Rumsfeld described the Iraq conflict as a "little understood, unfamiliar war" that is "complex for people to comprehend." Upon his return to the Pentagon after appearing with Bush and Gates, Rumsfeld said it was a good time for him to leave.

"It will be a different Congress, a different environment, moving toward a presidential election and a lot of partisanship, and it struck me that this would be a good thing for everybody," Rumsfeld told reporters.

There was little outward reaction among officials at the Pentagon, beyond surprise at the abrupt announcement.

Asked whether Rumsfeld's departure signaled a new direction in a war that has claimed the lives of more than 2,800 U.S. troops and cost more than $300 billion, Bush said, "Well, there's certainly going to be new leadership at the Pentagon."

Voters appeared to be telling politicians that the sooner the war ends the better. Surveys at polling places showed that about six in 10 voters disapproved of the war and only a third believed it had improved long-term security in the United States.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Rumsfeld was not leaving immediately. Rumsfeld planned to deliver a speech on the global war on terrorism at Kansas State University on Thursday.

Just last week Bush told reporters that he expected Rumsfeld, 74, to remain until the end of the administration's term. And although Bush said Wednesday that his decision to replace Rumsfeld was not based on politics, the announcement of a Pentagon shake-up came on the heels of Tuesday's voting.

With his often-combative defense of the war in Iraq, Rumsfeld had been the administration's face of the conflict. He became more of a target — and more politically vulnerable — as the war grew increasingly unpopular at home amid rising violence and with no end in sight.

Gates ran the CIA under the first President Bush during the first Gulf war. He retired from government in 1993.

He joined the CIA in 1966 and is the only agency employee to rise from an entry level job to become director. A native of Kansas, he made a name for himself as an analyst specializing in the former Soviet Union and he served in the intelligence community for more than a quarter century, under six presidents.

Numerous Democrats in Congress had been calling for Rumsfeld's resignation for many months, asserting that his management of the war and of the military had been a resounding failure. Critics also accused Rumsfeld of not fully considering the advice of his generals and of refusing to consider alternative courses of action.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan and Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri — the top Democrats on the Armed Services committees — said the resignation would be a positive step only if accompanied by a change in policy.

"I think it is critical that this change be more than just a different face on the old policy," Skelton said.

Rumsfeld, 74, has served in the job longer than anyone except Robert McNamara, who became secretary of defense during the Kennedy administration and remained until 1968. Rumsfeld is the only person to have served in the job twice; his previous tour was during the Ford administration.

Rumsfeld had twice previously offered his resignation to Bush — once during the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal in spring 2004 and again shortly after that. Both times the president refused to let him leave.

Gates took over the CIA as acting director in 1987, when William Casey was terminally ill with cancer. Questions were raised about Gates' knowledge of the Iran-Contra affair, and he withdrew from consideration to take over the CIA permanently. Yet he stayed on as deputy director.

Then-National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft, who has been a critic of the younger Bush's policies, asked Gates to be his deputy in 1989 during the administration of Bush's father. The elder President Bush, a former CIA director himself, asked Gates to run the CIA two years later.

Gates won confirmation, but only after hearings in which he was accused by CIA officials of manipulating intelligence as a senior analyst in the 1980s.

Melvin Goodman, a former CIA division chief for Soviet affairs, testified that Gates politicized the intelligence on Iran, Nicaragua, Afghanistan and the Soviet Union. "Gates' role in this activity was to corrupt the process and the ethics of intelligence on all of these issues," Goodman testified.

The Bush administration's use of intelligence on Iraq has been a central theme of criticism from Democrats who say the White House stretched faulty intelligence from U.S. spy agencies to justify invading Iraq in 2003.

Gates has taken a much lower profile since leaving government. He joined corporate boards and wrote a memoir, "From The Shadows: The Ultimate Insider's Story of Five Presidents and How They Won the Cold War." It was published in 1996.

Gates is a close friend of the Bush family, and particularly the first President Bush. He became the president of Texas A&M University in August 2002. The university is home to the presidential library of the elder Bush.

Rumsfeld Steps Down (CHIT)

By Stephen J. Hedges, Mark Silva

DOJ_NMG_0092198

Chicago Tribune, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld resigned Wednesday within hours of a stunning Republican setback in nationwide midterm elections, a vote that became a referendum on President Bush's strategy for the war in Iraq and on Rumsfeld's stormy stewardship of the Pentagon.

Bush announced Rumsfeld's departure during a news conference, stating that he had nominated former CIA Director Robert Gates as his next secretary of defense. All three men convened later in the Oval Office of the White House to discuss the changing of the guard.

While Bush explained his decision as a need to put "fresh eyes" on his Iraq policy, it came after voters Tuesday turned over control of the House to Democrats, who had made the military stalemate in Iraq a campaign priority. The Senate may fall to Democratic hands as well, pending the outcome of a close race in Virginia.

Rumsfeld's sudden departure was the clearest signal yet that Bush may soon make a dramatic shift in his Iraq war strategy.

Rumsfeld, the Pentagon chief since Bush took office in January 2001, was viewed as the key architect of the 2003 military invasion of Iraq, and in more recent times the public face of the failures there. His ouster could both embolden the military, with which he was often at odds, and those who have pressed for solutions that Rumsfeld strongly opposed, such as a partitioning of Iraq.

Rumsfeld's primary strategy of having U.S. troops train Iraqi military and police units to take over security in Iraq was viewed by critics as progressing slowly and poorly managed. There were also complaints about the soaring cost of reconstructing Iraq's neglected infrastructure, overcharges by private Pentagon contractors and a perceived lack of adequate U.S. troop strength.

Iraq panel's report due soon

During his news conference, Bush seemed almost eager to meet with a congressionally mandated group of experts who are soon to make recommendations on options for the U.S. forces in Iraq; the president said that session will occur next week.

That panel, known as the Iraqi Study Group, is co-chaired by James Baker, a Bush family friend who served as secretary of state during Bush's father's presidency, and former Indiana Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton.

Gates, now president of Texas A&M University, also is a member of its board.

Bush assured Iraqis and members of the U.S. military that Rumsfeld's departure would not cause ripples of uncertainty about the U.S. mission in Iraq, but at the same time he signaled a willingness to pursue a new strategy.

Washington caught by surprise

The speed of Rumsfeld's resignation caught official Washington by surprise. A combative bureaucrat with a razor-sharp wit, Rumsfeld was expected by many to depart only when conditions in Iraq improved. Bush only last week offered assurances that Rumsfeld would stay, and that Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney, another enthusiastic proponent of the Iraq war, were doing a "fantastic job."

Rumsfeld's combative nature made him a target for those who oppose the war in Iraq, and for Democrats and some Republicans in Congress who came to question the Bush administration's assessment of the U.S. military mission there.

Rumsfeld offered to resign twice before, both times during the scandal that erupted in April 2004 over the abuse of Iraqi prisoners by U.S. soldiers. Bush then refused to accept Rumsfeld's offers to quit.

But Tuesday's elections, and the struggle in Iraq, appear to have eroded Bush's confidence in Rumsfeld, who is expected to remain at his post until the Senate confirms Gates' nomination.

After Tuesday's vote, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumptive House speaker when Democrats assume control of the chamber in January, called on Bush to fire Rumsfeld to demonstrate a change in the administration's Iraq policy. The White House announcement of Rumsfeld's resignation came an hour later.

The president said he already had set in motion the process of replacing Rumsfeld before the election, although Bush had maintained in an interview with reporters just last week that he expected to keep his defense secretary through his second term.

He said, though, that he had not met with Gates until Sunday and didn't have a final meeting with Rumsfeld until Tuesday. Bush met with Gates at the president's Prairie Chapel Ranch outside Crawford, Texas, before heading out for a day of campaigning in Nebraska and Kansas.

Bush said Wednesday that he misled reporters on the Rumsfeld question because "I didn't want to inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign. And so the only way to answer that question and to get you on to another question was to give you that answer."

Denying that Rumsfeld's replacement is a result of the election that has handed Democrats control of the House and possibly the Senate, Bush said: "Actually, I thought we were going to do fine yesterday. That shows what I know."

The election was not close, he said. "It was a thumpin'."

Bush directly acknowledged the role that public unrest over the war played in the midterm elections and voiced a willingness to discuss war strategy with the new Democratic leaders. But he also made clear that any new tactics must be aimed at achieving his unswerving goal of "victory" in Iraq.

Bush: 'Committed to victory'

"I'd like our troops to come home, too, but I want them to come home with victory, and that [Iraq] is a country that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself," Bush said. "I'm committed to victory. I'm committed to helping this country so that we can come home."

Bush said that Gates would bring "a fresh perspective during a critical period in this war."

Congressional Democrats instantly hailed Rumsfeld's removal.

"The American people spoke yesterday with great force and great clarity on the need to change direction in Iraq," said Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the influential ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I hope that Secretary Rumsfeld's departure will lead to a change in policy."

Levin said he will do "everything I can to facilitate" consideration of Gates as Rumsfeld's replacement.

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a member of the Armed Services Committee, said he would ask Gates to describe the administration's new plan for Iraq during the confirmation process.

"I think I'd ask him to try to define the mission in Iraq today … ask him to show us how he is going to help engage the Iraqis more aggressively in seeking out militias," Reid said.

Bush Replaces Rumsfeld (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, stung by election losses that he acknowledged were a rebuke of the Iraq war, dismissed Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld Wednesday and named former CIA Director Robert M. Gates to replace him.

Conceding that voters spurned Republicans in part "to register their displeasure with the lack of progress" in Iraq, Bush said at a White House news conference that there was a need for "new leadership" and "fresh perspective" at the Pentagon. Gates sits on a panel that is expected to present Bush with a new Iraq policy next week.

Replacing Rumsfeld, the longest-serving member of his Cabinet, was a stunning turn for a president who has staked his legacy -- and, to some degree, the fortunes of his party -- on a war plan that has lost the support of most Americans.

Bush said he had been ready to replace Rumsfeld regardless of the election's outcome, but the move was widely viewed as a bow to the new reality in Washington, in which the president will be forced to work with Democrats to find a way out of Iraq and advance his domestic agenda.

Bush said he would meet early next week with a bipartisan commission of which Gates is a member -- co-chaired by Republican former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana -- in what could be the start of a substantial change in the U.S. approach to Iraq.

Democrats greeted Rumsfeld's replacement as a sign that Bush was heeding a call from voters for a course change in Iraq and said they hoped that the president would follow it with concrete shifts in strategy.

"I welcome the long-overdue change in leadership at the Pentagon. Now we need a change in policy," Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, said in a statement.

It was unclear, however, how far Bush was willing to go in reconsidering his policy, particularly in hastening a U.S. troop withdrawal. The president touted his selection of Gates as proof that he was open to new ideas but he rejected the idea of a quick pullout, saying that voters had not demanded such a move.

"I can understand Americans saying, 'Come home.' But I don't know if they said, 'Come home and leave behind an Iraq that could end up being a safe haven for al-Qaida.' I don't believe they said that," Bush said.

The president said that replacing Rumsfeld was a way of showing the public that he is not locked into a failed approach.

"'Stay the course' means, 'Let's get the job done,' but it doesn't mean staying stuck on a strategy or tactics that may not be working. So, perhaps I need to do a better job of explaining that we're constantly adjusting," Bush said. "What the American people hear today is, we're constantly looking for fresh perspective."

Rumsfeld's ouster came just a week after Bush issued his most recent endorsement of the Pentagon chief, telling reporters that the 74-year-old defense secretary -- a lightning rod for criticism of Bush's Iraq policy, including among retired military brass and a growing chorus of Republicans -- was performing well and would stay on.

The president acknowledged that he had lied earlier about Rumsfeld's impending departure so as not to "inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign" and because he had not yet had a chance to speak with Gates or conclude his discussions with the defense secretary. Those talks, Bush said, had been going on for some time.

In naming Gates, an experienced Washington hand who served in Republican and Democratic administrations, including that of Bush's father, the president was signaling a willingness to make substantial changes to his war plan, analysts, strategists and lawmakers said.

Bush "recognizes -- certainly, this election documented -- the fact that there's a great deal of concern, deep concern among the people of the United States" about Iraq and Afghanistan, said Republican Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The "convergence" of a new defense secretary and the Baker commission's report will influence the administration's thinking on Iraq, he said. <

Republican Sen. Susan M. Collins of Maine called Rumsfeld's departure "the right opportunity for the administration to develop a new strategy," adding that Bush's approach thus far has failed to curb the violence in Iraq.

"It strikes me as inevitable that there will be serious discussions almost immediately about a nontrivial change in our [Iraq] policy," said William A. Galston, a former domestic adviser to President Bill Clinton.

Gates "knows that by accepting this job he's stepping into a very difficult situation that could disrupt his life and blemish his reputation," said Galston, adding that he would be unlikely to do so merely "in order to preside over the continuation of a failed policy."

Republican moderates who have long questioned Bush's war strategy said Rumsfeld's departure would be a chance for a much-needed re-evaluation.

"This midterm election and Don Rumsfeld resigning sends a powerful signal to the rest of the world that the U.S. is ready for a change of course," said Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest of the Eastern Shore.

"We're turning the ship around, we've come to our senses. I hope [Bush] is ready to sit down for serious conversations, and I have some hope that that will happen" because of the Baker-Hamilton commission, the Maryland Republican added.

Republican moderates will join Democrats, Gilchrest said, in demanding better oversight of the war in Iraq.

Some Republican strategists said privately that Rumsfeld's departure was overdue, and that an earlier exit might have staved off or minimized the heavy losses the party took in Tuesday's balloting.

Thomas H. Kean, the former Republican governor of New Jersey who headed the 9/11 commission, said Rumsfeld "should have resigned two years ago."

Bush's emerging shift on Iraq is just the first sign, analysts said, that his presidency has been transformed by the midterm elections, from one of audacious plans backed up by sharp rhetoric to one defined by cooperation where possible to achieve far smaller goals, some of which could evaporate once he leaves office.

Democrats are all but certain to block extension of Bush's tax cuts, and with renewed focus on a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, Bush's "legacy could very well be a time-limited one," said Michael Franc of the conservative Heritage Foundation. "There will be no permanent victories for Bush."

The president cracked his customary jokes with reporters in the ornate East Room during an afternoon news conference. But he appeared chastened by the election outcome, for which he said he bears "a large part of the responsibility."

Stressing bipartisanship, Bush said he would now work with Democrats to renew his signature No Child Left Behind education law and an immigration plan spurned by many in his party. He said he would consider an increase in the minimum wage, a top Democratic priority that he has opposed in the past.

"I believe on a lot of issues we can find common ground," Bush said.

Democrats also have reason to work with Bush, analysts said, though many predict two years of gridlock.

"A new Democratic majority is going to have to calibrate its stance toward the president very carefully -- so, obviously, they can't just roll over and play dead. But they also can't simply say, 'We're here to oppose you,'" Galston said.

Still, Bush's collegial talk could not mask his obvious disappointment that the public rejected his campaign trail argument that putting Democrats in charge would mean a huge tax increase and a less-safe country.

"I thought when it was all said and done, the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security," Bush said. "But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on."

Democrats Fell Rumsfeld And Close In On Senate (FT)

By Edward Luce, Caroline Daniel, Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, the architect of America's Iraq war strategy, became a casualty of the Republican party's unexpectedly heavy defeat in the mid-term congressional elections when George W. Bush said on Wednesday it was time for "new leadership at the Pentagon".

DOJ_NMG_0092201

In his first public statement since the result Mr Bush said he accepted a "large part of the responsibility" for his party's defeat. But it was his defence secretary, who paid the price for failure as the President admitted that "many Americans voted to register their displeasure at the lack of progress we are making [in Iraq]".

With the announcement of Mr Rumsfeld's departure, Mr Bush will be hoping to draw a line under the election results, by seeming to bow to the public anger over the strategic failures in Iraq. The war proved the dominant issue in the campaign which cost the Republicans control of the House of Representatives and left their control of the Senate hanging on the outcome of a desperately close contest in Virginia.

Saying he needed a "fresh perspective" at the Pentagon, Mr Bush named Robert Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency under the first President Bush – would replace Mr Rumsfeld, whose previous offers of resignation had been turned down.

But Mr Bush ruled out any fundamental change of strategy in Iraq. "I recognise that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there [in Iraq]," Mr Bush said in a televised press conference.

"Yet I also believe most Americans and leaders here in Washington from both political parties understand we cannot accept defeat."

Mr Bush presented the secretary of defence's departure as part of a larger reinvention of his presidency in which he would seek to restore a "bipartisan tone" to Washington DC, as he had promised in his first presidential campaign in 2000. In a surprisingly upbeat account of an election that others believe could render the Mr Bush a lame duck president in his last two years in office, he promised to work with the new Democratic leadership in Congress.

On Tuesday the Democrats gained as many as 27 seats in the House of Representatives, which will give them a working majority of up to 15 seats. Control of the Senate hung in the balance on Wednesday, with Democrats having 50 confirmed seats to the Republicans' 49 but with the Democrats' wafer-thin victory in the Virginia Senate race subject to a recount.

As the extent of the Democrat victory became apparent, Nancy Pelosi, the Democrat House leader who is set to become the first female speaker in America's history, and other leading Democrats, moved swiftly to reassure Americans that they would work with Republicans to pursue a moderate centrist agenda.

On Wednesday Mr Bush warmly welcomed Ms Pelosi's offer and said there were many areas, including immigration reform, energy independence and reform of social security where the two parties could find common ground. But Mr Bush said he would not waver from his objective of achieving "success" in Iraq and winning the "war on terror".

Rumsfeld Resigns Under Pressure (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the icon of the U.S. war on Islamic terrorists, succumbed to mounting pressure to resign, allowing the Bush administration to begin examining a new course on the bogged-down Iraq war where the American death toll exceeds 2,800.

Appearing with President Bush at the White House yesterday, Mr. Rumsfeld referred to his many critics on Iraq by paraphrasing a hero, Winston Churchill: "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

He then talked of "this little understood, unfamiliar war," a conflict the Pentagon has dubbed "the long war" because of the time it will take to dismantle al Qaeda worldwide.

"The first war of the 21st century is not well-known, it was not well-understood, it is complex for people to comprehend," he said.

Mr. Bush, appearing the day after many Americans registered a protest vote against his Iraq policy, said, "As the secretary of defense, he has been dedicated to his mission, loyal to his president and devoted to the courageous men and women of our armed forces."

He was flanked by his the defense secretary-designate, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates, who will take a fresh look at Iraq policy.

White House press secretary Tony Snow told The Washington Times that Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld had been talking about future operations in Iraq for months, but he did not know who first raised the issue of the departure.

"It wasn't like, 'come see the principal,' " Mr. Snow said, who noted Mr. Rumsfeld had offered twice to resign two years ago.

He said they both agreed that "Iraq is not working well enough and fast enough." He referred to Mr. Gates' "new energy."

He said Mr. Rumsfeld formally submitted his resignation on Election Day.

A defense source said Mr. Rumsfeld knew he was leaving at least several weeks ago.

Another factor in the two men's thinking was that a Democratic victory likely means hours of inquisitions on Iraq policy by several House and Senate committees.

DOJ_NMG_0092202

"If he'd have to go up to the Hill three times a week to answer another request, how effective would he really be?" said a former Pentagon official. "I think that's got to be a factor on some level."

His resignation ends the Rumsfeld era in the Pentagon that saw a supremely confident dynamic manager tear up years of static processes and war-fighting strategy to build a faster, lighter military with better intelligence and precision power. Along the way, he alienated some people at the Pentagon, especially senior Army officials.

Mr. Rumsfeld prided himself in management skills. But in the end, it was his perceived management failures in the three-year Iraq war that did him in.

Mr. Gates, an intelligence analyst by trade, is expected to do a top-to-bottom review of Iraq strategy and of the generals executing it. He will also consult with the two officers whom Mr. Rumsfeld had handpicked to run the war, Army Gens. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, and John Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command.

Mr. Rumsfeld, 74, who will stay in office until Mr. Gates' Senate confirmation, became more than a paper-pushing bureaucrat. The September 11, 2001, attacks on New York and the Pentagon thrust him into becoming the face, and some say, the chief strategist for a global campaign to find and kill al Qaeda terrorists.

After the attacks, Mr. Rumsfeld became a regular fixture on global television networks, talking about how he would be happy to have his troops kill members of the Taliban regime. His poll numbers soared to 70 percent job approval in late 2001 and early 2002 as U.S. troops ousted the Taliban in Afghanistan just a few months after the attack on America and as he secretly planned for war in Iraq.

Months after Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein fell in April 2003, a deadly and vibrant insurgency began killing American troops with regularity. They used what the military calls "asymmetrical" weapons -- roadside bombs and suicide bombers. Joined by al Qaeda jihadists, the enemy grew in strength and intelligence. It was able retake cities once held by the U.S. This year, insurgents controlled wide areas of Baghdad, descending the capital into daily sectarian violence as 140,000 American troops changed tactics to try to keep up.

As the U.S. death toll mounted and progress was hard to discern, a growing number of lawmakers called on him to quit. During the election, as Democrats elevated Iraq to their top issue, even a few Republicans made the same demand.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and an influential spokesman on defense issues, declared he had lost confidence in Mr. Rumsfeld.

"This important change offers the administration and Congress a fresh opportunity to examine all aspects of our strategy and tactics in Iraq and make whatever changes are necessary to succeed there," Mr. McCain said yesterday. "I look forward to discussing with Secretary-designate Gates his ideas for correcting the mistakes of the past."

One big mistake in the Iraq war was that the insurgency was not predicted or planned for. Because of this, critics said, the invasion force was too small. And it did not have the proper body or vehicle armor.

A scandal over the mistreatment of some inmates at Saddam's infamous Abu Ghraib prison also made headlines. A human rights groups soon stuck Mr. Rumsfeld with the charge of "the architect of torture." Mr. Rumsfeld's job-approval numbers dipped into the low 30s.

During his tenure as defense secretary, Mr. Rumsfeld transformed and empowered U.S. Special Operations Command as the lead player in the global war. He signed a secret directive in 2003 giving them authority to secretly penetrate foreign lands to hunt down and kill or capture al Qaeda members. Skeptical of the CIA's spying ability, he also gave commandos broader mandate to collect intelligence.

Mr. Bush picked Mr. Rumsfeld not to wage war, but to transform a military still stuck in the Cold War. He focused on the Army, killing some of its pet weapons projects and breaking the Army division system into what became known as combat brigade teams. He also shook up how and where U.S. troops are based abroad, reducing ground forces in both Europe and Asia.

Rumsfeld's Ouster Transforms Iraq Debate (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr., Yochi Dreazen, Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The resignation yesterday of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, in the wake of the Democrats' decisive electoral victory, now opens the door for the biggest change of U.S. policy in Iraq since American troops got bogged down there three years ago.

After gaining substantial power in Congress, Democrats indicated that they intend to push for a different course in Iraq. The planned departure of Mr. Rumsfeld, one of the war's chief architects, signaled that President Bush might be open to far-reaching changes. To his critics, Mr. Rumsfeld had become a symbol of an administration that they saw as unbending and defensive in its handling of the war.

Now come two decisive questions: Can Democrats agree on a unified approach for pulling U.S. troops out? And will Mr. Bush show willingness to weigh those ideas, which he has dismissed for months on the grounds that they would essentially hand victory to the terrorists? Mr. Bush's appointment of Robert Gates, a former head of the Central Intelligence Agency, to replace Mr. Rumsfeld signaled to some that the president might be open to changes.

Triumphant Democrats argue that their victory in Tuesday's congressional elections showed how strongly the U.S. public wants a new approach toward Iraq. But they still aren't clear about how to get the U.S. out of a war that has cost more than 2,800 American lives.

"Nowhere was the call for a new direction more clear from the American people than in the war in Iraq," said the incoming speaker of the House, Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi. "Hopefully, we can work with the president for a new direction, one that solves the problems in Iraq."

Democrats, while divided over details on how to proceed, have coalesced around some core concepts. These include a belief that the U.S. should begin by pulling its forces in Iraq, which currently total about 150,000 troops, off the streets within months and push Iraqi troops to the fore. That would be followed by a gradual withdrawal of the majority of troops from the country. Some of the 50,000 U.S. troops that would be left in Iraq would focus on advising and mentoring Iraqi forces. The majority of those remaining would serve as an emergency force that could swoop in to help Iraqi forces in trouble. Many Democrats also support the idea of holding negotiations with regional powerhouses like Iran and Syria, which maintain deep influence in Iraq.

Other critics of Mr. Rumsfeld's handling of the war, such as Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican, likely will continue to call on the U.S. to beef up its military presence in a bid to resolve Iraq's problems once and for all. The drawback of such an approach is that the badly strained U.S. Army and Marine Corps simply don't have enough available troops.

In remarks to reporters at the White House yesterday, President Bush didn't give a clear sense of how he intends to proceed in coming weeks. He hinted he was open to suggestions, but also vowed he wouldn't leave Iraq in the lurch. Mr. Bush said he is seeking "fresh perspective" on Iraq, but that the U.S. "cannot accept defeat." The president said he would bring back the troops only when Iraq has become "a country that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

White House officials say the events that led to Mr. Rumsfeld's replacement began several weeks ago when Mr. Bush held a series of discussions with his defense secretary about the deteriorating situation in Iraq. A senior administration official says Mr. Bush had planned to replace Mr. Rumsfeld regardless of how the elections played out. White House aides brought Mr. Gates to the presidential compound in Crawford, Texas, for an interview on Sunday.

When Mr. Rumsfeld submitted his resignation early Tuesday afternoon, Mr. Bush accepted it. As polls began closing in parts of the country, the president offered the job to Mr. Gates, officials say. Several White House officials say Mr. Rumsfeld wasn't forced out, although one added: "It was clear to Don that the president wanted him out." At a brief Oval Office ceremony yesterday, Mr. Rumsfeld thanked Mr. Bush for the chance to have served a second tour at the Pentagon, but took no questions about his resignation.

The most important figure at the moment may be a man who comes from neither party's leadership. Former Secretary of State James Baker, an old Bush family friend, is heading a bipartisan task force that is expected soon to issue recommendations for future U.S. policy in Iraq. Mr. Bush has said he plans to take seriously the proposals of the task force, which is co-chaired by former Rep. Lee Hamilton, a Democrat. The president yesterday said he plans to meet with task force members next week.

The commission's influence is likely to be bolstered by the fact that one of its members is Mr. Gates, who will take over for Mr. Rumsfeld. The arrival of Mr. Gates in the upper echelons of the Bush national-security team marks the return to prominence of someone closely associated with the Iraq policy views of the president's father, who took a markedly different approach to Iraq during the Gulf War 15 years ago.

During that conflict, the U.S. drove Iraqi troops out of Kuwait. But the senior Mr. Bush's team decided not to invade Iraq or drive to Baghdad to oust Saddam Hussein. The first Bush team was afraid that such a move would throw the country into turmoil, splinter it into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish sections and compel the U.S. to stay in Iraq to put the nation back together.

Mr. Gates's boss at that time was Brent Scowcroft, then national security adviser, who argued that driving into Iraq would be a mistake. The first President Bush apparently agreed, as did Mr. Baker, then secretary of state.

The Baker commission is widely expected to call for talking directly to Iran and Syria, both American foes, about problems in Iraq, in hopes of getting their help in quelling the violence.

Mr. Gates had earlier advocated direct talks with Iran. In the summer of 2004, Mr. Gates and President Carter's former national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski co-chaired a task force that called for direct dialogue, arguing that a lack of American engagement with Iran had harmed American interests.

In a statement yesterday, Mr. Brzezinski, a critic of the war in Iraq, hailed Mr. Gates's appointment and said it may mark "the beginning of a major corrective in American policy towards the Middle East."

Mr. Rumsfeld had long resisted efforts to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. Even after his resignation, it isn't likely that there will be a surge in U.S. ground forces into Iraq, as some people have sought.

The new defense secretary is more likely to oversee a shift of the U.S. effort away from providing security in urban areas such as Baghdad to a more advisory role -- in keeping with many Democrats' proposals. In such a scenario, the Pentagon would turn big U.S. units into quick reaction forces to bail out Iraqi soldiers and advisers who get overrun. Teams of American advisers who live and work with Iraqi units would increase in number. U.S. commanders are also debating how to increase the size and number of provincial reconstruction teams, which oversee economic development and local governance.

That would represent a scaling back of U.S. ambitions. Instead of trying to transform Iraq into a model democracy, the U.S. would try to use the largely Shiite Iraqi Army, which has been beset by corruption and allegations of human-rights abuses, to stabilize the country. Police forces, which have been widely infiltrated by Shiite militias, likely would get less support.

Senior military officials say a push to bolster the U.S. advisory effort in Iraq has been in the works for several weeks and would have occurred even if Mr. Rumsfeld remained in office. There are no plans to reduce U.S. force levels in the country in the next 12 months, nor are there plans to move troops out of urban areas.

But the focus of U.S. troops appears on the verge of shifting. Lt. Gen. Ray Odieno, who will deploy to Iraq in the coming weeks to serve as the second-highest ranking U.S. officer there, said in an interview that a move to restructure and possibly increase the size of the advisory effort would likely happen "sooner rather than later."

In pushing for a new approach in Iraq, the Democrats have public opinion on their side, a fact that President Bush acknowledged yesterday. In exit polls on Tuesday, nearly 60% of voters said the war had not improved the long-term security of the U.S., and 55% said the U.S. should move to pull out some or all troops from Iraq. After Tuesday's defeat, some Republicans may join Democrats in pushing for change.

It may be difficult for Democrats to force the president to change policy. Democratic leaders have said they will not resort to the ultimate cudgel: their grip over wartime appropriations. Yet control of the House -- and likely the Senate -- will give Democrats other tools.

Two Democratic congressmen have said they will introduce bills to increase oversight of the troubled U.S.-led efforts to rebuild Iraq's infrastructure and train its security personnel. Democrats have also said they will subpoena information from the White House and Pentagon and force administration officials to appear at public hearings.

Because the Bush administration may be reluctant to appear too open to Democratic proposals, policy recommendations from the commission headed by Messrs. Baker and Hamilton, known as the Iraq Study Group, could be critical. The panel is set to release its proposal within weeks.

"I predict that the vehicle for a change in Iraq policy will be the Baker-Hamilton commission. It gives Bush a way of saving face," says Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware. In a Democratic Senate, Mr. Biden becomes chairman of its Foreign Relations Committee. "You have to give Bush a way out, because if you back him into a corner, he gets too blindly stubborn to change course," he says.

Democrats are almost certain to back the commission's recommendations, which are expected to include calls for a regional summit with Iraq's neighbors. Several leading Republicans, such as Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the outgoing chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, have also said they are likely to back the panel's proposals.

Still, Democrats and Republicans remain deeply divided about both the path forward in Iraq and the conditions on the ground there.

The administration and many Republicans in Congress argue that for all the problems, progress is being made. The White House says withdrawing U.S. forces before Iraqis are ready to take over security responsibility would lead to greater violence -- and possibly full-scale civil war. Some Republicans also say a U.S. withdrawal would play to Islamic extremists' belief that the U.S. could be driven out of the Middle East through guerrilla violence, and would give terrorists a new haven in the heart of the oil-rich region.

"I can understand Americans saying, 'Come home,'" Mr. Bush said yesterday. "But I don't know if they said, 'Come home and leave behind an Iraq that could end up being a safe haven for al Qaeda.'"

Many Democrats argue that Iraq is spiraling further out of control, with little prospect of improvement. They say the open-ended U.S. military commitment is harming morale and reducing the armed forces' ability to prepare for potential future conflicts with countries like Iran or North Korea. To prevent further damage to the American military and to jolt the Iraqi government to make compromises needed to pacify the country, Democrats assert, the U.S. must move soon to diminish its troop presence in Iraq.

Mr. Biden is championing a proposal he drafted with Leslie Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations. Democratic Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island have hatched another plan, which has received the backing of nearly all Senate Democrats. House Democrats like Rep. Jack Murtha of Pennsylvania have proposed yet other redeployment plans.

Virtually all the Democrats' proposals call for a regional summit to engage Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, to help stabilize the country. They call for a national reconciliation effort within Iraq designed to bridge the gaping divisions between Iraq's Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, especially over control of the country's future oil revenues. There is also a shared appeal among the Democrats' plans for more reconstruction work at a time when U.S. funds are drying up and major companies engaged there, such as Bechtel Corp., are pulling out. And all advocate the gradual redeployment, or pulling out, of U.S. forces, with wide variations on numbers and timing.

Looking to give a catchy ring to these proposals, Democratic Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois calls them "the five R's: reconciliation of the warring parties, reconstruction, responsibility for results, recognizing the parties in the region and then redeployment."

Top Democrats disagree on some important points. The central plank of Sen. Biden's plan calls for Iraq to be divided into three semiautonomous regions -- one largely Shiite, one Sunni and the last Kurdish -- each with its own proportionate share of Iraq's oil wealth. Some prominent Democrats have called that a recipe for massive sectarian strife.

New York's Sen. Hillary Clinton backs the idea of an oil trust that would guarantee that each Iraqi gets a cut from the country's oil revenues instead of divvying it up by region or ethnic identity.

Washington Shake-up, Part 2: Rumsfeld Departs (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

By changing the leadership of the Department of Defense, President Bush has not necessarily changed his policies in Iraq. But he may have changed the tone of Washington's debate about Iraq, at least for now.

It's not yet clear whether Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld chose to leave on his own, or whether he was pushed. It's quite possible that it was a mutual decision, as Mr. Bush implied in his press conference Wednesday afternoon.

But Secretary Rumsfeld, a pugnacious former wrestler and fighter pilot, has long been a symbol of intransigence to the administration's critics. Now, newly empowered Democrats won't have him to kick around during any oversight hearings into the preparation for, and conduct of, the Iraq conflict.

"Don Rumsfeld has been a superb leader during a time of change," said Bush in announcing the change. "Yet he also appreciates the value of bringing in a fresh perspective during a critical period in this war."

From the outset, Rumsfeld was a controversial choice to lead the Pentagon. His abrasive style did not sit well with many in the military, including some of the nation's top uniformed generals and admirals. Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," contains a scene in which Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, when asked how to decode his new boss, simply lays his head down on his desk in frustration.

Rumsfeld was not a secretary the military could easily distract by dispatching him to foreign bases on goodwill tours. His "snowflakes" - short action memos or questions about a particular subject - drifted through Pentagon offices by the dozens, causing many to work late as they drafted replies.

Critics said that Rumsfeld's views on the need for the military to transform itself into a light, lightning-strike force led to the US becoming embroiled in Iraq with too few troops. Rumsfeld himself disputed this notion, saying that he listened to his generals when it came to troop levels, and that if they had asked him for more, he would have provided them.

Initial reaction from Democrats on Rumsfeld's departure was positive, with Senate minority leader Harry Reid of Nevada, among others, saying that Bush had "taken a step in the right direction."

Senator Reid went on to call for a rethinking of the administration's overall approach to Iraq, however. There is no indication yet whether that is in the works.

Given the timing of Rumsfeld's departure, it is difficult to see it as anything less than a concession on Bush's part to the results of Tuesday's Democratic victories. "The American people have spoken," says Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas. "President Bush has listened, and Mr. Rumsfeld is gone."

Robert Gates, the man Bush intends to nominate as Rumsfeld's replacement, is perhaps a more restrained personality. Currently president of Texas A&M University, he was a longtime Washington intelligence and security-affairs official.

Mr. Gates directed the Central Intelligence Agency from 1991 to 1993, having risen through its ranks from an entry-level position. He had joined the agency during the Vietnam War, straight from Indiana University.

He is not a Rumsfeld-level thrower of bombs. He served at the CIA under Stansfield Turner, for instance, whom he later criticized for not cultivating enough of a constituency for the changes at the agency that Mr. Turner wanted to make.

DOJ_NMG_0092206

He has been serving as a member of the commission on Iraq policy that includes former Secretary of State James Baker III, among others. That commission is expected to report its findings and possible recommendations for changes in policy to the president in coming weeks.

Stage Set For Iraq Policy Shift (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Democratic control of the House and possibly the Senate, combined with the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, has set the stage for a dramatic shift in the Bush administration's policy toward the Iraq war, lawmakers and experts said. The contours of a new policy are not clear, but there is likely to be more pressure on the Iraqi government to rein in sectarian violence and a growing clamor from Democrats to begin a drawdown of U.S. troops.

Rumsfeld is slated to be replaced by Robert M. Gates, a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group who has spent recent weeks learning the problems of the administration's current approach. Unlike Rumsfeld, who was widely seen as a roadblock to a shift in strategy, Gates is expected to be much more receptive to implementing the group's recommendations, due to be made public about Dec. 7.

Gates has been frustrated that the administration has been unable to adjust to changing circumstances in Iraq, according to one person who has spoken to him about the administration's management of the war. Gates, he said, believes "you can't be afraid to adjust your action to adjust to the realities on the ground."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who would chair the Senate Foreign Relations Committee if Democrats capture the Virginia Senate seat and control of the Senate, said he understood that Gates "has a much more pragmatic and realistic view of the place we find ourselves" in Iraq and is much more willing to work with the uniformed military than Rumsfeld was.

Even before the election, both Democrats and Republicans had been eagerly awaiting the recommendations of the study group, which is headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a Republican, and former Democratic representative Lee Hamilton of Indiana. The group of mainstream foreign policy experts is not poised to make radical suggestions when it unveils its report, but official Washington has expected both parties to seize on its ideas for political cover.

One senior Senate aide said both parties are looking for an exit from Iraq out of "pure political interests." After their devastating losses, Republicans do not want Iraq to be an electoral albatross in 2008; Democrats, meanwhile, do not want it to still be the first order of business if they reoccupy the White House in 2009.

Biden said that a number of Republicans have told him privately that they are willing to push for a change in course on Iraq after the election. "We have a narrow window before 2008 kicks in to get a bipartisan consensus on Iraq," he said.

The administration has long set a goal of a stable, democratic Iraq, suggesting that major troop withdrawals could not be expected until the Iraqi government was capable of sustaining that enterprise itself.

"I'd like our troops to come home, too, but I want them to come home with victory, and that is a country that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself," President Bush said yesterday at a news conference. But he added that "Iraq is not working well enough, fast enough."

The Baker-Hamilton study group is not expected to call for pulling out of Iraq quickly. Rather, insiders say, the most likely recommendation will be to curtail the goal of democratizing Iraq and instead emphasize stability. That might entail devoting more resources to training and equipping Iraq's military, perhaps by radically increasing the size of the U.S. training and advisory effort.

Bush, who will meet with the Baker-Hamilton group next week, told reporters he is awaiting its report, mentioning twice more in his news conference that he would "work" with them. In announcing the nomination of Gates, Bush said that "he will provide the department with a fresh perspective and new ideas on how America can achieve our goals in Iraq."

Democrats served notice that they will push for a change in approach, such as beginning a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops soon. "The American people have spoken," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who is in line to become House speaker in January. "It's important for us to work in a bipartisan way with the president, again, to solve the problem, not to stay the course. That's not working. That's clear."

Specifically, Pelosi said, the administration and Congress need to work together "to send a clear message to the Iraqi government and people that they must disarm the militias, they must amend their constitution, they must engage in regional diplomacy to bring more stability and reconstruction to Iraq, and that we must begin the responsible redeployment of our troops outside of Iraq."

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), who likely will take over as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, last year sent Bush a letter calling for the removal of one U.S. brigade -- about 3,500 troops -- for every three Iraqi brigades deemed capable. He said Bush told him his formula was "too rigid," but Skelton said he will press for this approach from his new position of power. "I think this is an important opportunity to begin a new policy direction," he said.

Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), in line to head the House International Relations Committee in the next Congress, said there are few new ideas left to be tried and wasn't sure how much the Baker-Hamilton report would alter the debate.

"You can't unscramble the omelet and the tremendous mistakes that were made after major military operations," he said. "I don't see any magical solutions, but the president may be sending a signal of a change in course" by removing Rumsfeld immediately after the election, he said. "We are willing to meet him halfway."

Democrats yesterday appeared to have little interest in mandating a reduction in U.S. forces through spending cuts, a politically risky step.

Michael O'Hanlon, a defense expert at the Brookings Institution, said congressional Democrats will face some difficult choices as they try to move Bush toward a new approach to the war. He said they could rhetorically put pressure on Bush, but not enough to sound defeatist, keeping blame for policy failures on the GOP.

Democrats also could work with Bush to jointly pressure Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take more action to end the violence in Iraq, but that would directly associate the Democrats with administration policy.

O'Hanlon said the Baker-Hamilton report might help frame the debate by delivering a diagnosis of the problem that both sides can accept, in contrast to rhetoric from Bush that he said was often "divorced from reality."

Rumsfeld's Tenure A Long, Hard Slog (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, November 8, 2006

He has been the square-jawed face of the war, the man behind the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that he predicted were just the beginnings of a long, hard slog.

On Wednesday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld resigned from his post and became the latest casualty of those conflicts — a victim of a war he steadfastly contended the American public simply did not understand.

Standing next to President Bush in a brief White House appearance, Rumsfeld, 74, offered no regret for a war gone wrong that mushroomed into an issue that helped carry Democrats in Tuesday's elections to control of the House and the Senate. Instead, he provided a glimmer of the trademark temperament that has prompted some critics to call him arrogant.

The war, he said, "is not well known. It was not well understood. It is complex for people to comprehend." And he alluded to the crescendo of calls for his ouster, quoting Winston Churchill: "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

In the days after Sept. 11, 2001 — when he helped carry victims of the terrorist attack out of the burning Pentagon — Rumsfeld was hailed by some as a visionary who was smartly shaping the military into a new, agile force for the 21st century.

His adept management of the attack on Afghanistan in October 2001 was deemed a success, as U.S. forces drove out the ruling Taliban. His stock rose over the next year as he delivered televised war briefings from the Pentagon.

The high point may have come as Rumsfeld introduced America to "shock and awe" bombing during the ferocious assault on Baghdad in the opening days of Operation Iraqi Freedom — a tactic meant to force a quick surrender by the Iraqis.

Rumsfeld's plunge from hero soon after the spring 2003 fall of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein to war wounded began in the murky aftermath of the fall of Baghdad. After the initial assault was over, the harder, bloodier struggle for peace began.

U.S. casualties began to mount, war costs ballooned past $300 billion and scandals over the abuse of prisoners in Iraq and elsewhere began to broaden. The calls for his resignation began with a few senior Democrats during the 2004 campaign, but slowly military leaders — mostly some who had already retired — started adding their criticism for his conduct of the war.

In response, Rumsfeld told interviewers that criticism in time of war was to be expected. He dismissed much of it as complaints from "naysayers" reluctant to confront the tough realities of a global conflict pitting Islamic extremists against forces of moderation.

He often told troops in the field that in the future, they would look back on their effort in Iraq or Afghanistan and feel proud that they were part of a historic effort to promote freedom.

While some blame him for having no plans for postwar Iraq and misjudging the strength of the insurgency, others say he served as the lightning rod for criticism of the president's war.

"He really has made some very hard calls in the Department of Defense that needed to be made that he hasn't gotten credit for, and he catches a helluva lot of criticism that he personally probably hasn't earned," said Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum, chief of the National Guard. "He just ends up being a convenient target for somebody's frustration or disenchantment."

Rumsfeld's tenure at the Pentagon parallels that of another man whose legacy is also tied to an unpopular war — Robert McNamara, who led the Pentagon during the Vietnam conflict.

"They became identified with the war and the war with them," said Andrew Krepinevich, executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington. "Ultimately they departed as a consequence of the crisis in the field and politics here at home."

Rumsfeld offered his resignation twice to Bush during the furor over prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, but Bush repeatedly declared his support for his embattled secretary. As recently as last month, when the latest in a series of critical books on the war was published, Rumsfeld snapped at reporters asking about his future.

"No, no, no," he said, he was not resigning.

Even Bush, when questioned by reporters a week ago, again declared his support for the secretary and insisted Rumsfeld would stay through the end of his term.

But with casualties climbing beyond 2,800 and U.S. troop levels in Iraq stuck at about 152,000 with little hope of significant reductions anytime soon, Rumsfeld became a political liability the administration could no longer endure. Even the independent Army Times, which serves the armed forces, called for him to resign earlier this week.

And as the announcement sent shock waves through Washington on Wednesday, Bush acknowledged that, in truth, he had been considering the change for at least two weeks.

Rumsfeld remained closed-mouthed about his departure until the very end. Early morning meetings went on as scheduled Wednesday, with no visible inkling of the announcement that was coming.

Then, at 10 a.m., he told the news to Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He asked Pace to let all of the senior military commanders know, shortly before Bush's 1 p.m. address. Rumsfeld also told a few other close senior staff, but much of the Pentagon learned it when it broke in the news.

Walking back into the Pentagon after a late afternoon meeting with Bush, Rumsfeld was circumspect about his departure.

"I've been here six years and I think it's probably good for this department to have a change in leadership that is fresh, that is supportive of the president, as I am," he said. "It will be a different Congress, a different environment, moving towards a presidential election and a lot of partisanship, and it struck me that this would be a good thing for everybody."

Democrats Vow Not To Block Gates Hearings (RC)

By John Stanton, Emily Yehle

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Senate Democrats on Wednesday said they would not look to block hearings on President Bush's nomination of Robert Gates to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, although they stopped short of pledging to confirm Gates during the upcoming lame-duck session of Congress.

Bush announced Gates' nomination after Rumsfeld resigned Wednesday morning. Although Bush in a press conference said he had been preparing for Rumsfeld's departure for at least several days, the timing was viewed by Democrats and political observers as a response to Tuesday's election results.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said in an interview with Roll Call that he thought the Senate could address the nomination during the lame duck, so long as Gates is qualified and is not controversial. "I think we should do it as quickly as we can," Reid said, adding that "the country needs a Secretary of Defense."

Similarly, Senate Armed Services ranking member Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) said he would like to move the nomination as quickly as possible and dismissed any possibility that Democrats would look to hold up the nomination until next year.

"I wouldn't do it for that reason. If we can get the information we need ... I think we ought to then expedite the Senate consideration of that nomination. I would not want to hold it up until next year," Levin said.

Levin and fellow Armed Services member Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) also said the nominee himself may not be as important as whether Rumsfeld's departure signals an actual change in administration policy on Iraq. "What we need is a change in direction," Levin said. "That's what counts regardless of who the secretary of Defense is."

Reed added, "What we don't want to see is repetition of the Rumsfeld situation where relevant information was not forthcoming [to Congress] and it in fact undercut our ability to our job."

Gates, a longtime friend of both President Bush and his father, former President George H.W. Bush, has had a long history of political and business ties to the Bush family.

He served as the director of the Central Intelligence Agency under former President Bush, and has acknowledged deciding to begin his current academic career with Texas A&M at the request of the Bush family, according to press reports in the 1990s covering his arrival at the university.

Although Gates has only given a small amount of money to federal campaigns — including $2,000 to President Bush's re-election campaign in 2004, he sits on the boards of directors for several high-profile companies that have been generous GOP donors.

Executives for NACCO International, Brinker Industries and Parker Drilling Company, as well as Brinker's federal political action committee, have given millions of dollars in contributions to federal candidates and PACs since 2000, the vast majority going to Republicans, according to federal campaign finance records.

Gates also is no stranger to controversy in Washington, D.C. During his time with the CIA under former President Ronald Reagan he became involved in the Iran-Contra scandal, and was accused of overseeing a program which spied on Members of Congress as part of the elaborate guns-for-drugs scheme. Gates, however, denied any knowledge of the program during his confirmation hearings in 1991, and a Democratically controlled Senate confirmed him.

Gates Nomination Marks Change Of Direction For Bush (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — In turning to former CIA Director Robert M. Gates to take the reins at the Pentagon, President Bush has selected a low-key loyalist who is in many ways the opposite of outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Whereas Rumsfeld often seemed bent on running roughshod over the Pentagon brass, Gates is described by longtime associates as collegial and a consensus-builder.

If Rumsfeld had little regard for President George H.W. Bush and many of his pragmatic security advisers, including Brent Scowcroft, Gates was part of that inner circle. He remains close not only to Scowcroft but to other Rumsfeld rivals, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Rumsfeld placed little trust in intelligence agencies and pushed the military to encroach on their turf. In a turning of the tables, a 27-year veteran of the CIA and the National Security Council is poised to take charge of the military.

Democrats praised Gates' nomination, hoping for a less combative Pentagon chief. But Gates has proved controversial in the past. He was forced to withdraw from his first nomination as CIA director before winning a split-vote confirmation four years later.

Across the national-security community Wednesday, the deep contrasts between Rumsfeld and Gates were a subject of conversation.

Rumsfeld "is a guy who is kind of burdened with his own certitude at times," said John Gannon, a former high-ranking CIA official who worked with Rumsfeld and Gates. "That is not Bob Gates. He came out of an analytic culture where listening to the ideas of others and questioning your own assumptions is part of the tradecraft."

In announcing the changes Wednesday, Bush praised Gates' experience, but he also made clear that he expected the nominee to find fresh approaches in Iraq.

"He's a steady, solid leader who can help make the necessary adjustments in our approach to meet our current challenges," Bush said.

Gates is a member of a White House panel, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., that has been charged with developing an array of alternatives to foundering Iraq policies. Gates recently traveled to Iraq as part of that team, according to the White House, and met with Iraqi leaders and U.S. military commanders.

Whereas Rumsfeld was a leading advocate for invading Iraq in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks -- part of an ideological team that regarded deposing Saddam Hussein as unfinished business -- Gates was among those who cautioned the first President Bush not to press toward Baghdad after expelling the Iraqi army from Kuwait in 1992.

Gates, 63, started out at the CIA fresh out of college as a Soviet analyst and is the only agency officer to rise through the analytic ranks to take the top job. He served as CIA director under the elder Bush for a little more than a year before President Clinton was elected.

Gates, who has been president of Texas A&M University since 2002, is not without detractors. He was first nominated to be CIA director by President Reagan in 1987, but he withdrew amid congressional opposition. Gates was considered too closely tied to the Iran-Contra scandal, which had been engineered by former CIA Director William J. Casey while Gates was his deputy.

Rather than taking the helm at the CIA, Gates joined the National Security Council staff at the White House, where he made connections with Scowcroft and Rice.

After the Iran-Contra scandal faded, Gates was nominated to be CIA director by President George H.W. Bush. His 1991 confirmation turned into a battle. Gates was accused of politicizing intelligence -- a charge that has been repeatedly aimed at the White House of George W. Bush. Agency analysts testified that he was heavy-handed in seeking to influence assessments of the Soviet Union. Helater was accused of failing to anticipate that communist regime's collapse.

Gates was confirmed, but his margin of approval -- 64-31 -- represented the largest expression of Senate opposition to a nominee for intelligence director.

One of Gates' first initiatives as director was to confront perceptions that intelligence had been politicized within the agency. He appointed a task force on "analytic objectivity" and implemented all its recommendations.

While CIA director, Gates became embroiled in a controversy over an investigation of questionable financial dealings between a U.S. branch of an Italian government-owned bank and the Iraqi government before the 1991 Persian Gulf War. The Senate Intelligence Committee faulted CIA and Justice Department officials but found no criminal wrongdoing.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, D-W.Va., ranking Democrat on the Senate Intelligence Committee, said Wednesday that the Gates nomination suggested Bush was "searching for a realistic and pragmatic approach in Iraq and the war on terror, rather than continuing on a course driven by ideology."

Bush's Choice Of Gates Sets Stage For Shift On Iraq War Policy (BLOOM)

By Janine Zacharia

Bloomberg, November 9, 2006

Nov. 9 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush's decision to tap one of his father's old advisers, former CIA chief Robert Gates, to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld suggests a readiness to examine a new strategy in Iraq.

Bush's announcement yesterday came after congressional elections swept Democrats to power in the U.S. House on a wave of public discontent about the war in Iraq. The president wanted to move quickly to defuse criticism of his handling of the war effort, analysts said.

Gates is one of 10 members of the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel trying to devise a blueprint for stabilizing the country that can be embraced by Bush. Gates ``will certainly try to extricate us from Iraq, but how fast that can be done I don't know," said Admiral Stansfield Turner, who headed the Central Intelligence Agency from 1977 to 1981.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, former President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser, called Gates' nomination ``the best appointment that President Bush has made" and said it ``may be marking the beginning of a major correction in American policy toward the Middle East."

Gates, 63, who has served in both Democratic and Republican administrations, is known in defense and foreign policy circles as a pragmatist and an advocate of positions Rumsfeld resisted, such as direct negotiations with Iran, Iraq's Shiite neighbor.

Two years ago, Gates co-chaired with Brzezinski a task force on Iran policy that called for selective engagement with Iran ``to promote regional stability."

Father's Team

Gates has remained close to former President George H.W. Bush, and is president of Texas A&M University, which hosts the Bush presidential library. In addition to Gates, the current President Bush is turning to another of his father's elder statesmen for help on Iraq: James Baker.

The former secretary of state is co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group along with ex-Representative Lee Hamilton, an Indiana Democrat. Bush said he will meet next week with the panel.

``I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress" in Iraq, Bush said yesterday.

The Baker panel, which includes officials from President Bill Clinton's administration, is reviewing options for a U.S. withdrawal as Sunni resistance hardens and American influence wanes in Iraq. Bush affirmed yesterday that he wouldn't pull troops out prematurely amid mounting violence.

Civil War

A U.S. intelligence official familiar with the Iraqi insurgency said in an interview that the attempt to create a democracy in Iraq is failing in an atmosphere the official described as a civil war. The official said to restore order and undercut the rebellion, Iraq may have to declare an emergency and install an authoritarian Shiite government to replace what he characterized as the ineffectual Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

The U.S. needs to train and equip as many as 900,000 Iraqi security forces, almost three times the number now planned, and must find a way to persuade Sunni Arab governments such as Saudi Arabia to come off the sidelines and help stabilize Iraq, the official said.

Gates has experience on Iraq, having served as National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft's deputy during the Persian Gulf war in 1991. He has a doctorate in Soviet and Russian history and worked in the 1980s with CIA director William Casey, who led President Ronald Reagan's covert wars to oppose communism in Central America.

Andrew Krepinevich, who heads the non-partisan Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments in Washington and has briefed Pentagon officials on Iraq, sees changes coming.

DOJ_NMG_0092211

``One can make a plausible case that the White House has some insight into the conclusions of the Iraq Study Group, they know what is coming and Gates is comfortable with it," Krepinevich said.

Democrats Rejoice

Democrats rallied around the nomination, saying it was a chance for a new direction.

Senator Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee, said Gates' nomination may indicate Bush ``is searching for a realistic and pragmatic approach in Iraq and the war on terror, rather than continuing on a course driven by ideology."

Michigan's Carl Levin, who would be chairman of the Armed Services Committee if Democrats take control of the Senate, said he will work to confirm Gates before the end of the year.

In remarks at the White House, Gates spoke about challenges beyond Iraq, including Afghanistan and the broader fight against terrorism. ``I believe the outcome of these conflicts will shape our world for decades to come," he said.

Criticism of Gates

Former White House counterterrorism czar Richard Clarke accused Gates, in testimony before the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, of weakening the CIA's spying capabilities. U.S. officials were slow to learn of al-Qaeda's rise because of that, Clarke said.

Melvin Goodman, a former CIA analyst who testified against Gates' confirmation as director in 1991, accused Gates of doctoring intelligence reports to meet administration goals.

``When it comes to telling truth to power, this guy never did," said Goodman, now a senior fellow with the Center for International Policy in Washington. ``He serves a master. He will be very loyal. But will that be good for the country? Will that be good at getting out accurate information on Iraq?"

`Open Minded'

If confirmed, Gates would replace a defense chief known for a brusque and energetic management style, a zeal to transform the military and an unwillingness to admit mistakes -- all of which made Rumsfeld one of the most divisive figures in Bush's cabinet.

By contrast, Gates has proven he is ``open minded and he can work with Democrats," said Michael O'Hanlon, a defense analyst for the non-partisan Brookings Institution.

``Gates has a daunting job, but if I was going to make a list of my top five favorite Republicans with the sheer intellectual firepower to come up with new ideas, Gates would be on that list," O'Hanlon said.

David Boren, a Democrat who chaired the Senate Intelligence Committee from 1987 through 1992, said Gates would be a welcomed change from Rumsfeld's polarizing style. Gates ``always gave members of both parties an equal seat at the table," he said.

Rumsfeld Era

Rumsfeld, 74, oversaw the global fight against terrorism that followed the Sept. 11 attacks. While the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq initially enjoyed broad support, the public's outlook on the conflicts has soured amid sectarian and insurgent violence.

Bush said he met Gates two days before the election at his Crawford, Texas, ranch to discuss the job. Gates ``understands that defeat is not an option in Iraq," Bush said.

Prior to his nomination yesterday, Gates was perhaps best remembered in Washington for his role in the 1980s Iran-Contra scandal. As deputy CIA director under Reagan, he was examined by a special prosecutor who declined to bring criminal charges.

Gates was investigated about whether he misled Congress about when he first learned that White House aides were secretly diverting profits of arms sales to Iran to buy weapons for rebels fighting Nicaragua's anti-American government. The arms sales were intended to persuade Iran to help free hostages held by terrorists in Lebanon.

Levin, who voted against Gates when he was nominated for CIA director, said it would be ``premature" to discuss which way he is leaning now. ``I want to give him a fair and fresh look," he said.

Robert Gates, A Cautious Player From A Past Bush Team (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — In choosing Robert M. Gates as his next defense secretary, President Bush reached back to an earlier era in Republican foreign policy, one marked more by caution and pragmatism than that of the neoconservatives who have shaped the Bush administration's war in Iraq and confrontations with Iran and North Korea.

Soft-spoken but tough-minded, Mr. Gates, 63, is in many ways the antithesis of Donald H. Rumsfeld, the brash leader he would replace. He has been privately critical of the administration's failure to execute its military and political plans for Iraq, and he has spent the last six months quietly debating new approaches to the war, as a member of the Iraq Study Group run by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton.

Mr. Gates last served in Washington 13 years ago, and Mr. Bush made clear on Wednesday that he regarded his nominee as someone who would bring new perspective to the final two years of his tenure.

It was under Mr. Bush's father that Mr. Gates first rose to influence, as deputy national security adviser and then director of central intelligence. He was not part of the group that advised the current President Bush during his 2000 campaign, and he has publicly questioned the administration's approach to Iran, saying in a 2004 report for the Council on Foreign Relations that its refusal to talk to the Tehran government was ultimately self-defeating.

"This is a signal that there will be a major effort to avoid confrontation on national security issues," said Dov Zakheim, a former senior official in Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon who left the administration in 2004. He described Mr. Gates as "a pragmatist and a realist" who would be "no lightning rod."

A longtime Soviet analyst who spent two decades at the Central Intelligence Agency, Mr. Gates served as deputy to Brent Scowcroft, the national security adviser, during the administration of George H. W. Bush. There, he worked closely with Mr. Baker and Condoleezza Rice. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, now the C.I.A. director, also served on the staff of the National Security Council at the time.

Mr. Gates was confirmed in 1991 as director of central intelligence after a bruising confirmation fight in which subordinates alleged that he had politicized reporting on the Soviet Union. He has spent the last 13 years outside of government, in lucrative business posts and at Texas A&M University, first as dean of the George H. W. Bush School of Government and since 2002 as president.

Only 22 months ago, Mr. Gates turned down President Bush's invitation to become the first director of national intelligence. After agonizing for more than two weeks, Mr. Gates later recounted, he decided during a tearful, late-night walk that he "could not leave" the university to return to Washington.

But since March, as a member of Mr. Baker's Iraq Study Group, Mr. Gates has been pondering the central defense policy quandary facing the administration. Summoned to the president's ranch over the weekend and offered the defense secretary's job, this time Mr. Gates said yes.

"Because so many of America's sons and daughters in our armed forces are in harm's way, I did not hesitate when the president asked me to return to duty," Mr. Gates said at the White House ceremony on Wednesday.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser under President Carter and co-author with Mr. Gates of the report on Iran policy, said he hoped the appointment would mean "a major corrective in American policy toward the Middle East."

Born and raised in Wichita, Kan., Robert Michael Gates, whose father sold wholesale auto parts, became an Eagle Scout (he is currently president of the National Eagle Scout Association) and studied European history at the College of William and Mary. He was recruited by the intelligence agency while completing a master's degree at Indiana University and in 1974 finished a doctorate at Georgetown University, writing his dissertation on Soviet views of China.

He first served on the National Security Council staff from 1974 to 1979 under Presidents Nixon, Ford and Carter. After returning to the C.I.A., he was given a series of pivotal jobs by Director William Casey, including deputy director and chairman of the National Intelligence Council.

If Mr. Gates was initially reluctant to return to Washington, it may be because he knows what it means to be at the center of political crossfire. First picked by President Reagan in 1987 to succeed Mr. Casey, Mr. Gates withdrew in the face of senators' concern that he had not been candid about his knowledge of the Iran-contra affair.

In 1991, re-nominated by the first President Bush, he faced a grueling confirmation involving not only Iran-contra but also some colleagues' accusation that he had skewed intelligence reporting on the Soviet Union to suit the Reagan White House. Mr. Gates was confirmed, 61 to 31, as the youngest C.I.A. director in history and oversaw the agency's initial effort to tackle post-cold-war threats.

He later defended his C.I.A. record in a 1996 memoir, "From the Shadows: The Ultimate Insider's Story of Five Presidents and How They Won the Cold War."

On Wednesday, a C.I.A. subordinate who had clashed with him offered a harsh assessment. "This is not a person with a history of telling truth to power," said the former subordinate, Melvin A. Goodman, a Soviet analyst from 1966 to 1990. Mr. Goodman called Mr. Gates a micromanager and "not a big-picture person," though he also called him "a hard-working, disciplined person who's totally loyal to his bosses."

David Boren, a former Democratic chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, had warm praise for Mr. Gates's service. "I found him to be highly intelligent, an excellent manager of the large and complex intelligence community, and totally bipartisan in his approach," Mr. Boren said in a statement.

Bobby R. Inman, a former C.I.A. deputy director and National Security Agency director and an old friend of Mr. Gates, called him "a good listener" who, "after he makes up his mind, is very decisive."

"He's impatient with those whose minds don't move as fast as his does, but he's not arrogant," Mr. Inman said. He compared Mr. Gates's nomination to President Johnson's choice of Clark Clifford, another unflappable old Washington hand, to replace the lightning rod Robert S. McNamara as defense secretary in 1968 at the height of the Vietnam war.

A hint of the approach Mr. Gates might bring to the job, drawing on his experience at the end of the cold war, can be found in his remarks in 2004 at the release of the Council on Foreign Relations report, called "Iran: Time for a New Approach."

"One of our recommendations is that the U.S. government lift its ban in terms of nongovernmental organizations being able to operate in Iran," Mr. Gates said. "Greater interaction between Iranians and the rest of the world," he said, "sets the stage for the kind of internal change that we all hope will happen there."

Gates To Inherit Challenges On Multiple Fronts (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Robert Gates, the former director of the Central Intelligence Agency nominated as defense secretary, will inherit a military badly strained by the Iraq and Afghanistan wars and increasingly skeptical of the transformative vision of his predecessor, Donald Rumsfeld.

But it remains to be seen what kind of long-term vision Mr. Gates, the 63-year-old former director of the Central Intelligence Agency nominated yesterday, will bring to that military if he's confirmed.

Mr. Gates is known as a master operator of the national-security bureaucracy. He is a specialist in Soviet affairs who moved between CIA and National Security Council staff jobs early in his career. He rose in the CIA bureaucracy despite the fact that his background was as an analyst rather than a covert operative, which then was the more normal route to the top.

In the Reagan administration, Mr. Gates had brushes with controversy because of his role as deputy to then-CIA director William Casey, who was deeply involved in sending arms covertly to Nicaragua's Contra rebels. That controversy kept Mr. Gates for a while from being elevated to the job he had always most coveted, director of central intelligence. He ultimately got that job after working as deputy national security adviser for President Bush's father. During his time in the first Bush administration, he was one of the architects of the first Persian Gulf war against Iraq, and helped manage the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Gates, a Kansan with a flat Midwestern accent, became a close and trusted adviser to the first President Bush along the way, and also worked closely with the current secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, who worked below him as an NSC staff member. He had a natural link with Ms. Rice because both are, by background, specialists in Russia and the former Soviet Union. He also developed a close relationship with Brent Scowcroft, the first President Bush's national security adviser, who now has a strained relationship with the Bush White House because of his criticisms of the current approach to Iraq.

A principal question facing Mr. Gates, currently president of Texas A&M University, is what role he will play in policy formulation, as opposed to more narrow management of the Defense Department. People who know him say he is more of a pragmatist who is likely to adopt a more measured approach to the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Inside the Defense Department, the major issue facing him will be whether to shift money from the Air Force and the navy to buttress the Army. Some Army generals -- as well as Sen. John McCain -- have begun to call for a dramatic increase in their budget to reflect a future they believe will be dominated by messy guerrilla wars. Earlier this year, Gen. Peter Schoomaker called for increasing the Army's budget in 2008 to about $140 billion, up from a planned budget of about $114 billion. Such a large increase to the Army budget isn't likely to occur without at least some scaling back of big weapons programs like missile defense, major ships or some of the next-generation fighter-jet programs.

Mr. Rumsfeld had led an ambitious effort to remake the U.S. military into a faster, leaner force. His vision was driven by the belief that communications technology and precision weapons had the capacity to change some fundamental rules of war. The rapid toppling of the Taliban in 2001 and the three-week push that displaced Saddam Hussein in 2003 seemed to confirm his belief that speed and precision could substitute for large ground forces.

But Iraq and Afghanistan have since revealed the limits of a relatively small, high-tech force in bringing security and stability to chaotic lands that could become havens for terrorists. Criticism of Mr. Rumsfeld had been building steadily for almost three years. At first, Democrats excoriated him for failing to more quickly obtain protective armor for troops in Iraq. Then a chorus of retired generals called for his firing, saying his micromanaging of the war planning had resulted in too small a force being sent to Iraq. As U.S. deaths in Iraq surged in the last six weeks, many Republicans jumped on the bandwagon.

It is likely that a Democratic-controlled House of Representatives would have subpoenaed Mr. Rumsfeld early and often as the prominent face of an increasingly unpopular war. His resignation robs opponents of the war of a chance to revisit mistakes in the conflict and make theater of his congressional appearances. It also could make it easier for the administration to hammer out a compromise with moderate critics of the war -- somewhere between its early vow of total victory and opponents' calls for quick withdrawal.

Though killing or delaying big weapons programs is never popular in Congress, some Democrats yesterday suggested they would be open to shifting away from the high-tech weapons systems that made up the core of the Rumsfeld vision to a military more oriented to prevailing in messy guerrilla wars like Iraq, where the premium is on large formations of trained soldiers with more basic equipment.

Asked how he would balance defense-spending pressures, Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton, the likely new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said, "The first thing you have to do is take care of the troops. You can have all the fancy weapons systems in the world, but if you don't have the people, you don't gain a great deal."

Gates To Offer "Fresh Perspective" On Iraq (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

Former CIA Director Robert M. Gates, President Bush's choice to be the new defense secretary, is a retired career intelligence analyst with little experience in military and defense affairs.

If confirmed by the Senate, the university president will take over the Pentagon at a time when U.S. troops are fighting the global war against terrorism, with its most visible and costly battlefront in Iraq.

Mr. Bush, introducing his nominee yesterday, said Mr. Gates "will provide the department with a fresh perspective and new ideas on how America can achieve our goals in Iraq."

Mr. Gates said: "The United States is at war in Iraq and Afghanistan, we are fighting against terrorism worldwide, and we face other serious challenges to peace and our security. I believe the outcome of these conflicts will shape our world for decades to come."

Noting that long-term U.S. strategic interests and security are at risk and U.S. armed forces are in harm's way, Mr. Gates said he did not hesitate to accept Mr. Bush's request to take the Pentagon post.

Iraq looms large in his new position and remains a major focus of political and other critics, including some in the U.S. military and especially the Army who oppose current strategy and tactics, but who have offered few alternatives.

Mr. Gates, 63, currently is part of a special review panel on Iraq headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, Indiana Democrat. The panel is expected to present recommendations soon for sharply revamping the current policy on the Iraq counterinsurgency campaign.

An aide to former President George H.W. Bush, on whose National Security Council staff he served, Mr. Gates is currently president of Texas A&M University, a position he has held since 2002. Before that he headed the George Bush School of Government and Public Service at Texas A&M from 1999 to 2001.

Little is known of Mr. Gates' views on defense and military affairs, other than that he initiated a reform effort to increase intelligence support to the military after shortcomings were found after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. He spent two years as an Air Force intelligence officer from 1966 to 1968, and his career in intelligence focused on the Soviet Union.

He is expected to bring new defense and military policies to the Bush administration that likely will be more moderate than the generally conservative Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, whom he would replace. Based on recent public statements, he is also likely to favor intelligence-based solutions over military ones. By contrast, Mr. Rumsfeld has been a longtime skeptic of U.S. intelligence capabilities, often referring to intelligence products as incomplete or inadequate.

Mr. Gates, as co-chairman of a recent Council on Foreign Relations task force on Iran, stated that forcing regime change in Iran without military action is "highly unlikely" to succeed, and that military action also will not work because of U.S. commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan. The former CIA chief said he favors a policy of "engagement" with Iran on its refusal to abide by international agreements on its nuclear program.

He said in a speech last year that U.S. intelligence agencies had been unfairly criticized for failures, such as those related to the September 11 attacks and Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. Intelligence during the Cold War played an auxiliary role, but is a main element of the war on terrorism and is also more difficult, Mr. Gates said.

Mr. Gates' intelligence career and views were examined in detail during a contentious Senate nomination battle in 1991 for his CIA directorship, which he held from 1991 to 1993. He joined the CIA in 1966. From 1989 to 1991, he was deputy national security adviser in the White House National Security Council.

Senate hearings on the matter revealed Mr. Gates as a seasoned if clean-cut bureaucrat, a view confirmed by his 1996 memoir, "From the Shadows," which revealed his bureaucrat-spy career under five presidents.

Defense Nominee Can Do The Job Without ‘having Rocks Thrown At Him' (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Defense Secretary nominee Robert Gates served more than two decades in intelligence, has served on corporate boards and done a stint as a presidential adviser on national security affairs.

But those who have observed Gates in his most recent incarnation, as president of Texas A&M University since 2002, say that job may have provided the best test of the skills he'll need to succeed if he's confirmed to succeed Donald Rumsfeld as defense secretary.

"He undertook big changes, and evidently did it with good nature and without too many bad feelings," says Felix Moos, an anthropology professor at the University of Kansas and an adviser to the intelligence community.

"He got accomplished what he felt needed to be accomplished" — including firing a football coach and ending admission preferences for children of alumni — "without being picketed or having rocks thrown at him."

Before Texas A&M, the 63-year-old Gates' career revolved around national security.

Raised in Wichita, he joined the CIA shortly after graduating from the College of William and Mary in 1965. Gates, short and round-faced, was no "James Bond type," as he told the Houston Chronicle in 2004. Instead, he was an intelligence analyst specializing in the Soviet Union; spent three years as a deputy director and ran the CIA for 14 months ending in January 1993.

At the CIA, Gates was known as a committed Cold Warrior who believed the Soviet Union was unlikely to become a Western-style market democracy despite Community Party leader Mikhail Gorbachev's reforms of the 1980s.

Gates was alleged by former CIA subordinates to have slanted intelligence about the Soviet threat, Newsweek reported Wednesday on its website. As CIA director, however, he won the respect of liberals for a speech challenging the notion that intelligence collection should serve an administration's goals.

"Bob Gates … said that national security professionals were duty bound to speak the truth to power, telling political leadership when their policies had veered off course," Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., a ranking member of the House Intelligence Committee, said Wednesday.

During the 1980s, Gates was involved in the Reagan administration's plan to sell arms to the government of Iran in return for Iran's help in freeing Americans held hostage in the Middle East.

Those deals were at the heart of the Iran-contra scandal. Lawrence Walsh, the independent counsel investigating the affair, concluded in 1993 that Gates had not been truthful about when he learned money from the Iran sales had been diverted to help the rebels fighting Nicaragua's Soviet-backed government.

Gates claimed he had forgotten an earlier meeting to discuss the funds. He was not prosecuted.

If confirmed, Gates will take over a Pentagon where Rumsfeld's well-documented crustiness has heightened tensions already flowing from a difficult and controversial war. Military analyst Charles Pena says Gates will likely have a much smoother relationship with senior military leaders and with Congress than Rumsfeld did.

"Gates is more likely to be willing to reach across the aisle and find bipartisan consensus, rather than the Rumsfeld approach, which was more or less 'my way or the highway,' " said Pena, of the Independence Institute in Oakland, Calif.

Gates will enter the Pentagon soon after working with Bush's Iraq Study Group to help develop a new U.S. strategy for the war.

Gates' work on the panel is "not inconsequential," says John McLaughlin, a former CIA deputy director and Gates colleague. "What we're seeing is a convergence of pragmatic people … on the next steps."

Two years ago, Gates and Democrat Zbigniew Brzezinski chaired a commission that urged a new approach to Iran that stressed negotiating areas of mutual interest, such as security in Iraq, before tackling nuclear issues.

This isn't the first time Bush has come calling. In January 2005, Gates turned down an offer to take the newly created post of director of national intelligence.

At the time, Gates said he wanted to fulfill a five-year plan at Texas A&M that included $500 million in new construction and the hiring of 450 new faculty members.

"Much has happened both here and around the world since then," he wrote on the university's website Wednesday afternoon.

"I love Texas A&M deeply, but I love our country more, and like the many Aggies in uniform, I am obligated to do my duty."

Gates Well-armed For Tough Job (DMN)

By Jim Landers

The Dallas Morning News, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON – Robert Gates leaves Texas A&M for one of the most thankless jobs in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0092216

But he returns to Washington with powerful, pragmatic allies for the battles ahead with a new Congress and within the White House itself over Iraq policy.

Dr. Gates comes from the circle of national security aides who counseled President Bush's father from 1989 to 1992, including Gen. Brent Scowcroft, Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Gen. Colin Powell, who was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

They urged the elder President Bush not to go on to Baghdad after the defeat of Saddam Hussein's forces in Kuwait.

They have sometimes criticized the current administration's decision to go to war in Iraq, but more often have kept silent about the conduct of the war.

In the current administration's first term, Mr. Powell – then secretary of state – "was a pragmatist, but he got swamped by Don Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney," said one former GOP national security aide, speaking on condition of anonymity.

"Whether Gates will be able to come out against them or the boss himself, that remains to be seen. But he will have someone else to point to as a source of wisdom."

Dr. Gates, 63, said Wednesday that he hadn't anticipated returning to public service.

But he'd already been called back into the national security arena in April as a member of the Iraq Study Group headed by Mr. Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton.

Mr. Bush said he'd be meeting with Mr. Baker next week.

The Iraq Study Group's report is thought to be nearing completion.

"I understand their report is not quite ready yet, but the members pretty much know what it's going to say," said Richard Stoll, a Rice University political science professor.

"It's interesting he [Mr. Bush] would pick somebody familiar with the study group's deliberations."

Dr. Gates can call on Mr. Baker, Mr. Scowcroft and others from the first Bush administration, but he can also seek support from Democrats.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser to former President Jimmy Carter, brought Dr. Gates to the White House from the CIA as a Soviet specialist.

"I think the Gates appointment is the best appointment that President Bush has made in the course of his six years in office," Mr. Brzezinski said.

"I co-chaired with him [Dr. Gates] two years ago a study on American policy towards Iran.

"He is a remarkably intelligent, responsible and balanced individual whose judgment can be trusted and whose common sense is reassuring. This appointment may be marking the beginning of a major corrective in American policy towards the Middle East."

Mr. Bush said Dr. Gates will bring a "fresh perspective" to the Defense Department.

After an election in which the country made clear that it isn't happy with the course of the war, Mr. Stoll said he finds it hard to believe Dr. Gates is eager for the assignment.

"I don't think he or anyone would relish this task, but somebody's got to do it, and I'm sure the president prevailed on his patriotism and sense of duty," Mr. Stoll said.

Dr. Gates, a native of Kansas, was recruited to the CIA in 1966 while studying for his master's degree at Indiana University.

He was commissioned an officer in the Air Force in 1967 and served in the Strategic Air Command.

Dr. Gates got a doctorate in Soviet and Russian history from Georgetown University in 1974 and went on to become the spy agency's top analyst on Soviet affairs.

During the Reagan administration, Dr. Gates was deputy to CIA Director Robert Casey, whose aggressive and clandestine foreign policy forays helped lead the White House into a scandal known as the Iran-Contra affair.

White House aides and CIA agents sold weapons to the revolutionary Islamic regime in Iran in an effort to win release of Americans held captive by Shiite radicals in Lebanon, and they then used the money to supply the Contra rebels fighting the leftist Sandinista regime in Nicaragua.

Mr. Casey died just as the scandal came to light, and President Reagan nominated Dr. Gates to take over as CIA director. But the scandal ruined his chances of confirmation by the Senate.

A special prosecutor investigated Dr. Gates' role, but no charges were brought against him.

The first President Bush named Dr. Gates to head the CIA in 1991, and he held that position until 1993.

At the urging of Gen. Scowcroft, Dr. Gates was named interim dean of the George Bush School of Government and Public Service at Texas A&M. He held that post from 1999 until 2001, and became president of Texas A&M in 2002.

James Mann, author of the 2004 book The Rise of the Vulcans: The History of Bush's War Cabinet, said Dr. Gates was "one of the charter members of the Bush 41 team."

"Gates fit right in, and was close to Scowcroft," Mr. Mann said.

DOJ_NMG_0092217

Gen. Scowcroft has publicly criticized the current administration's Middle East policies and the war in Iraq.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said that while Dr. Gates may be close to Gen. Scowcroft, Mr. Bush still has the final say.

"Clearly if confirmed, Secretary Gates will serve at the president's pleasure, just as Secretary Rumsfeld did," Mr. Cornyn said.

"But what will be useful is to hear sort of a fresh set of ideas, and somebody who has not been burdened by the daily conduct of the global war on terror."

Whether Dr. Gates brings a different view, he at least won't be a lightning rod, said Rep. Mac Thornberry, R-Clarendon, a member of the House Armed Services Committee.

"Rumsfeld's not the issue anymore. He was going to be a continuing target for attacks, and just by having a new person there is a chance, with the Baker-Hamilton group, to try to have some bipartisan work ... on the path ahead," Mr. Thornberry said.

Robert Gates Lauded As Breaker Of Barriers (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson, Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Robert M. Gates, a veteran intelligence official whom President Bush nominated to become his new secretary of defense, is widely viewed as a consensus-builder who may break down barriers between civilian and military leaders -- as well as between the Pentagon and other agencies -- that grew legendary under Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Gates, 63, is a close associate of former president George H.W. Bush and was deputy national security adviser during the Persian Gulf War. He rose rapidly through CIA ranks as a Soviet expert with extensive White House experience to become director of central intelligence from 1991 to 1993. The only setback in his career came in 1987 when he withdrew as President Ronald Reagan's nominee to be CIA director because of his involvement in the Iran-contra affair. In all, Gates has served six presidents in both Republican and Democratic administrations.

A native Kansan with shrewd bureaucratic instincts, Gates lacks the top-down, take-no-prisoners managerial style that won Rumsfeld enemies and instead is more likely to set up task forces and forge agreements behind the scenes, associates said. While Rumsfeld issues flurries of directives and memos, nicknamed "snowflakes," in keeping with his business-executive past, Gates is a listener and leads with the inherent circumspection of an intelligence analyst, they said.

"Rumsfeld's a wrestler. Bob Gates likes to hike," said Richard Haver, a former senior official who has worked closely with both men. "Gates is not about to get on a mat with someone and pin him. With Rumsfeld, pinning is the name of the game."

At the Pentagon, senior military officers said that while Rumsfeld is perceived as arrogant and a fierce turf-battler, Gates is viewed as a far less combative and more conciliatory figure. "Gates has a track record of bipartisan support and being respected and accepted by . . . different parties," said a senior Army general, adding, "I think he'll be fine."

Gates could help ease the tensions that arose as Rumsfeld moved to impose greater civilian control on military services and operations, active and retired military officers said.

Military leaders "will find their voice in a way that they were never going to find it with Rumsfeld. My guess is that he'll listen," a retired four-star general said of Gates, whom he knows. Still, while Gates is expected to handle dissent with more finesse, "he won't be snowed or bamboozled" by senior military officers, said a former official who knows Gates well. "Gates will listen, but he will not always take their advice," he said.

Zbigniew Brzezinski, who was Gates's boss as national security adviser in the Carter White House and today is one of the sharpest critics of the Iraq war, described the appointment yesterday as "the best . . . that President Bush has made in the course of his six years in office." Brzezinski described Gates as someone "whose judgment can be trusted and whose common sense is reassuring," and said that "this appointment may be marking the beginning of a major corrective in American policy towards the Middle East."

Former senator Sam Nunn (D-Ga.), whose questioning of Gates in 1987 led to the withdrawal of his nomination to be CIA director, praised his "ability to work closely with Congress on a bipartisan basis" and said he "has a well-deserved reputation on both sides of the aisle for competency and integrity."

Gates is a member of the Iraq Study Group, a congressionally mandated bipartisan commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). The group's review of the situation in Iraq over the past several weeks will give Gates momentum going into his new job, observers said. "Gates is going to have to move pretty fast. He doesn't have a lot of time to study this," said the retired four-star general.

Several associates stressed that Gates is a pragmatist and not an ideologue, and characterized him as being the same type of moderate Republican on foreign policy issues as Baker. A senior intelligence officer who has known Gates for 30 years described him as tough, brilliant and hard-working, but said Gates has sharp elbows for those who get in his way.

Gates has experience with Iraq as well as Afghanistan. He was deputy national security adviser during the 1991 Gulf War and helped oversee U.S.-sponsored operations in Afghanistan under Reagan in the 1980s.

Gates, who holds a PhD in Soviet history from Georgetown University, left government in 1993 for academia. He became president of Texas A&M University in 2002, a post he described yesterday as the most enjoyable of his career.

"I had not anticipated returning to government service," he said at a White House announcement ceremony, flanked by Bush and Rumsfeld. But he said that the United States is engaged in wars that "will shape our world for decades to come," and that with "so many of America's sons and daughters . . . in harm's way, I did not hesitate when the president asked me to return to duty."

Gates appeared to get a cordial reception from members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, which will have to confirm his appointment. "I think he will be a very pleasant change from Secretary Rumsfeld" in his dealings with Congress, said Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), a vocal member of the panel.

But Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.), a member of the House intelligence panel, called the Gates nomination "deeply troubling."

Holt, a retired intelligence officer and a nuclear physicist, said that while at the CIA's helm, "Gates developed a reputation for pressuring analysts and managers to shape analytical conclusions to fit administration positions." Holt said Gates's confirmation hearing "should be thorough and probing."

While Gates contrasts sharply with Rumsfeld in style, the two are comparable in intellect and energy, associates said. Only hours after a recent knee surgery, for example, Gates took part in the Texas A&M football weekend tradition known as the "midnight yell," said Michael C. Desch, a professor of intelligence at the university. One of Gates's major initiatives at the university was to muster support for a 25 percent increase in the size of the faculty, which was "huge," Desch said, and won Gates admiration.

A former Eagle Scout, Gates is an avid hiker who enjoys spending time at his vacation house in the Pacific Northwest. He is married and has two children.

Rumsfeld, A Force For Change, Did Not Change With The Times Amid Iraq Tumult (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — From the day he took control at the Pentagon, Donald H. Rumsfeld was determined to reassert civilian control of the defense establishment and create a leaner, more lethal American military.

With President Bush's endorsement, he pursued his goals with a vengeance, emerging as the most powerful secretary of defense since Robert S. McNamara more than three decades earlier.

Like his predecessor, Mr. Rumsfeld was undone by policies that resulted in a quagmire in a distant land. The defense secretary's resistance to deploying a large number of troops in Iraq, his skepticism of nation-building and his reluctance to acknowledge a potent insurgency made an already challenging situation all the more difficult. As the turmoil grew in Iraq, the defense secretary who once described himself as "genetically impatient" and a force for change was slow to adapt.

"The ironic thing is that he may end up being criticized for not being more on top of Iraq," said Eliot A. Cohen, a military historian and professor at the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University. "Blame needs to be shared all around on Iraq, but he bears his share of responsibility by not being willing to make the kinds of corrections early on that were necessary."

Mr. Rumsfeld did not acknowledge missteps on Iraq in his appearance with President Bush on Wednesday, but obliquely accepted that he had become a lightning rod for criticism of the war. Paraphrasing Winston Churchill, he said, "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

Mr. Rumsfeld came to the Pentagon as a consummate insider. Among an array of important government posts, he had been defense secretary under President Ford, developing a reputation as a ruthlessly effective bureaucratic infighter.

After a career as a corporate chief executive, he returned to the Pentagon after George W. Bush was elected president. Mr. Bush had vowed during his campaign to appoint a powerful defense secretary with a mandate to overhaul the American military. Mr. Rumsfeld was to be that man.

At the Pentagon, Mr. Rumsfeld's program was called "transformation," and it acquired the status of an official ideology. Mr. Rumsfeld was enamored of missile defense and space-based systems, issues he had worked on during his years out of office. Like many conservatives, he was wary about the Army leadership, which he considered to be too wedded to heavy forces and too slow to change.

In his trademark blunt style, Mr. Rumsfeld convened a Pentagon "town hall" meeting on Sept. 10, 2001. "The topic today is an adversary that poses a threat, a serious threat, to the security of the United States of America," he pronounced. "It's the Pentagon bureaucracy."

After the terror attacks in Washington and New York the next day, Mr. Rumsfeld focused on the new war on terrorism. The defense secretary was a solid ally of Vice President Dick Cheney, who worked for Mr. Rumsfeld during the Nixon and Ford years. And he soon emerged as a spokesman for the administration's national security policies, presiding over news conferences at which he issued pithy observations about the need to be prepared for the "unknown unknowns."

Within the military establishment, however, the defense secretary quickly became a contentious figure as his penchant for hands-on management and his theories on military transformation were given a field test. Mr. Rumsfeld did not decide how many troops would be deployed for the war in Iraq, but he helped pick the generals who did. He never hesitated to push, prod and ask questions to shape their recommendations.

It was Mr. Rumsfeld who complained that the plan for invading and securing Iraq that had been left behind by Gen. Anthony C. Zinni, Tommy Franks's predecessor at the United States Central Command, called for more troops. As many as 500,000 troops would be sent to secure Iraq. Mr. Rumsfeld dismissed it as old thinking, according to retired Lt. Gen. Greg Newbold.

According to General Franks, Mr. Rumsfeld was the impetus behind one of the most contentious decisions of the war: canceling the deployment of the First Cavalry Division, which was to reinforce the initial invasion force. That left the American military with fewer troops as the insurgency was beginning to develop.

It was also Mr. Rumsfeld who insisted that the Pentagon take the lead in overseeing postwar planning and the administration of Iraq in the first critical months of the occupation after the ouster of Saddam Hussein from power. When Baghdad was gripped by looting in April 2003, the defense secretary dismissed the disorder as little more than the pent-up frustrations of an oppressed people: "Stuff happens."

According to L. Paul Bremer III, the American civilian administrator in Iraq, and his aides, Mr. Rumsfeld was consulted on the controversial decision to formally disband the Iraqi Army.

Iraq, of course, is just part of Mr. Rumsfeld's legacy. In terms of his management style, he clearly succeeded in consolidating his authority as defense secretary. More than any of his predecessors, Mr. Rumsfeld influenced the appointment of three- and four-star officers, installing military leaders whom he could count on to carry out his agenda. But senior officers complained that his insistence on loyalty came at a cost: a dearth of senior officers willing to offer independent advice.

In terms of his transformation agenda, Mr. Rumsfeld enjoyed, at best, mixed success. He overhauled the cold-war-era system of military bases around the world, a decision that has led to the reduction in American forces in Europe and Korea. He also insisted on greater cooperation among the military services.

"On the positive side he brought the armed forces to a much higher degree of joint thinking and integration," said Barry M. Blechman, a member of the Defense Policy Board, which advises Mr. Rumsfeld, and the president of DFI International, a consulting firm.

Still, despite Mr. Rumsfeld's avowed intention to challenge orthodox Pentagon thinking, few major weapons programs were canceled and the military's force structure and spending patterns were not radically altered.

"At the end of the day you would have to say that for Rumsfeld, transformation was more promise than reality," said Andrew F. Krepinevich Jr., the executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments. "He made a start, but these things take time, and it is clear now that Iraq has denied him that time."

Rumsfeld Sought A New Role For Pentagon (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

The secretary's strategy led him to dominate national security policy more than any figure since Henry Kissinger.

Donald H. Rumsfeld came to the job of Defense secretary determined not only to remake the U.S. military, but to recast the Pentagon's role in national security.

He arrived with a prescription for what he believed ailed the Pentagon. As he later put it in one of his famous "snowflake" memos — so named by staffers because they arrived in a constant blizzard — the department was "tangled in its anchor chain." Rumsfeld saw the military as paralyzed by old thinking, outdated policies, service rivalries and a love of slow-moving tanks and aircraft carriers.

The Pentagon, State Department, National Security Council and intelligence community have always jockeyed for influence. But in the Bush Cabinet, Rumsfeld — in part through the force of his personality — established himself and his department as the first among equals, coming to dominate national security policy more thoroughly than any figure since Henry Kissinger.

"He was the Olympic athlete of interagency ruthless bureaucrats," said retired Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey. "He was charming, determined and absolutely brutal to those who opposed his ideas."

Rumsfeld's insistence that the Pentagon take the lead left him with responsibility for the course of the war in Iraq. And after a stunning repudiation by voters of the administration's policy on the war, Rumsfeld is leaving at what is arguably a low point in the U.S. effort.

President Bush's new Defense nominee, Robert M. Gates, is likely to be the first member of an entirely new team on Iraq. Senior State Department officials have said in recent days that Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, also is expected to resign. And senior Army officials have said they expect Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, to leave his post by early next year.

Bush said Wednesday that he had come to the conclusion before the election that a new Defense secretary was needed.

"Secretary Rumsfeld and I agreed that sometimes it's necessary to have a fresh perspective," he said.

As a result, the Pentagon chief known for lightning-rod comments about the Iraq conflict — such as his observation in 2004 that "you go to war with the Army you have, not the Army you might want or wish to have" — stepped down Wednesday.

According to two associates, Rumsfeld had wanted to serve as Defense chief as long as he could get things done. With criticism of the president's Iraq policy mounting and the U.S. prospects in the war worsening, he concluded he could no longer be effective.

"He came to accept that the scales had tipped the other way," said an associate who spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid any appearance of violating a confidence.

In brief remarks at the White House, Rumsfeld alluded to the rising criticism of the war of which he was a prime architect. Quoting Winston Churchill, he said, "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

After the 2001 invasion of Afghanistan, led primarily by special operations forces and CIA paramilitary fighters, Rumsfeld emerged with a reputation as a decisive leader. The seemingly successful invasion of Iraq in 2003 further burnished that image.

But public perception of Rumsfeld began to change as the war in Iraq dragged on and American casualties mounted. Critics charged that he had ignored or downplayed the insurgency until it was too late and Iraq had descended into sectarian conflict.

His six years under Bush were Rumsfeld's second tour in the job. He was Pentagon chief for a little over a year in the Ford administration. If he remains in office until Dec. 29, he will best the record of Robert S. McNamara, who oversaw the Vietnam War and served for more than seven years.

Rumsfeld exerted huge influence in the Pentagon because he mastered both the sweeping revolutionary ideas that so enamored Bush as well as the sometimes arcane bureaucratic fine points on which Washington runs.

"He had such an influence on the department, by the sheer force of his personality.... His rule and dictates drilled way down into the bureaucracy in the Pentagon," said James J. Townsend Jr., a civilian Pentagon official who helped direct North Atlantic Treaty Organization policy before retiring last month.

Though Townsend acknowledged that Rumsfeld is likely to be judged first by the Iraq war, he added that it is important to acknowledge that the secretary changed how the Defense Department does business.

"He really did go in with a broom and shake out a lot of cobwebs and force people to think differently," said Townsend, now the international security program director at the Atlantic Council, a Washington organization that supports NATO projects.

It is hard to imagine a more controversial leader within the department. Few in the Pentagon were ambivalent Wednesday about Rumsfeld's leadership.

His many supporters credit him with making tough decisions, speeding up the transformation of the military, cutting outdated weapons systems, advancing the missile defense system, creating a new focus on domestic security, repositioning forces out of Germany and South Korea, and reorganizing the Army to make it more adaptable.

But critics shook their heads in dismay as he considered cutting the Army by two divisions early in his tenure. They also charge that he allowed strong-willed deputies to drop the military's adherence to the baseline standards of the Geneva Convention and created a military prison at Guantanamo Bay beyond the reach of American courts.

The critics said he equated long experience with antiquated thinking, and ran roughshod over people who offered alternate ideas. To these critics, the difficulties of the Iraq war are the natural result of Rumsfeld's tendency to ignore the warnings of others.

Lawrence DiRita, a former advisor to Rumsfeld, disputed the criticism and argued that his former boss accelerated the military's move toward a more nimble and faster-moving force.

"Adversaries around the world understand how much more capable we are today," DiRita said. "There has been a paradigm shift at the Department of Defense toward speed, agility and precision."

DiRita said Rumsfeld is not to blame for the problems in Iraq.

"I think it would be counter-factual for people to conclude that but for Don Rumsfeld, things in Iraq would be very different," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0092221

But many believe that the setbacks in the war have much to do with Rumsfeld's insistence on a small invasion force and his early dismissal of the idea that the U.S. military has a duty to help rebuild nations.

McCaffrey, a Rumsfeld critic, said the outgoing secretary was blinded by his view that the military was antiquated and by his decision not to listen to military experts.

"This very determined man managed, through arrogance and misjudgment, to put the country's armed forces in a strategically perilous position," McCaffrey said. "He thought we were a colossal group of lower-class minds rooted in World War II, and he was going to help us to understand the nature of warfare."

Rumsfeld's supporters argue that his emphasis on precision strikes and the power of expeditionary forces will have the most lasting impact.

But other officers believe Rumsfeld's transformation of the military will be overshadowed by the experience in Iraq, a war that stands to profoundly reshape America's armed forces in other ways.

Rumsfeld, A Newsmaker Who's Certainly Hard To Follow (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Is he stepping down? You bet. Does he admit defeat? Not by a long shot. Is the country going to miss the way he acted smarter than everyone else and often preempted media questions by interrogating himself as a rhetorical device? Sort of -- the way you might miss your father's spankings.

Goodness gracious! Donald Rumsfeld, who resigned yesterday, not only has been secretary of defense for six years, he's been secretary of offense. During his tenure, briefings by the head of the armed forces became tours de force. He would clap his hands, lick his lips, narrow his eyes into a squinty gaze and extemporize, patronize, chastise, sermonize and crack wise all at the same time.

He had his admirers. "Reporters often told me that he raised the levels of their performances," says former Pentagon spokeswoman Torie Clarke. "He forced them to be more precise in the way they asked questions." She says he obviously respected the role of the media in society.

"He tries very hard not to talk before he's thought through his answer," she says. "He thinks before he speaks."

And he had his detractors. Calvin Trillin, a writer for the New Yorker and author of "A Heckuva Job: More of the Bush Administration in Rhyme," says he has been amazed at Rumsfeld's ability to be at once brashly know-it-all and disarmingly homespun. "It was a wonderful mixture of arrogance and 'Aunt Harriet' language" like goodness gracious, Trillin says. "I don't think anybody can match that."

In the introduction to his book, Trillin writes that Rumsfeld conducted his press briefings "as if trying patiently to explain the obvious to a class of slow third-graders. (Might you prefer to be briefed by someone less arrogant and condescending? Yes. Do we always get what we want? Of course not.)"

Late-night comedians will miss him. He was an easy mark.

And for a while, back in the early days of the fighting in Afghanistan, he was considered a rock star, a sex symbol to some. But the country's fascination with him flagged as more and more people began to question the war in Iraq.

Rumsfeld always had an answer. He will be remembered as a master at holding up a word or a phrase as if it were Silly Putty, then twisting it, bouncing it, stretching it to his own liking. For instance, the time he decided that people should eschew the word "insurgents" and call them "enemies of the legitimate Iraqi government" instead.

Or the time he spoke of the precariousness of the contemporary world. "Reports that say that something hasn't happened are always interesting to me," Rumsfeld said, "because as we know, there are known knowns; there are things we know we know. We also know there are known unknowns; that is to say we know there are some things we do not know. But there are also unknown unknowns -- the ones we don't know we don't know."

He said, "The absence of evidence is not evidence of absence."

If you missed his briefings, you can still find some fragments on the Internet. God bless YouTube. It's a rip-roaring repository of Rummified irascibility.

In one video snippet he uses a high-in-the-throat, marmish tone to tell a Pentagon reporter that he is "wrong!" The reporter tries to speak and Rumsfeld wags his finger. "Just a minute, just a minute!"

There's a clip in which he mimics a dropping guillotine with his hand and says, "This is complicated stuff."

For six years, Rumsfeld was the civilian rooster in the military henhouse -- the alpha male. Yesterday, he was the omega male, giving his last briefing as the unequivocal secretary of defense. Bush spoke first. Then Robert Gates, the newly nominated secretary of defense. Then Rumsfeld. He had the last word.

DOJ_NMG_0092222

He stood at a funereal black lectern in the Oval Office and explained things one last time. He clapped his hands to get things started. He licked his lips. He narrowed his eyes into a squinty gaze and recalled the words of Winston Churchill, who said, "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

And Rumsfeld reminded the nation one more time about "this little understood, unfamiliar war, the first war of the 21st century -- it is not well known, it was not well understood."

Australia Hails Rumsfeld, Pledges To Stay In Iraq (AFP)

AFP, November 9, 2006

Australia hailed outgoing US Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld as a "champion of freedom" and pledged that Canberra would keep its troops in Iraq.

Defence Minister Brendan Nelson made the commitment shortly after US President George W. Bush sacrificed Rumsfeld when mid-term elections revealed the depth of voter anger over the war in Iraq.

"Mr Rumsfeld has a long and distinguished record of service to his country," Nelson said in a statement.

"He has been a true champion of freedom. I greatly appreciated working with him. Equally, I look forward to working with his successor.

"The government remains committed to supporting the people of Iraq and their democratically elected government against the insurgents and terrorists working to destroy that democracy.

"We will continue to work with our allies and the Iraqi Security Forces until Iraq can handle its own security."

Prime Minister John Howard, a close ally of Washington, has repeatedly rejected opposition calls for Australian troops to be withdrawn from Iraq, saying the country would not "cut and run".

Howard deployed Australian troops as part of the US-led invasion of Iraq. Some 1,400 troops are now involved in Iraqi operations.

Rumsfeld's Departure (NYT)

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

Whatever this election accomplished -- and it remains to be seen if it ended the rancor and distrust that define current American politics -- voters made it crystal clear that they want a change in direction in Iraq. Democratic and Republican leaders alike agreed that it had to begin with replacing Donald Rumsfeld as Secretary of Defense.

President Bush showed that he had heard the second half of that message and finally rid himself of the man whose bad judgments and inept leadership had done so much to create the mess in Iraq. But it still was not clear that he has yet heard the first, and more important part of the message. At his press conference, Mr. Bush was still talking about victory in precisely the same terms he had used before the election, and offered no clear sense that he was prepared to open his mind to a real change in strategy.

The challenge for Mr. Rumsfeld's chosen successor, Robert Gates, who was a deputy national security adviser to Mr. Bush's father and then served as Director of Central Intelligence, will be to make Mr. Bush realize how desperate the situation is in Iraq and that the conduct of the war should be dictated by reality and not ideology.

It's possible that no one could have turned the invasion of Iraq into a success, given the fissures in Iraqi society that the fall of Saddam Hussein exposed. But we will never know, since the shortage of American troops and the lack of postwar planning made disaster inevitable. Mr. Rumsfeld deserved to go simply because he failed at his job. Denying that reality is presumably why the president was so bent on keeping him until the Republicans' huge losses at the polls on Tuesday forced his hand.

Before he presided over the Iraq invasion, Mr. Rumsfeld promised that as secretary of defense he was going to transform America's military so it was prepared to fight the conflicts of the 21st century. Mr. Bush has cited the progress being made on that front as one of the reasons he wants Mr. Rumsfeld to stay. But -- in a familiar pattern for this administration -- the changes have been more rhetorical than real.

Truly transforming the military would have meant trading in expensive cold war weaponry, like attack submarines and stealth fighters, for pilotless drones, swifter ships and lighter, more mobile ground forces. Mr. Rumsfeld never had the interest -- or the political will -- to take on that fight. Instead, he bought peace with Congress and the military brass by holding down the size of ground forces in order to continue paying the ballooning cost of unnecessary weaponry. He created a smaller, more mobile force that was too small to successfully pacify Iraq.

There was absolutely nothing more left for Mr. Rumsfeld to do as secretary of defense except continue to defend failed policies and tinker with unworkable strategies. Most of the men and women who will be part of the new Congress came to that conclusion, whatever their party affiliation. Mr. Bush was claiming yesterday to be open to changes, talking repeatedly of a report from a bipartisan commission on Iraq that is due out soon. But we're still waiting for a sign that Mr. Bush has grasped the urgency of the unfolding disaster in Iraq as anything beyond a political problem. Mr. Rumsfeld's departure is merely the first step. It has to be followed by a major change in policy if American troops can be brought home without leaving a disaster behind.

A Bush Retreat? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

President Bush made a crucial point at his press conference yesterday when he warned America's "enemies" not to read the vicissitudes of our democracy as "a lack of will." Too bad he then undermined that message by accepting the "resignation" of Donald Rumsfeld a day after his party's election defeat -- and only a week after saying he wanted his defense secretary to serve out his term.

We realize Mr. Rumsfeld had become a political lightening rod, and that after six years Mr. Bush may want someone else to engage on defense policy with Democrats who have demanded the Pentagon chief's head. But the timing of the secretary's dispatch, and Mr. Bush's flustered explanation about the cause and timing, sent a message of retreat, rather than resolve. His nomination of Robert Gates also doesn't reassure us about Mr. Bush's policy direction.

When the history of this era is written, Mr. Rumsfeld is likely to fare much better than his many critics assert. The secretary has been a convenient political foil -- for Democrats, for generals who didn't like the way he exercised civilian control at the Pentagon, and especially for erstwhile war supporters who wanted to blame the Iraqi insurgency on some individual rather than on the inevitable complications and setbacks of any war.

Everyone now takes for granted the ease with which U.S. forces ousted the Taliban in Afghanistan, so it's worth recalling the many predictions at the time of Soviet-style "quagmire." There was also the speed with which Saddam Hussein's regime was toppled, in part because Mr. Rumsfeld's insistence of a light-and-fast strategy prevented what might have been a protracted siege of Baghdad. The military historian John Keegan has called this campaign "the farthest advance at speed over distance ever recorded" in a military operation, and at the time it saved thousands of lives.

Mr. Rumsfeld was also a strong leader inside the Pentagon, insisting that the Armed Services learn to operate jointly, and taking on service chiefs over outmoded ideas and weapons systems. For years American editorialists screamed about Pentagon pork, only to criticize Mr. Rumsfeld for alienating some Army generals when he actually did something about it.

The defense secretary can be faulted for underestimating the Iraq insurgency, but he has plenty of company, especially the CIA. The "small footprint" strategy for U.S. forces was as much General John Abizaid's as Mr. Rumsfeld's. And the worst mistake in Iraq -- the needlessly slow development of Iraq's political and security institutions -- was much more the fault of L. Paul Bremer, Condoleezza Rice and CIA and State Department officials including current Deputy National Security Adviser Meghan O'Sullivan.

They refused to support an Iraqi government of "exiles" early enough, only to end up with a government made up largely of those same exiles after elections were finally held. For reasons we will someday learn, Mr. Bush poorly managed the disputes on his national security team over strategy toward post-invasion Iraq. In any case, the President may soon miss having Mr. Rumsfeld as his chief flak-catcher on Iraq; perhaps Ms. Rice will now volunteer for that duty.

Which brings us back to Mr. Gates, whose nomination makes us wonder if Mr. Bush is signaling a change in policy, or worse, a new resignation toward Iraq. Mr. Gates is a capable public servant with broad security experience. But much of that experience is with the CIA, which has misjudged the nature of the enemy throughout this conflict. Mr. Gates is also on the Baker-Hamilton study group that Congress established to examine policy options for Iraq, and we hope his nomination doesn't mean Mr. Bush has already signed onto its soon-to-be-released recommendations. One of those proposals is reportedly a new engagement with Iran and Syria, which would make a hash of the President's "freedom agenda."

Most troubling regarding Iraq, Mr. Gates was deputy national security adviser under Brent Scowcroft in 1991, when President Bush's father abandoned the Shiite uprising that followed the first Gulf War. One reason the Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki has had such a hard time dismantling Shiite militias is because Shiites fear that it's only a matter of time before the U.S. abandons them again and they will have to confront the Sunni Baathist insurgency on their own. If President Bush wants to reassure Shiites on this score and about Mr. Gates, he should announce that the recent efforts to appease the Sunni terrorist political fronts in Iraq have failed.

We presume Mr. Gates will be grilled about these and other issues during his confirmation hearings. He should be.

Exit Strategy, Post-Rumsfeld (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

BETTER LATE THAN never. More than two years after Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld offered to resign in the aftermath of the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, President Bush finally agreed to let Rumsfeld go, to make room for a "fresh perspective." It's an easy gesture at this point — the political equivalent of bringing down the piñata once it's been battered beyond recognition.

The "fresh perspective" will be provided by a close confidant of Bush's father, former CIA Director Robert M. Gates. Gates is everything Rumsfeld isn't: an understated, consensus-seeking Washington operator.

When Bush took office, his diplomatic and national security team of Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice and Rumsfeld exuded a sense of seasoned competence. Yet they presided over a faith-based policymaking that has proved disastrous to the national interest.

Rumsfeld was right to embrace the need for a technology-driven military revolution. But he confused the need to modernize weapons systems and create a more nimble military with a license to wage war on the cheap, famously dismissing advice that it would take several hundred thousand troops to secure Iraq. The occupation was ill-planned because of a reliance on the assumptions of overzealous neocon thinkers.

Now, after the gains made by Democrats in an election rightly viewed as a referendum on Iraq, Bush needs to do more than accept Rumsfeld's resignation. Characteristically, Bush sent a mixed message at Wednesday's news conference. He emphasized the "fresh perspective" that Gates would bring to the job, but he continued to define "victory" in utopian terms: a democratic Iraq "that can defend, govern and sustain itself, and [be] an ally in the war on terror."

Bush also suggested that he might find "common ground" with victorious congressional Democrats who had demanded a new approach to Iraq. The circle may be squared by the elder Bush's chief consigliere, James A. Baker III, who is presiding over the so-called Iraq Study Group — which not coincidentally counts one Robert Gates among its members.

Even before the election, administration officials and some Democrats were predicting that the Baker panel would provide a rationale for the president to scale down his ambitions for Iraq and expedite the implementation of his promise that "as the Iraqis stand up, we will stand down" — even if the posture of Iraqi forces (or of Iraqi democracy) leaves something to be desired.

It still would be preferable if Washington could find a way to induce Iraqi factions to pull back from civil strife and establish a stable, democratic and multi-religious state. But that may be impossible. If Bush feels he must camouflage lowered expectations in the language of "victory," his newfound collaborators in the Democratic Party — and the voters who selected them — are unlikely to object.

Rumsfeld's Out But Way Too Late (BOSH)

Boston Herald, November 9, 2006

Well, better late than never, as they say.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld should have been out the door two years ago, but President Bush has been loyal to a fault. Tuesday he and his party paid an enormous price for that with the voters. But they spoke and Bush - finally - listened.

The departure of Rumsfeld alone won't immediately reverse course in Iraq. But it is a long overdue acknowledgment that that policy has endangered and betrayed the very troops now assigned to pacify that fractured nation.

The appointment of Robert Gates, a former director of the CIA and current president of Texas A&M University, bodes well for a national security team that can, as the president indicated, bring a fresh perspective to a war the American people have clearly grown weary of.

Gates as a member of the Iraq Study Group, which is scheduled to issue its report to the nation at the end of this month, is already well versed in what will be his main mission. He will need no on-the-job training. And he enters the Pentagon with something Rumsfeld lost long, long ago - the confidence of the military's own leaders who know him and are more likely to trust his judgment.

But lest this internal dispute over strategy be mistaken, Bush said yesterday, "To our enemies, do not be joyful. Do not confuse the workings of our democracy with a lack of will. Our nation is committed to bringing you to justice. Liberty and democracy are the source of America's strength . . . "

And so they have been this week, even as voters made known their obvious displeasure with this administration and with the conduct of the war in Iraq. Now the man who led that effort is gone. Good riddance.

Right Warrior, Wrong War (AR)

The Arizona Republic, November 9, 2006

Generals are forever fighting the last war. If ever there was a truism embedded in military critics, this is it.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, who resigned on Wednesday, believed it with every ounce of iron in his hardened soul. From the start of his second shift as civilian director of America's military on Jan. 20, 2001, Rumsfeld sought to remake the nation's fighting forces lighter, faster, more integrated and more responsive.

DOJ_NMG_0092225

The lightning invasion of Saddam Hussein's Iraq in early 2003 helped vindicate Rumsfeld's judgment that forces smaller and faster than the massive army arrayed against Saddam in 1991 in Kuwait could do the job.

Unfortunately, from that point forward Rumsfeld, too, was fighting the last war. Neither Rumsfeld nor President Bush seemed to see that the invasion was one war, the struggle against the bloody insurgency quite another.

The fact that shortly after the invasion the Defense secretary contemplated reducing the U.S. military presence in Iraq to less than half the size of the 160,000-member invasion force says all about his inability to distinguish one operation from the next. He was fighting the insurgency with the strike force. He was fighting the last war.

Much has been made of Rumsfeld's steely resistance to criticism of the administration's pacification plans in Iraq - plans that thus far have failed to quell insurgent violence there.

Earlier this year, eight retired generals called for his resignation, and just a day before the election, the nation's independent military newspapers, published by Gannett, jointly called for the same.

Democrats, until Tuesday the minority party in Congress, railed against his lack of an Iraq plan. But they were hardly alone. Among the secretary's most adamant critics was Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of the staunchest defenders of the war to depose Saddam. It didn't seem to make a dent.

Firmness in wartime is a virtue, certainly. As is consistency of leadership. And in his six years as Defense secretary - a record tenure, by the way - Rumsfeld demonstrated both. A war against a merciless foe needed to be won, and for all his hardheaded faults, Rumsfeld clearly had the determination to see it through.

Following the scandalous revelations of prisoner abuse at the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad, many outraged supporters of ousting Saddam, including this newspaper, called for Rumsfeld to step down. To take responsibility for the reckless betrayals of decency perpetrated on his watch.

Later, as Iraqis by the millions appeared to be moving forward - establishing a federal constitution, electing a parliament - the need for resolution, for consistency, re-emerged. But the primary task of the American force in Iraq, under Rumsfeld, has been to establish and maintain the peace necessary for that nascent democracy to assert itself. And that has not come to pass.

With Rumsfeld's resignation, Bush has extended an enticing olive branch to incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who as recently as Wednesday called for Rumsfeld to leave.

Presumably, designated successor Robert M. Gates, a former CIA director, will offer a more detailed plan for completing the job in Iraq. Presumably, too, the now-empowered Democrats will offer their own, more detailed plan for the sort of changes in Iraq that they envision.

Their often-elusive demand for "change of direction" in Iraq, after all, is a battle cry of the last political war . . . the one fought before their victories on Tuesday. The American people deserve a clearer plan from their new congressional leaders as well.

A Come-to-Daddy Moment (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

Poppy Bush and James Baker gave Sonny the presidency to play with and he broke it. So now they're taking it back.

They are dragging W. away from those reckless older guys who have been such a bad influence and getting him some new minders who are a lot more practical.

In a scene that might be called "Murder on the Oval Express," Rummy turned up dead with so many knives in him that it's impossible to say who actually finished off the man billed as Washington's most skilled infighter. (Poppy? Scowcroft? Baker? Laura? Condi? The Silver Fox? Retired generals? Serving generals? Future generals? Troops returning to Iraq for the umpteenth time without a decent strategy? Democrats? Republicans? Joe Lieberman?)

The defense chief got hung out to dry before Saddam got hung. The president and Karl Rove, underestimating the public's hunger for change or overestimating the loyalty of a fed-up base, did not ice Rummy in time to save the Senate from teetering Democratic. But once Sonny managed to heedlessly dynamite the Republican majority — as well as the Middle East, the Atlantic alliance and the U.S. Army — then Bush Inc., the family firm that snatched the presidency for W. in 2000, had to step in. Two trusted members of the Bush 41 war council, Mr. Baker and Robert Gates, have been dispatched to discipline the delinquent juvenile and extricate him from the mother of all messes.

Mr. Gates, already on Mr. Baker's "How Do We Get Sonny Out of Deep Doo Doo in Iraq?" study group, left his job protecting 41's papers at Texas A&M to return to Washington and pry the fingers of Poppy's old nemesis, Rummy, off the Pentagon.

"They had to bring in someone from the old gang," said someone from the old gang. "That has to make Junior uneasy. With Bob, the door is opened again to 41 and Baker and Brent."

W. had no choice but to make an Oedipal U-turn. He couldn't let Nancy Pelosi subpoena the cranky Rummy for hearings on Iraq. "He's not exactly Mr. Charming or Mr. Truthful, and he'd be on TV saying something stupid," said a Bush 41 official. "Bob can just go up to the Hill and say: 'I don't know. I wasn't there when that happened.' "

Bob Gates, his friends say, had been worried about the belligerent, arrogant, ideological style of Rummy & Cheney from the start. He fretted at the way W.'s so-called foreign policy "dream team" — including his old staffer and fellow Soviet expert Condi — made it up as they went along, even though that had been their complaint about the Clinton foreign policy team. A realpolitik advocate like his mentor, General Scowcroft, he was critical of a linear, moralizing style that disdained nuance, demoted diplomacy and inflated villains. In 2004, he publicly questioned the administration's approach to Iran.

While Vice went off to a corner to lick his wounds, W. was forced to do his best imitation of his dad yesterday, talking about "bipartisan outreach," "people have spoken," blah-blah-blah — after he'd been out on the trail saying that electing Democrats would mean that "the terrorists win and America loses."

"I share a large part of the responsibility" for the "thumpin' " of Republicans, he told reporters. Actually, he gets full responsibility.

W. has stopped talking about democracy as a standard of success in Iraq; yesterday, he said that Iraq had to "govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

He was asked if his surprise at the election results showed he was out of touch with Americans. "I thought when it was all said and done," he replied, "the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security."

So it was just that the American people were too dumb to understand? W. also managed to bash Vietnam vets, saying that this war isn't similar because there's a volunteer army, so "the troops understand the consequences of Iraq in the global war on terror." Is that why W. stayed out of Vietnam? Because he understood it?

An ashen Rummy was also condescending during his uncomfortable tableau with W. and Bob Gates in the Oval Office, implying that he was dumped because Americans just didn't "comprehend" what was going on in Iraq. Actually, Rummy, we get it. You don't get it.

"Baker's no fool," a Bush 41 official said. "He wasn't going to go out there with a plan for Iraq and have Rummy shoot it down. He wanted a receptive audience. Everyone had to be on the same page before the plan is unveiled."

They don't call him the Velvet Hammer for nothing. R.I.P., Rummy.

The Defense Secretary We Had (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Senior military officers referred to it as "the 7,000-mile screwdriver." That was their way of describing Donald Rumsfeld's penchant for micromanaging aspects of the Iraq war that interested him. And it's one reason the military has to be happy that Rumsfeld is leaving -- even happier, maybe, than Democrats, who have claimed an early scalp for their election victory.

To the end, even when Rumsfeld must have known that his time in the job was short, he wouldn't give up that option to meddle with his field commanders. When Marine Gen. James Jones, the retiring NATO commander, went to see Rumsfeld a few weeks ago to talk about becoming commander of Centcom, he asked whether the defense secretary intended to continue his direct line of communication with the theater commander, Gen. George Casey, sometimes bypassing Centcom. When Rumsfeld wouldn't rule out such contacts, Jones began to doubt the Centcom job would work. And when Rumsfeld said he didn't foresee significant changes in Iraq strategy, Jones withdrew his name from consideration.

Changes in Iraq are coming, and Rumsfeld's departure is, to paraphrase the prayer book, one outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual process. Another is the choice as his successor of Robert Gates, a very different sort of figure from Don Rumsfeld in a number of ways.

The Bush administration in recent weeks has -- very much in secret -- begun to ask itself the tough questions: Is the Iraq strategy working? Can we achieve our goals with the tools we have? If not, how do we adjust them so that they fit? One top-level policymaker tried to explain the mood a few days ago by quoting the Rolling Stones: "You can't always get what you want."

Rumsfeld long ago became the symbol for a war he began to doubt at least three years ago when he wrote his famous memo predicting that Iraq would be a "long, hard slog." That illustrated the best of Rumsfeld's intellectual style: He asked whether U.S. tactics were creating new terrorists faster than we were killing the existing ones and mused: "Are the changes we have and are making too modest and incremental? My impression is that we have not yet made truly bold moves, although we have made many sensible, logical moves in the right direction, but are they enough?"

Rumsfeld showed a willingness to question received wisdom, a penchant for challenging the pet projects of the military, such as the Army's plan for a monster artillery piece, inaptly named the Crusader, which would be difficult to move quickly to any modern battlefield. Rumsfeld was convinced that the Army needed to became more mobile, agile and expeditionary. Some of his ideas about transformation were accepted, but deep down, the Army's senior generals were convinced that his policies would break their branch of the service. The biggest smiles at the Pentagon yesterday were probably in the corridors inhabited by Army officers.

Oddly enough, it was the generals who helped keep Rumsfeld in his job. The White House had decided in the spring that it was time to make a change at the Pentagon, and officials were steeling themselves to break the news to Rumsfeld when the "generals' revolt" erupted on newspaper op-ed pages, with former officers lining up to denounce their ex-boss. The White House decided it couldn't appear to bow to pressure and retreated.

Rumsfeld's gift was his brilliance and intellectual toughness. He kept his head up even as the war in Iraq went from bad to awful. In that, he was a harder man even than one of his predecessors, Robert McNamara, who in his final year running the Vietnam War began to crack privately under the pressure. Rumsfeld embodied an old injunction: Never let them see you sweat.

But the downside with Rumsfeld was so great that few people are likely to remember the upside. He came to symbolize not simply the failure of the Iraq war but also the arrogance and lack of accountability. He had a knack for dropping phrases that came to symbolize what was wrong: "You go to war with the Army you have" and "Back off."

Robert Gates will bring to the job the attentive style of a listener. He rose at the CIA in the 1980s by making himself indispensable to his boss, William Casey. He was the brightest Soviet analyst in the shop, so Casey soon appointed him deputy director overseeing his fellow analysts. I once waded through Gates's graduate dissertation for his doctorate in Soviet studies at Georgetown. It was a work of solid, earnest scholarship -- good, but not flashy. Rumsfeld might have described it as a long, hard slog. But it illustrates Gates's best qualities: his intellectual seriousness, his professionalism, his lack of "side," as the British say of good civil servants.

Gates represents the return of Bush 41 people and ideas to the Bush 43 administration. The elder Bush rescued Gates after he was rejected as CIA director in 1987 because of his role in the Iran-contra scandal, bringing him to the National Security Council staff and then appointing him CIA director in 1991. Gates is not a turfy person -- he works well with others -- a quality that Rumsfeld often lacked.

The new secretary will bring something else to the table, and it may be a crucial factor in the months ahead. He came back into the Bush administration's spotlight because of his work as a member of the Iraq Study Group, headed by Bush 41's secretary of state, James A. Baker III, and former representative Lee Hamilton. Gates embodies the group's effort to find a bipartisan policy for Iraq. In that sense, he will go to the Pentagon with an invisible mission statement that can be summed up in two words: "exit strategy." He won't want to leave Iraq quickly or dangerously, but unlike Rumsfeld, he won't fight the problem.

Election Results May Lead To Easing U.S. Alienation Abroad (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, November 9, 2006

LONDON — From Tokyo to Baghdad, Istanbul to Nairobi, Toronto to the British capital, many people said they hoped the Democratic wins in Tuesday's U.S. elections would pressure President Bush to alter course in Iraq and abandon what some called an arrogant foreign policy.

Some typical reactions:

·"I want the Bush government to be crushed. And I want the Democrats to … get rid of the (Iraq) war," said Fumiko Watanabe, 35, who works for an information technology firm in Tokyo.

·"We're going to see some change in the Bush administration's global policies now," said Samuel Odhiambo, 29, a Nairobi banker.

These hopes may have been addressed by Bush's acknowledgment Wednesday that the U.S. electorate wanted change and his announcement that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was stepping down.

"Finally, something is happening," said Peter Paczius, 27, a Hungarian who works as a bartender in London.

However, the American envoy to Iraq said Wednesday that the election results would not necessarily mean a dramatic shift in U.S. policy. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad reminded reporters in Baghdad, "The president is the architect of U.S. foreign policy. He is the commander in chief of our armed forces."

While Rumsfeld's resignation may not change U.S. policy, some American expatriates said the election results might dispel a belief abroad that Bush administration policies are widely endorsed at home. And, they said, it could ease the anti-Americanism on the rise since the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

"This tells the world that Americans aren't happy about President Bush and many of his policies," said Allyson Stewart-Allen, an American in London who advises U.S. and European businesses on how to avoid culture clashes. "This absolutely will ease anti-American views."

DOJ_NMG_0092228

A Pew Research Center survey of global attitudes in June found that the USA's image slipped again in 2005 after a slight uptick in 2004, when the United States helped tsunami victims in Asia.

The survey of attitudes in 15 nations from Europe to Asia found support for the war on terror also had declined, even among close allies such as Japan, which had the highest opinion of America at 63%.

Iraq isn't the only reason for Bush's unpopularity and the low opinions of U.S. policy overseas. Yet for many, especially those who are close to it, the war provided a touchstone for judging U.S. actions.

“The Democrats are better than Bush's people,” said Zeki Nayif, a Sunni Muslim in Baghdad. “We want security and peace.”

In Istanbul, civil engineer Aysen Bora, 27, said, “Bush made our country unsafe, and many Turks died in Iraq. So it's good that the American people have finally said that they've had enough of those policies.”

On the flip side: “George Bush saved our people and created a space for us to live and breathe without Saddam Hussein policing us,” said Can Ozturk, 47, of Istanbul, a Kurdish taxi driver who has relatives in Mosul in northern Iraq.

U.S. foreign policy, even with its closest neighbors, may not affect ordinary people's lives, said Jason Cameron, a Toronto restaurant owner. “Day-to-day, (U.S. politics) don't really affect us as much as we believe it does,” he said.

Other Bush administration policies have contributed to alienation abroad: Keeping the Guantanamo Bay prison camp open, rejecting the Kyoto Protocol to reduce greenhouse gases and support for Israel.

A Marshall Fund survey in September found only 18% of Europeans backed Bush's foreign policy.

However, Bush cannot be held entirely responsible for all anti-American sentiment abroad, said Stewart-Allen in London. She said Americans don't help their cause if they come across as “arrogant, unilateral and insular.”

“Americans think they are the No. 1,” said Watanabe in Tokyo. “Actually, they don't know much about other parts of the world.”

Envoy: U.S. Vote Won't Alter Iraq Policy (AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

AP, November 8, 2006

The American ambassador told Iraqis on Wednesday the sharp political realignment in Congress would not provoke upheaval in U.S. policy, but many in the battered capital had hoped otherwise on a day when at least 66 more people were killed in vicious sectarian attacks.

As the U.S. House of Representatives returned to Democratic control and the Senate hung in the balance, Iraqis noted the election outcome — seen by many as a referendum on the Bush administration's Iraq policy — but seemed unable to find much hope in the results.

"I expect a major change in (U.S.) military commands in Iraq. We have to wait and see the strategy of the new secretary and how we will deal with him. We hope he will be more effective and more serious in achieving security in Iraq," he added.

Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad acknowledged "the effort to help Iraq succeed was a major issue" in the election during brief remarks to a group of Iraqi journalists at an embassy reception.

But he reminded the journalists that U.S. policy in Iraq and elsewhere had not been wrenched from the administration's hands by the major shift on Capitol Hill:

"The president is the architect of U.S. foreign policy. He is the commander in chief of our armed forces. He understands what is at stake in Iraq. He sees success as an imperative for America's national interest. He is committed to working with both Houses of the American Congress to get support needed for the mission in Iraq to succeed."

Later, after President Bush announced the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a Shiite lawmaker said he expected a major change in policy.

Hassan al-Sunnaid, a member of the Security and Defense Committee in parliament, said "the Bush administration including Rumsfeld was able to topple Saddam Hussein's regime but it did not succeed in administering Iraq."

"Defense officials, on top of them Rumsfeld, failed and so did the American ambassador. Changing Rumsfeld should have happened a year ago because their work in Iraq did not achieve any results," said al-Sunnaid, a member of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa party.

A Shiite woman, who identified herself as Um Assad, mother of Assad, probably spoke for most Iraqis when questioned about the election as she shopped near the National Museum. Security was uppermost in nearly everyone's mind.

"We hope that they (the Democrats) will be kind to our people and understand our problems," she said.

Zeki Nayif, a Sunni dressed in traditional Arab garb, spoke bluntly as a group of men at a newspaper kiosk gathered around.

"The Democrats are better than Bush's people. We want security and peace to prevail," he said, then walked off.

DOJ_NMG_0092229

Ala Abid Ali, a Shiite among the group, was of the same mind: "As far as I'm concerned I hope that the Democrats will work for providing security for the Iraqi people, who are suffering greatly."

Iraqi politicians opposed to the continued U.S. presence in the country were delighted with the outcome.

"The vote shows the Iraqi and American people are of one mind about withdrawing U.S. troops," said Falah Hassan Shanshal, who leads the parliamentary bloc of radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

"We hope the Democrats don't forget their campaign promises. If they don't, we will deal with them in a brotherly way once the last American soldier pulls out from Iraq," he said.

Even moderate Kurdish lawmaker Mohamoud Othman saw the shift to Democrats as a result of the Bush administration's "bad policy of spending too many lives in Iraq and too many billions of Americans' tax money."

"Today he (Bush) was taught a lesson," said Othman, whose fellow Kurds are deeply indebted to the U.S. for allowing the ethnic group to establish a virtually autonomous region in the north of Iraq.

In the final days before the election, Bush dispatched two top officials to Iraq in a bid to pressure al-Maliki to quickly disband Shiite militia groups and death squads that have killed thousands of Sunni Muslims.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte was rebuffed by al-Maliki, however, when he demanded the Iraqi leader disband militias and wipe out death squads this year.

A top aide to al-Maliki aide, who refused to allow use of his name because of the sensitive nature of the information, told The Associated Press the prime minister flatly refused and said the task could not be taken up until next year.

Al-Maliki's refusal to act against the militias has caused deepening anger among Sunni politicians who took enormous risks in joining the political process.

Sunni lawmaker Salim Abdullah said the Iraqi Accordance Front bloc had sent messages to other political groups warning that if there is no balance and the militias are not dissolved "we will withdraw from the government."

"We are under political pressure, and if these demands are not met we will abandon politics," Abdullah said. "And this will leave us with only one alternative, which is carrying arms, and then it will be civil war. And we are against the civil war."

Envoy Seeks To Reassure Wary Iraqis (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 8 -- The U.S. ambassador in Baghdad sought to reassure Iraqis on Wednesday that major Democratic gains in Tuesday's elections did not herald an immediate or dramatic change in U.S. policy, saying President Bush "is the architect of U.S. foreign policy" and committed to success here.

In a speech to Iraqi journalists and a few government officials, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad explained that there would be a change in the balance of power in the U.S. Congress but that "Americans understand that Iraq is important" and "have made great sacrifices" for the country and its people.

While continued violence "sometimes causes some, understandably, to wonder whether Iraqis can succeed," he said, "it is clear that Americans want Iraq to succeed" and would continue supporting efforts to bring peace and security to the country. Khalilzad said Bush "is committed to working with both houses of the American Congress to get support needed for the mission in Iraq to succeed."

But many Iraqis expressed concern that a political sea change in Washington could leave them and their country in even worse shape than it is today, while others said they hoped the Democrats would be more forceful in demanding that Iraq's government curb militias and improve security.

"We are concerned that there might be a quick withdrawal from Iraq, which would seriously affect the security situation," said Kashim Mohammed, director of the Fallujah Development Center in the city of Fallujah, a Sunni Arab stronghold 35 miles west of Baghdad. "In reality, the new situation in America is a matter of concern and interest for Iraqis more than it is for Americans themselves."

"I'm optimistic. I think the Democrats will not accept the chaos in Iraq," said Saad Obeidi, 38, a Sunni who owns a fashion shop in the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada.

But some Iraqis said they saw little difference between Democrats and Republicans.

"It will be the same policy and the same ideas. Only the faces will change," said Firas Saleh, 33, a Baghdad shop owner.

"Relations with the Americans will not change with a Democratic victory, because in America, there are strategic interests that will never be abandoned by any party, and those are America's security and interests and international affairs," said Esmail al-Hadidi, a tribal leader in the northern city of Kirkuk. "The Americans will never leave Iraq in the hands of the terrorists and the extremists, but we will see a new agenda on the military front -- there will be more diplomatic and political options."

Others said that any defeat for Bush was a victory for them.

"I was so happy when the Democrats won, because I saw Bush's face when he gave a speech after the failure of his party, and he was so angry," said Ban Muhammad 24, a student in Tikrit, the home town of ousted leader Saddam Hussein. "We hope he and his party always lose."

In violence Wednesday, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a cafe in a Shiite Muslim neighborhood in northern Baghdad, killing 16 people and wounding 18. In addition, 14 people were killed and 70 were wounded in a series of mortar attacks and car bombings in the capital.

Outside Baghdad, 27 people were killed and 32 were injured in car bombings, gun battles, roadside explosions and other violence, local security officials and news services reported.

The U.S. military said troops killed 10 fighters from the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq on Wednesday and freed a kidnapped Iraqi police officer being held by them near Muqdadiyah, about 50 miles northeast of Baghdad. The officer was found after the troops searched the insurgent cell's hideout, a military statement said.

"Once inside the building, Coalition Forces found a hostage blindfolded and shackled to the floor," the statement said. "The hostage revealed he was an Iraqi Policeman that was taken hostage six days before with two other Iraqi Policemen and was being held ransom to raise money for the terrorist cell. He said the two other policemen had been ransomed earlier by the terrorists."

In another operation, four al-Qaeda in Iraq members were killed and 48 were captured when forces raided a known insurgent meeting place on Tuesday near Ramadi, about 60 miles west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

No U.S. or Iraqi soldiers were reported killed or injured in either operation.

Separately, a Marine was killed in Anbar province west of Baghdad on Wednesday and a soldier was killed Tuesday in Kirkuk province, the U.S. military reported, bringing to 21 the number of U.S. service members killed in November.

In Iraq, New Calculations Of The U.S. Role (NYT)

By John F. Burns, Michael Luo

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 8 — Iraq's political leaders scrambled Wednesday to interpret what a sharply altered American political landscape might mean for the future of this war-ravaged country.

Initial reactions to the sweeping Democratic gains and the replacement of Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld appeared to leave Iraqis, like many Americans, unsure of the likely impact on America's policy on the war.

Some Iraqi politicians said they hoped for major changes, while others seemed more concerned about reassuring Iraq's 27 million people that America would not abandon its commitments here and order American troops home.

Mr. Rumsfeld, though, has long been reviled by Iraqis and blamed for everything from the uncontrolled looting after the invasion in 2003 to the collapse of public services and the mounting wave of sectarian violence.

That view was particularly strong among the minority Sunnis, who lost power with the toppling of Saddam Hussein, and who now waver between a subordinate role in the new power structure and an insurgency against American troops and the American-backed politicians who now hold power.

Sadoon al-Zubaidi, who was Mr. Hussein's chief English-speaking interpreter and now acts as an adviser to the Sunni bloc in Parliament, said the setback for Republicans in the elections was a moment for Americans to realize what "a total failure" the invasion of Iraq had been.

"The Americans came to Iraq three and a half years ago to do something good for Iraqis, to free them from dictatorship," he said. "That has failed. The Americans helped, encouraged and planted civil disorder and sectarianism. Now, I would like to see all American troops taken out. I'd like to see all the reins of power placed in Iraqi hands."

But calls for the withdrawal of American troops were rare, with most politicians saying they expected no radical shift as a result of the United States elections. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, in a recorded interview on BBC that was broadcast as the election results were becoming known, sought to play down the shift to the Democrats.

"In the remaining two years of President Bush's term, I don't think there will be any major changes in the American policy," he said. "Nobody is talking about a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops."

Many Iraqis, while disliking what is widely referred to here as the occupation, now say the 150,000 American troops here are a vital bulwark between the deepening chaos and outright civil war. The only major political figure now calling for an immediate American pullout is the powerful Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who led two uprisings against American troops in 2004.

Mr. Maliki has been harshly critical of some aspects of American policy in recent weeks, demanding greater Iraqi control of the war effort and blaming the United States for the worsening of the security situation.

But in the BBC interview he appeared to shift tack, saying that Iraq could rely on President Bush and that even the Democrats were not advocating a withdrawal schedule.

Adnan Pachachi, a prominent secular Sunni politician, said most Iraqis had already identified the most pressing problem here — the rampant violence by sectarian militias — and knew that American forces were essential to any hope of bringing them under control.

"All of us, Iraqis and Americans, have to face facts instead of putting our heads in the sand," he said. "We have to do something about the militias."

The only ones who could do that, he said, were the Americans or other foreign troops, because Iraq's own security forces were heavily infiltrated by the militias.

"If that requires additional troops," Mr. Pachachi said, "then so be it. But if the British or the Americans are unable or unwilling, then we will have to go to the United Nations and see whether we can get help from other countries."

In a hall hung with red, white and blue election bunting, Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, said Iraqis could rest assured that America would stand by its commitments.

Sunni politicians, many of them harsh critics of American troops at earlier stages of the war, have said they consider the American troops as their only reliable protection against the Shiite militias that have struck back at Sunni insurgents' attacks on Shiite civilians by dispatching death squads that have killed thousands of Sunnis.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, a leading figure in the Iraqi Islamic Party, a major Sunni group in Parliament, said he was worried about what the newly empowered Democrats in Washington might do.

"We do not expect anything good from their side and we have our own fears," he said. "As to the Republicans, their stance in Iraq is stable and they have a realistic background. We have gotten used to the Republicans and become familiar with their intentions."

Although serious ruptures have opened between the Shiite-led government and the Bush administration in recent months, several prominent Shiites were at pains on Wednesday to emphasize that no one among the Shiites — aside from Mr. Sadr, presumably — wanted an immediate withdrawal of American troops.

"Nobody is asking for the withdrawal of the multinational forces," said Qasim Dawood, security minister in the interim government that ruled for a year after the end of the formal period of American occupation in 2004.

Among ordinary Iraqis, views on the elections differed widely. One Shiite cleric, Sheik Adel Ibrahim Subihawi, awoke at 4 a.m. on Wednesday to watch the election returns, and offered an explanation for his early rising that spoke for the widespread interest in the returns. "Our future is connected to it," he said.

As the morning wore on and the Democrats picked up more seats, his enthusiasm grew.

"A Democratic victory will change the politics of Bush's Iraq," he said, sitting on a couch, machine guns propped casually in the corner. "He'll set a timetable for withdrawal because that's what the Democrats want. And when they set a withdrawal date, the resistance will stop."

But other Iraqis fretted about what the Democrats might do. "We do care if Congress pressures the president of the United States to pull out troops because we don't have yet highly trained forces," said Muhammad Nerous, a paramedic. "We don't have yet adequate equipment by which we can challenge the terrorists."

Tolerable Or Awful: The Roads Left In Iraq (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

I had to submit this column before knowing the results of yesterday's election, but here is one thing I know already: this needs to be our last election about Iraq.

The Iraq war has turned into a sucking chest wound for our country — infecting its unity at home and its standing abroad. No one can predict what Iraq will look like 10 years from now. I wish it well. But in the near term, it is clear, nothing that we'll feel particularly proud of, nothing that we'll feel justifies the vast expenditure of lives and treasure, is going to come out of Iraq.

Our only two options left today in Iraq are "tolerable" and "awful." "Good" is no longer on the menu. When you read stories from Iraq saying that all we need to do is get rid of all the police there, get one-third of the soldiers in the Iraqi Army to actually report to duty regularly, and replace all the ministers who are corrupt, you know why "good" is not on the menu anymore.

It's time to make a final push for the tolerable, and if that fails, quit Iraq and insulate ourselves and our allies from the awful. This can't go on.

That's sad. Iraq was always a struggle of hope against history. After 9/11, and the Arab Human Development Report detailing the increasingly dysfunctional Arab-Muslim world — which produces way too many terrorists — we had a real interest in collaborating with Iraqis to try to build one decent, progressive, democratizing society in the heart of the Arab East.

DOJ_NMG_0092232

But to succeed we needed to establish a secure order in Iraq and prevent the murderous Sunni/Baathist attacks on Shiites. The Bush team, arriving in Iraq with too few troops and no plans, failed to do either. And therefore the natural tribalism of Iraqis surfaced and the minimal trust between citizens needed to forge a real democracy never emerged. Now we have a tit-for-tat civil war.

The "tolerable" outcome that might be self-sustaining and stable would require reshaping Iraq as a loose federation of predominantly Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni zones. To make even that work, though, would probably require cutting a new deal with Iran and its Iraqi Shiite clients, and Syria and its Sunni Baathist allies, and the Kurds. Iraq would retain a central government in Baghdad, but power and oil income would be more radically decentralized among the different sects. Democracy would be subordinated to stability.

A small U.S. or U.N. force could remain in Iraq to police the boundaries between the three communities and make sure the ongoing violence is contained. To produce even this, though, the U.S. will probably need to set a date and threaten to leave. Otherwise, the parties won't negotiate seriously.

"Awful" would be carrying out that threat to leave Iraq by a fixed date because Iraqis prove too angry and atomized to reach any deal. The fires of madness now raging in Iraq — people beheading each other, blowing up each other's mosques — would all intensify.

A U.S. withdrawal under such conditions would be messy and shameful. But when people are that intent on killing each other there's not much we can do. As bad as we've performed in Iraq, what Iraqis have done to each other, and the little that other Muslims have done to stop them, is an even bigger travesty.

Still, we'd need to give visas to Iraqis who wanted to flee the madness; we'd need to give a security umbrella to the Kurds, so that Syria, Turkey or Iran did not invade them if we left; and we'd need to protect Jordan from the spillover.

But there would be some strategic benefits. Syria would have to support the Sunnis in Iraq, and Iran would have to back the Shiites, so these two "allies" would be on opposite sides of the civil war. Iran would also have to manage the chaos in southern Iraq, particularly the Shiite militias, and this would be a permanent migraine for Tehran. U.S. troops would no longer be in range of Iranian retaliation, and therefore would be much freer to confront Iran's nuclear challenge. The U.S. would also be able to extract itself from the Abu Ghraib/occupation syndrome and could start combating Islamist radicalism by being the best America rather than the worst.

Finally, Iraqi instability would push oil to $80 a barrel. That would mean more people buying hybrid cars and investing in alternative energy, so that we end our dependence on this region sooner.

These are our real choices in Iraq now: tolerable and awful. It's time we choose. No more expending lives and treasure for nothing good. The only way we can pursue good in the world again is by either shrinking our presence in Iraq, if Iraqis will step up, or leaving entirely, if they won't.

Youths Playing Ball Killed In Baghdad (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

BAGHDAD — Explosives rained down on a dusty soccer field in the Shiite Muslim slum of Sadr City on Wednesday, killing eight Iraqi youths and injuring dozens.

Around the country, bombings and shootings left dozens of other Iraqis dead. The U.S. military reported that two of its troops had been killed, raising to at least 2,839 the number of American service members killed in Iraq.

Mortar and rocket battles reminiscent of the urban civil warfare that engulfed Sarajevo, Beirut and Kabul in previous decades have erupted occasionally throughout Baghdad's patchwork of religiously mixed neighborhoods.

The latest fighting in northern and eastern Baghdad began Sunday, with sporadic fire between adjacent districts.

The attack on the soccer field, carried out with rockets or mortar shells, occurred about 4:30 p.m. The explosives carved deep craters into the surface and scattered shrapnel, human flesh and pieces of clothing. The injured and dying were taken to hospitals.

Exchanges of mortar fire between Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods left three other people dead and five injured in the northern district of Kadhimiya and one dead and 20 injured in the neighboring Adhamiya district.

Kadhimiya, a mostly Shiite area west of the Tigris River, is home to a golden-domed shrine that is among the most revered by Shiites. Adhamiya, a heavily Sunni neighborhood on the opposite bank of the Tigris, is the site of a famous Sunni shrine.

A suicide bombing at a cafe the night before in the nearby Shiite neighborhood of Grayat killed 21 people and injured 25, officials said. That bombing followed a mortar attack that killed seven in Adhamiya.

Iraq's Shiite-led government, apparently discounting evidence that the violence was between Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods, blamed the outbreak of shelling on Sunni insurgents firing from the city of Taji, about 20 miles north of the capital.

"Baathists and [religious extremists] are launching mortars from Taji onto Adhamiya and Kadhimiya," a statement said. The Russian-made mortars used by Iraqi insurgents, however, generally have a maximum range of five miles.

Explosions shook the capital throughout much of the day. A car bomb in the mostly Sunni neighborhood of Waziriya killed one person and injured six.

Another car bomb targeting a passing Iraqi police commando patrol in east Baghdad killed one police officer and injured four.

Mortar rounds struck the downtown Shorja wholesale market, killing two people and injuring eight. A mortar round also struck near the Health Ministry, killing three and injuring six.

At least 29 bodies were found around Baghdad. Many of the victims had been bound, beaten and shot in apparent sectarian reprisal killings.

Outside the capital, violence raged on.

A car bomb in a crowded market near Muqdadiya killed four people and injured six. The area is in the volatile, religiously mixed agricultural province of Diyala, northeast of Baghdad.

A roadside bomb exploded near a girls high school in Fallouja, 35 miles west of Baghdad, killing two students and injuring 12.

The most seriously wounded were rushed to the capital because the Fallouja hospital lacks resources, said Kamal Issawi, director of the facility.

"We are calling on international organizations and the government to solve our problems," he said.

An explosion in a residential neighborhood of Hillah, about 60 miles south of the capital, left at least four people dead.

A city councilman in Hillah said Sunni insurgents had driven 75 Shiite families out of the nearby district of Iskandariya over the last two days.

He alleged that the insurgents kidnapped eight young Shiite men and killed an old man who confronted them.

They also destroyed two small Shiite shrines.

"They consider Iskandariya part of their Islamic state," said Mohammed Masoudi, head of the Hillah City Council.

The Americans were killed in separate incidents. A Marine assigned to serve with the Army's 1st Armored Division died Wednesday of wounds sustained "due to enemy action" in Al Anbar province, the military said.

A soldier with the 25th Infantry Division was killed Tuesday in combat near the northern city of Kirkuk. Three soldiers were also wounded during the operation, the military said.

Meanwhile, the trial of Saddam Hussein on genocide charges resumed with witness testimony and a defense allegation that the prosecution had broken into its offices and stolen files.

In a heavily guarded courtroom, Hussein's accusers recounted the alleged crimes of the former regime in the infamous Anfal campaign, in which Iraqi security forces waged war on rebellious Kurdish villagers.

Badie Aref, an attorney for one defendant, accused the court of stealing documents crucial to its case.

"There were 23 files of documents that have disappeared," he said. "I think that they were taken by the Americans, and I think that they might have given them to somebody from the prosecution."

The judge dismissed the accusation.

The case was adjourned until Nov. 27.

Iraqi Predicts The Hanging Of Hussein By Year's End (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 8 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki predicted in a televised interview on Wednesday that former President Saddam Hussein would be hanged by the end of the year.

Court officials said, however, that the prime minister's prediction was unrealistic, considering the timing of the appeals process and the sheer volume of evidence the appellate judges would have to review. It was far more likely, they said, that the hanging would not take place until January at the earliest, and probably later.

The authorities reported the killing on Wednesday of more than 30 people in various attacks around Iraq. And the American military command described a major attack on an American military base in northeastern Baghdad on Sunday that lasted for an hour and a half and left at least 38 insurgents dead.

Under Iraqi law, a nine-judge appellate court will begin its review of the death sentences against Mr. Hussein and two of his co-defendants 30 days from Sunday, when the sentences were handed down. If the appellate judges uphold the rulings, the executions must be carried out within 30 days.

The appellate judges are not bound by a deadline for their deliberation, but Mr. Maliki and other Shiite leaders have made no secret of their desire to see Mr. Hussein executed as soon as possible. They say that Mr. Hussein's survival could help to rally the Sunni Arab-led insurgency that has been trying to drive American forces out of the country and topple the Shiite-dominated government. He periodically issues written messages from his cell at an American military detention center here exhorting insurgents to continue their resistance.

Mr. Hussein was found guilty of crimes against humanity for the persecution of the townspeople of Dujail, north of Baghdad, after what was said to be an assassination attempt against him there in 1982. A total of 148 men and youths were killed, and hundreds of others banished for years to a remote desert camp in southern Iraq.

American and Iraqi officials had originally planned to prosecute Mr. Hussein in a series of trials that, they said, would describe his long rule of terror. He is the principal defendant in a second trial involving the so-called Anfal military campaign in the late 1980s in which, prosecutors contend, as many as 180,000 Kurdish civilians were killed.

But with the conflict worsening, senior Iraqi officials, including Mr. Maliki, now say they would rather eliminate Mr. Hussein as a source of inspiration for the Sunni insurgents than use the trials to prove his personal responsibility for atrocities during his 24-year rule. According to Iraqi court officials, nothing in Iraqi law would prevent Mr. Hussein being executed before the Anfal trial ends.

In an interview televised by the BBC on Wednesday, Mr. Maliki said, "I think the court is determined to pursue this case that they are looking at, but we will not interfere."

When asked to specify when he expected Mr. Hussein to be executed, Mr. Maliki said, "I expect it to happen before the end of the year."

The Constitution mandates that President Jalal Talabani and his two vice presidents must approve the execution. But Mr. Maliki raised the possibility during the interview that because the decision was rendered by a special tribunal, it might not be subject to that constitutional provision. Mr. Hussein was tried before the Iraqi High Tribunal, the court set up to prosecute the top officials of the ousted government.

President Talabani, a Kurd, has said publicly that he is opposed to the death penalty, suggesting that he would not approve the execution. But according to court officials, the president has said he is prepared to designate Adel Abdul-Mahdi, one of his vice presidents and a Shiite, as his proxy in the vote.

Court officials said they also did not anticipate opposition from Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni Arab. Mr. Hashemi, they contend, accepted his post on the assurance that he would not oppose the court's findings.

The insurgent blitz against the American military base on Sunday began when attackers opened fire from the north and south with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, the military said Wednesday in a statement.

The garrison, called Forward Operating Base Apache, is in Adhamiya, a heavily Sunni Arab neighborhood.

Iraqi Kurds Accused Of Spying For Iran (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub, Jamal Halaby

AP, November 8, 2006

A co-defendant in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial accused Iraqi Kurds on Wednesday of spying for the Iranians at the time of the government crackdown on the Kurdish population.

Former military intelligence chief Sabir al-Douri made the accusation after listening to Kurdish witnesses testify about chemical attacks against their villages in northern Dahuk province in August 1988.

Saddam, al-Douri and five other former members of Saddam's regime have pleaded innocent to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their role in the military offensive against the Kurds, known as Operation Anfal. The prosecution says about 180,000 people, mostly civilians, were killed in the 1987-88 crackdown. Saddam and one other defendant are also charged with genocide.

Al-Douri told the court the Iranians, who fought an eight-year war with Iraq starting in 1980, had asked Kurdish guerrillas to provide intelligence about a prison camp near Mosul and about the homes of two senior Iraqi commanders in the north.

"The (Kurdish) rebels and the Iranians were working together there," he said.

The presiding judge did not respond to the remark.

The trial adjourned until Nov. 27 to give time for the defense to assemble its list of witnesses. But court spokesman Raed Juhi said the prosecution still had more witnesses to call.

If convicted, Saddam and his co-defendants could be sentenced to death.

DOJ_NMG_0092235

Saddam is already under a death sentence imposed by another court Sunday for the deaths of more than 140 Shiite Muslims after an assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail in 1982.

His trial for the Kurdish crackdown will continue while an appeals court reviews the Dujail case.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was quoted as telling the British Broadcasting Corp. that if an appeals panel upholds the Dujail sentence, Saddam could be executed before the end of the year.

With the likelihood of his execution increasing, Saddam rose in the dock Tuesday and called on all Iraqis to "forgive, reconcile and shake hands."

On Wednesday, witness Ayoub Abdellah Mohammed said his village was attacked with chemical weapons on Aug. 24, 1988 — four days after a cease-fire in the war with Iran.

"After this, we had difficulty breathing and I told the villagers that the village was hit by chemical weapons," he said. "I could see birds falling and liquids coming out of people's noses."

Another witness, Tawfeeq Abdul-Aziz Mustafa, said he and other villagers fled to Turkey after a chemical attack on their community and remained there until a Kurdish self-ruled area was established in northern Iraq in 1991.

"We looked at the villages and there was yellow smoke coming out," he said. "Our eyes became red, itchy and teary. We knew it was a chemical attack."

Mustafa said his uncle died in Turkey from the effects of the attack, and he lost about 40 percent of his vision because of exposure to the chemical weapons.

The session opened with a demand from defense lawyer Badee Izzat Aref for the court to order an investigation into the alleged ransacking of the defense team's office in the U.S.-controlled Green Zone last month.

Aref said intruders damaged and stole dozens of documents, undermining the defense's effort in the trial. Chief judge Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa ordered the prosecution to give a new set of documents to the defense.

"I demand the opening of an investigation on the American side because the area of the offices is guarded by the Americans, who would shoot anybody who comes near," Aref said.

It was the first time that Aref appeared in the court since Sept. 21, when the defense team announced a boycott of the trial to protest the court's rejection of many of their motions.

Suicide Bomber Kills 42 Pakistani Soldiers (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall, Salman Masood

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Nov. 8 — A suicide bomber detonated explosives on a military training ground in northwestern Pakistan on Wednesday morning, killing at least 42 army recruits and wounding about 20 more in the deadliest terrorist attack against the Pakistani military on record, government officials said.

Suspicion immediately fell on Pakistani militants who had vowed vengeance for an airstrike on a madrasa, or religious school, that killed 83 people near the Afghan border in the Bajaur district on Oct. 30.

The Pakistani military claimed responsibility for that attack, which it said was against militants in terrorist training. But residents and opposition politicians contend that the strike was conducted by an American drone aircraft, though the Pakistani government denies it.

The sudden escalation of casualties in Pakistan's fight against militants is likely to further polarize public opinion, which is already broadly opposed to President Pervez Musharraf's cooperation with the United States and his military campaign against tribes in border regions. It may also raise questions in the military about the campaign, in which about 600 soldiers have been killed in the past two years.

Interior Minister Aftab Ahmed Khan Sherpao said a suicide bomber wrapped in a shawl ran onto the military training ground, in Dargai, a town in North-West Frontier Province, and detonated his bomb amid about 130 recruits around 8:40 a.m. The military reported that 42 soldiers had been killed, but that number may rise, because some of the wounded were in critical condition.

"It was a guy with a short beard, wearing a shawl," Khalid Mehmood, 18, a student who was walking on a road nearby and was wounded by shrapnel, told a local journalist.

Gulam Younas, a shopkeeper across the parade ground, said he was working when he heard a big explosion. "Amidst the rising dust, I saw bodies lying on the ground, wounded soldiers, limbs, shoes," he said. "It was horrible."

The military was pursuing a man suspected of being an accomplice Wednesday night who was chased to sugar cane fields several miles away. The man, described as in his mid-20s with a short beard, had been was spotted close to the scene of the blast by townspeople who said he was behaving suspiciously, military and security officials said. When someone fired on him, the officials said, he pulled out a hand grenade and threatened to hurl it at them, then disappeared into fields in a nearby village.

About 400 Pakistan Army soldiers and paramilitary Frontier Constabulary set up a cordon around the thick cane fields, which cover a little more than a square mile. Army tracking dogs, helicopters, searchlights and flares were brought in to help.

An unidentified caller told a local journalist on Wednesday that "Pakistani Taliban" were behind the suicide bombing and were retaliating for the airstrike in Bajaur on Oct. 30. The strike has been followed by daily demonstrations and protests against the government and the perceived American involvement in the strike. At least one militant leader from the Bajaur area, Maulana Faqir Muhammad, threatened to carry out revenge attacks.

Government officials in Islamabad, the capital, said Wednesday that the suicide bombing was linked to Bajaur, but emphasized that rather than a revenge attack, it was a proof of terrorist training in the region.

"We can trace back the linkage with Bajaur," said Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan, the chief military spokesman, [a news service] reported. "We have been receiving intelligence reports about militants being trained for such activities," he said.

"It is linked with the Bajaur incident. It is not a consequence," said Mr. Sherpao, the interior minister. "It is linked in the sense that suicide bombers were trained in the area."

Foreign fighters and operatives for Al Qaeda are known to be at large in the mountainous tribal regions adjoining Afghanistan. Local fighters and the militants are accused of training bombers and orchestrating attacks in Afghanistan and Pakistan from their hide-outs.

A senior Pakistani intelligence official said Monday at a briefing that the madrasa in Bajaur had been receiving money from Al Qaeda to train militants and send them to Afghanistan to fight American and Afghan forces. Abu Faraj al-Libbi, an important Qaeda operative who was arrested in May 2005, disclosed under interrogation that he and other Qaeda members had visited the madrasa, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The anonymous telephone caller on Wednesday, who called the journalist Rahimullah Yusufzai of The News, a national newspaper, said that the suicide bombing had been carried out by a group led by Abu Kalim Muhammad Ansari, an otherwise unknown figure. The caller contended that the group had 274 more volunteers ready to be suicide bombers, Mr. Yusufzai said.

Yet while Pashtun tribesmen in border areas have sympathized with the Afghan Taliban and Al Qaeda, suicide bombing is new to them. Many Pashtuns say such attacks are alien to their tribal code, Pashtunwali, which forbids the killing of innocent people, and to their understanding of Islam, which forbids suicide.

General Musharraf has vowed to continue to fight such militants and to crush terrorism in almost daily comments since the Bajaur strike. Yet the suicide bombing is likely to increase the pressure on him to end military action in the tribal areas.

"There are very few now who think the military is an instrument that will work," said Talat Masood, a military analyst and retired general.

Suicide Bombing Kills 41 Troops At Pakistani Army Base (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Kamran Khan

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Nov. 8 -- A suicide bomber detonated explosives on a field filled with army recruits doing exercises in northwest Pakistan on Wednesday morning, killing at least 41 soldiers and wounding dozens in one of the worst such attacks in Pakistan's recent history.

Officials immediately blamed the bombing on al-Qaeda and local Islamic extremists. They said it appeared to be an act of reprisal for a government missile attack Oct. 30 that killed 82 people at an Islamic school in the nearby Bajaur tribal region. Officials suspected that the school was being used as a training camp for guerrillas.

"It seems that this was linked to the action by our forces against militants in Bajaur last week. Al-Qaeda and its followers in this region are getting desperate because of our actions," Interior Minister Aftab Khan Sherpao said from Islamabad, the capital. "I am afraid this is a beginning of a new phase of terrorism in Pakistan. The terrorists are now pitched directly against our security forces."

Military officials said the bomber, wrapped in a cloak, wandered onto the unguarded training field and detonated explosives before anyone noticed him. They said a second intended suicide bomber escaped on a motorbike from the military training camp, located in Dargai village near the semiautonomous tribal areas that border eastern Afghanistan.

Several hours later, a man called the office of Geo television in Peshawar, the provincial capital of North-West Frontier Province. He identified himself as the second suicide bomber and claimed that the attack had been carried out by local insurgents from the Islamic Taliban movement, which operates on both sides of the border.

"Our martyr has clearly stated that this attack is our response to the Pakistan army attack in Bajaur," the caller said in Afghan Pashto, according to journalists at Geo. "This attack marks the end of our commitment not to target the Pakistan army. We have enrolled 275 people as suicide bombers, and now they will take revenge."

Dargai is a stronghold of a banned Islamic militant group, the Movement for the Enforcement of Islamic Law, which ran the religious school that was bombed by the military in Bajaur. The group has been fighting government troops in the tribal areas for months and was banned in 2002 after trying to impose Taliban-style rule in the tribal areas.

After Wednesday's attack, security was heightened at all military facilities in Pakistan and soldiers in the northwest region were told not to visit public places in uniform, a senior army official said. On Tuesday, the North-West Frontier provincial governor was forced to cut short a visit to the South Waziristan tribal area when two rockets were fired near a meeting he was attending with local elders.

The tribal areas are plagued by violence and Islamic extremism, and U.S. and Afghan officials believe both Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters have taken refuge there. Recently the Pakistani government made two peace agreements in South and North Waziristan, hoping to end the conflict that has pitted Islamic insurgents against Pakistani troops on one side of the border and NATO and Afghan forces on the other. A third agreement was due to be signed in Bajaur last week.

But the Oct. 30 missile attack, which Pakistani officials said was based on U.S. intelligence and carried out by Pakistani forces, appears to have sabotaged that effort. News of the attack has convulsed the tribal region, with daily demonstrations taking place and local politicians resigning from parliament in protest.

According to Pakistani and U.S. officials, the Islamic school in Bajaur had been under suspicion for some time as a training place for insurgents, and there were reports of senior al-Qaeda figures visiting there.

Pakistani officials have strongly defended the attack and continued to assert responsibility for it despite widespread public protest. On Tuesday, the army's powerful corps commanders met with Pakistan's military president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and resolved to continue the campaign to free Pakistan from armed Islamic militancy, according to a military press statement.

But many Pakistanis in the volatile tribal region are convinced that the missile attack killed only innocent young religious students, that it was carried out by U.S. Predator drones and that U.S. officials pressured Pakistan into supporting it. U.S. officials have said the United States did not carry out the attack.

If it did, however, analysts said, that would mean Musharraf's government, already tarred as a U.S. puppet by many Pakistanis, chose the lesser evil of claiming it had carried out an attack that was bound to create enormous domestic anger, unleash the kind of violent reaction that occurred Wednesday and undermine a reconciliation policy it had worked hard to promote.

Sayed Sahibzada Haroon Rashid, a resident of Bajaur and member of the National Assembly from Pakistan's largest legal Islamic party, said in an interview Wednesday in Peshawar that he personally knew the names, relatives and tribes of most of the victims and that all were teenage students. He said a government list of purported national ID cards showing many to be in their 20s was a fabrication.

"This was not a training camp, it was a school where boys study the Koran. They didn't even find a knife," said Rashid, who reached the blast site within minutes and helped collect pieces of bodies. "We all recognized the American drone planes because they fly over every day. There was no al-Qaeda there; it was just an excuse to destroy our peace process. This will unite the whole country against the Musharraf dictatorship and America."

Taliban Fighters Talk Tactics - While Safe In Pakistan (CSM)

By Suzanna Koster

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

The 22-year-old doesn't look like the traditional turbaned Taliban commander. His black hair shoots out at all angles from beneath a red cap. He smiles easily and has a neatly trimmed beard.

But Hilal says he is the co-leader of 200 Taliban fighters who operate across the border in Afghanistan. "Two years ago, we only attacked Afghan officials, but now we have so many Talibs that we can attack Americans," he boasts.

In a rare interview with a Western reporter, Hilal and three other Afghan Taliban fighters describe how they slip into Afghanistan, attack NATO and Afghan forces, and return to Pakistan to rest.

"Everybody in the neighborhood knows we are Talibs," says Noman, a 19-year-old fighter with a blue-white block-printed turban. "Paki-stan is a little bit free for us."

The interview was conducted over two days in a small house made of yellow mud in Pakistan's Balochistan Province. The fighters, who won't give their real names, say they are here for a refresher course in Taliban ideology in a Pakistani religious school.

"We are enormously organized," brags Mustafa, a 20-year-old wearing a black turban usually favored by conservative Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0092238

A year ago, such confident talk from Taliban fighters could have been chalked up to bravado. But with more than 50 suicide attacks in the past six months, resistance by large Taliban units in the increasingly volatile provinces of Kandahar and Helmand in the south, and a greater willingness of Taliban fighters to come out into the open and speak their minds are all indications that the Taliban resurgence is no longer a matter of conjecture.

This year has been a difficult one for the US, coalition, and Afghan forces. With US commanders handing control of the south over to its British, Canadian, Dutch, and other allies in NATO, the Taliban are making the transfer a bloody one. How NATO forces fare in the south could determine whether the democratically elected government of President Hamid Karzai - and indeed, the experiment in Afghan democracy itself - succeeds or fails.

Commander Hilal says that currently 40 of his troops are in Afghanistan fighting, and 160 are "refreshing their ideology" in Pakistan. Hilal says that he discusses military plans by cellphone and satellite phone with higher Taliban commanders who are all in Afghanistan.

Hilal says his fighters operate in groups of 20 to 25 men in the Afghan provinces Ghazni and Zabul. There are 35 groups active in Zabul's capital, Qalat, and 20 to 25 in the rest of by American forces controlled province.

Mustafa, in the black turban, says that the Talibs cross the border alone or in twos. Depending on the crossing point, he says - listing Pakistan border cities of Chaman, Badini, and Torkham - it takes one or two nights to join up with other Taliban fighters, he says. "The majority have Pakistani identity cards, so crossing the border is no problem," he says.

The Taliban fighters return to a different house in Pakistan every month, but say that they must be very careful in Afghanistan, says Noman, a gaunt-faced young man who says he wants to learn English. But Mustafa adds that they are no longer in hiding in Afghanistan. "We are now 200 to 300 at a time and can roam around freely," he says.

Prior to every mission, they get training in one of the many training camps in the Afghan mountains, says the 22-year-old Ali, who is quiet through most of the interview.

Afghanistan and NATO officials regularly accuse Pakistan of harboring Taliban leaders. Pakistan officials say they are doing everything they can to remove them.

On Wednesday, a suicide bomber killed 35 Pakistani soldiers in a brazen attack at a military base in Pakistan's North West Frontier Province, leaving the Army shaken and a Taliban peace deal in tatters.

"Never has there been so many military casualties in one attack," says Ramiullah Yusufzai, a Peshawar-based journalist who has covered the Pakistan military's campaign against militants since 2001.

Hours after the attack, an organization calling itself the Pakistan Taliban, which had never come forward before, phoned Mr. Yusufzai to claim responsibility. The caller told Yusufzai that the bomber prepared a suicide video before carrying out the strike, suggesting a parallel in tactics used by Taliban militants in Afghanistan.

The four fighters say they all studied at an Afghan madrassah (religious school) before the American forces entered Afghanistan in 2001. Hilal fled to Pakistan when his fellow students at the madrassah were arrested after the Taliban regime was toppled. In 2003, he says, he joined the jihad.

In their Afghan camps, "we get training, even suicide education. There are many groups saying how we suicide bomb, lay mines, or use Kalashnikovs," he says. Suicide attacks are not for him, he says. "It takes a lot of training. You have to think about target time, because maybe you blow up yourself but nobody else."

All of their ammunition is inside Afghanistan and is used against non-Muslims, says Mustafa. "There is a lot of ammunition in Afghanistan to use against the non-Muslims. We hid it in depots after the fall of the Taliban."

The Afghan forces are the targets are considered "non-Muslims" because they work with the Americans. "All the checkpoints are covered by Afghan troops, so we go for them first," he says.

A month ago, Hilal says his forces attacked a military convoy in Zabul's provincial capital, Qalat. He says they killed 35 Afghan troops. Two Taliban fighters were injured.

The Taliban fighters also pride themselves on blocking the main highway between Kandahar and Kabul.

Mustafa says he's in favor of the international reconstruction work in Afghanistan. But Noman interrupts, raising a finger. "We are not in favor of reconstruction work, because it happens in the name of Christianity. This is why we close the schools. The government completely changed the books. A was for Allah, now it stands for Aass [mule in Pashto], J was for Jihad, now it stands for Jawary [maiz in Pashto]. With pamphlets, letters, and by taking the teachers "into confidence," Noman says they try to close down the schools - if necessary, by force.

More than 160 Afghan schools have been attacked this year, according to The Associated Press.

The fighters say ordinary Afghans give them vehicles, fuel, food, medicine, and information. "There are many business men who help us. We were given 10 vehicles in Kandahar and 15 in Helmand. Sometimes they give us security. They say, 'He is not a Talib, he is my family member.' That is jihad," says Noman.

DOJ_NMG_0092239

The interview has been watched by a silent little observer: an 11-year-old boy on a wooden seat. His parents have sent him to Noman for religious training. He brings food to the Taliban fighters in the house. When he is grown, he says shyly, he wants to be a fighter. "Now I am still a kid, but when I have a beard I can join."

Poll: Afghans Express Confidence In Country's Direction, Security (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, November 9, 2006

Most of the 6,200 surveyed say they are satisfied with democracy, but corruption is a major problem

Despite a raging pro-Taliban insurgency, the people of Afghanistan say they are optimistic about the future, satisfied with their young democracy and rank security low on their list of everyday concerns, according to a survey out today.

In what it is billing as the widest opinion poll conducted in Afghanistan, the non-profit, San Francisco-based Asia Foundation surveyed 6,226 Afghans 18 and older in person in 32 of the country's 34 provinces over the summer.

Polling couldn't be conducted safely or reliably in two areas: southern Afghanistan's strife-torn Zabul and Uruzgan provinces, which together account for 2.3% of the country's population. The survey's margin of error was +/-2.5%.

The poll, financed by the U.S. Agency for International Development, suggests that Afghans are surprisingly confident about the direction of their country even as NATO forces battle a pro-Taliban insurgency in southern and eastern provinces and the violence begins to threaten other places that previously had been considered safe.

While violence has increased, Afghanistan has made some progress in the nearly five years since U.S.-led forces overthrew the fundamentalist Islamic Taliban regime.

Afghans finally got a chance to vote — in presidential elections in 2004 and parliamentary elections in 2005. Roads have been paved and schools reopened after three decades of anarchy.

Outside the south, major Afghan cities such as Mazar-e-Sharif in the north, Herat in the west and the capital, Kabul, have been largely free of political violence.

Frederick Starr, chairman of the Central Asia-Caucasus Institute at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies in Washington, said he was not surprised by the survey. “These findings … in no way contradict the larger conclusion that this is a country still desperately poor and desperately in need of help,” Starr said. “What they affirm is that help produces results, which in turn generates appreciation.”

The poll found that:

·Afghans were more than twice as likely (44% to 21%) to think their country was headed in the right direction, rather than the wrong direction; 29% had mixed feelings. Still, the optimists were down from 64% in a smaller Asia Foundation survey conducted in 2004.

By contrast, Iraqis have a bleaker outlook. A Sept. 1-4 World Public Opinion Poll of more than 1,000 Iraqis showed that 47% thought their country was going in the right direction, while 52% thought it was going the wrong way.

·77% said they were satisfied with the way democracy is working in Afghanistan.

·Only 6% ranked security as the biggest problem in their area, behind unemployment (18%), electricity shortages (12%), poverty (10%), a weak economy (10%) and scarce water supplies (9%). Sixty percent said they rarely or never worried about their own safety. However, 22% said security was the biggest problem facing the nation.

·54% said they were more prosperous than they were under the Taliban, which governed Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001; 26% felt less prosperous.

·42% said corruption was a major problem in their daily lives, and 77% called it a major national problem; 51% of those who dealt with public health care officials reported paying bribes for health service.

·Afghans had contradictory attitudes toward political tolerance: 85% said the government should allow peaceful opposition, but 64% said they would not allow political parties they personally opposed to meet in their areas.

·Nearly one-tenth of men and one-eighth of women felt that women should occupy most political positions in a country where women traditionally have been barred from schools and jobs.

·87% said they trusted the Afghan national army, and 86% said they trusted the Afghan national police. The police, in particular, have been widely criticized for being corrupt, brutal and beholden to local warlords. A report released this month by the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based non-profit group devoted to conflict prevention, called the Afghan police “little more than private militias … regarded in nearly every district more as a source of insecurity than protection.”

“I have never met one person, including the minister of the Interior, who trusted the Afghan national police,” Barnett Rubin, who studies Afghanistan at New York University's Center on International Cooperation, said in an e-mail. “I think this is not a very reliable survey.”

Starr counters: “For a country that didn't have a national army and had only local militias, the fact that one exists — no matter its absolute level — is a breakthrough.”

George Varughese, who directed the poll for the Asia Foundation, which supports programs in Asia that help improve governance and law and encourage economic development, agrees that some of the results “appear to challenge the current wisdom on issues in Afghanistan,” but says, “We feel it is a solid, important piece of work, completed during a difficult time.”

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-U.S. Foodservice Executive Convicted (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

A New York jury convicted former U.S. Foodservice Inc. marketing chief Mark P. Kaiser yesterday of conspiracy, securities fraud and false filing charges, all but bringing to a close a three-year, $800 million accounting fraud probe at the Columbia food distribution company.

Kaiser, 49, remains free on bond until his sentencing Feb. 8. He is the only former official at U.S. Foodservice, a unit of the Dutch grocery retailer Royal Ahold NV, who presented his case to a jury.

A few weeks before the trial began last month, former finance chief Michael J. Resnick pleaded guilty to conspiracy for his role in the scheme, which boosted earnings by inflating the amount of promotional rebates U.S. Foodservice received from suppliers.

Kaiser's deputy, Timothy J. Lee, also pleaded guilty and testified against his former boss in the course of the case, which spanned about four weeks. In closing arguments, Kaiser's lawyer, Richard J. Morvillo of the District, labored to paint Lee as a liar trying to curry favor with the government and win a lighter prison sentence.

"Nothing has changed in terms of our view of Mr. Kaiser's innocence, and we plan to pursue what we believe is a meritorious appeal," Morvillo said in an e-mail yesterday.

Through a spokeswoman, Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia declined to comment.

The conviction came two days after Ahold said it would put U.S. Foodservice up for sale, even as it retains control of local supermarket chain Giant Food.

Earlier this year, Ahold reached a nonprosecution agreement with the Justice Department over the accounting problems at the Columbia unit. Ahold's stock plummeted more than 60 percent when the problems were disclosed in early 2003. Ahold, which did not pay fines to the government because of its extensive cooperation with investigators, later paid $1.1 billion to resolve shareholder claims.

In all, more than a dozen executives at U.S. Foodservice and its supplier companies have pleaded guilty and settled related civil charges with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Conviction In U.S. Foodservice Trial (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

NEW YORK -- The former marketing chief of Ahold NV's U.S. Foodservice Inc. unit was convicted of participating in a scheme to create millions of dollars in fake supplier rebates in order to artificially increase the unit's operating results by hundreds of millions of dollars.

After about a day of deliberations, a jury in U.S. District Court in Manhattan found Mark Kaiser guilty of conspiracy, securities fraud and four counts of making false filings. Mr. Kaiser faces a maximum of 20 years in prison on the most serious charge of securities fraud. Sentencing is set for Feb. 8.

"We'll do our talking in the Court of Appeals," said Richard J. Morvillo, Mr. Kaiser's lawyer, when asked for a comment on the verdicts.

The government alleged Mr. Kaiser and others misrepresented to U.S. Foodservice's auditors and the public how much the company was receiving in supplier rebates, known as promotional allowances, by hundreds of millions of dollars in order to meet income targets.

More than a dozen U.S. Foodservice vendors and three former executives, including former U.S. Foodservice Chief Financial Officer Michael Resnick, have pleaded guilty to criminal charges in the matter.

On Monday, the Amsterdam-based retailer said it will put the U.S. Foodservice unit and its Tops supermarkets in New York and Pennsylvania up for sale.

UnitedHealth Executives Forfeit $390 Million In Options (WSJ)

By STEVE STECKLOW And VANESSA FUHRMANS

Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

The two top executives of UnitedHealth Group Inc. agreed to forfeit about $390 million in stock-option compensation, by far the biggest sum returned to a company under scrutiny for backdating options awards.

The giveback was announced at the same time the giant health insurer disavowed more than a decade's worth of earnings statements.

Last month, an internal inquiry found that the two executives -- outgoing Chief Executive William W. McGuire and his successor, Stephen J. Hemsley -- received options that carried dates prior to the dates on which they were actually granted, making them more valuable than they otherwise would have been.

Other senior UnitedHealth executives will also return unspecified options gains. Paul Hodgson, senior research associate at Corporate Library, a corporate-governance research group in Portland, Maine, said the $390 million giveback by Dr. McGuire and Mr. Hemsley may be the largest voluntary forfeiture by corporate executives ever. "This is certainly the biggest that I'm aware of," he said.

UnitedHealth is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, in which companies manipulated the dates that options were awarded to provide additional compensation to executives. More than 130 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, and many of those are also being probed by the Justice Department.

UnitedHealth also disclosed that it would have to take "significantly greater" charges related to its backdated stock options than it had previously estimated and that it expects the charges to affect the past 12 years of previously reported earnings. The Minnetonka, Minn.-based health-insurance giant didn't specify what the new charges would be. It had previously said it might have to restate up to $286 million in earnings, stemming from three years' worth of earnings.

UnitedHealth also said its chief financial officer, Patrick Erlandson, resigned his post and will be succeeded by G. Mike Mikan, the company's senior vice president of finance. Mr. Erlandson will be reassigned to other "operational duties," the company said. A UnitedHealth spokesman declined to say whether Mr. Erlandson's move was related to the stock-options issue.

More than 40 executives have lost their jobs to date in the options imbroglio, including Dr. McGuire, who agreed last month to step down as UnitedHealth's chairman. He will leave his post as chief executive by Dec. 1, after 15 years at the company. UnitedHealth's internal probe concluded that Mr. Hemsley, the company's chief operating officer, received backdated grants, but it made no finding that he had a role in their creation.

UnitedHealth's options troubles followed a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal in March that showed that Dr. McGuire had received stock options grants at favorable times, including awards received in 1997, 1999 and 2000 whose dates coincided with those years' lowest closing share price. The article reported that the odds of such a favorable pattern occurring by chance were at least one in 200 million. At the time, UnitedHealth called its options-granting process "appropriate."

Options are intended to give recipients the opportunity to profit if the company's share price rises in the future. Usually, the recipient can buy shares in the future at the price of the stock on the day the option was awarded. Backdating involves pretending that the grant was awarded on an earlier day, when the share price was lower, giving the recipient the potential for greater profit. If not disclosed to shareholders, the practice can result in serious accounting and tax consequences.

UnitedHealth, in fact, faces a slew of noncash charges related to stock-based compensation, as well as cash charges resulting from tax liabilities. It said yesterday it would have to further delay filing its third quarter Form 10-Q to the SEC.

Both Mr. Hemsley and Dr. McGuire agreed last month to allow the exercise prices of previously granted options to be reset to the highest share price during the grant year after a board-commissioned review concluded that several option grants had likely been backdated.

The company said Mr. Hemsley and other unnamed senior executives had agreed not only to give up paper gains on unrealized stock options with questionable grant dates, but also to forfeit some money already made on previously exercised options. For Mr. Hemsley, the actions -- including forfeiting a complex tranche of grants that were suspended and then reactivated in August 2000 -- will reduce his past stock compensation by $190 million in both unrealized gains and money he would return. "My decision is in keeping with my personal goal of avoiding even the appearance of any unintended benefit from any past option grants to me," he said in a statement. Before joining UnitedHealth in 1997, Mr. Hemsley was chief financial officer at the accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP.

Dr. McGuire has also agreed not to benefit from any grants with problematic dates that he has already exercised, although it isn't yet clear how this will be done, according to a person familiar with the situation. His attorney, David Brodsky, said, "Dr.

McGuire is pleased to have reached an agreement to reprice his options. The agreement to forgo approximately $200 million means that Dr. McGuire will receive no benefit at all from dating issues in connection with his options."

But Dr. McGuire hasn't yet agreed to forfeit the reactivated options in which he and other employees were effectively able to get the same options twice, at favorable prices. For Dr. McGuire alone, those extra options are now valued at about $250 million. The issue of those options hasn't been resolved between Dr. McGuire and the company, according to people familiar with the situation.

At the end of 2005, Dr. McGuire had a cache of unexercised options valued at $1.78 billion. Mr. Hemsley's options at the time were valued at more than $650 million.

UnitedHealth spokesman Mark Lindsay wouldn't provide any details on the formula the company is using to determine how much executives have to return to the company from previously exercised grants. He added that the company was still working out the details on how the money would be paid back.

However the payback is handled, executive compensation experts said the move to undo past compensation is likely to complicate the tax liabilities that UnitedHealth faces from backdated grants. "The IRS doesn't like that sort of thing," said James Reda, managing director of a New York-based pay consulting firm James F. Reda & Associates.

The company's board also set new rules for its independent directors, prohibiting business relationships that involve payments from company executives or any direct compensation from the company, other than for board service, within the prior three years. That is tougher than New York Stock Exchange requirements, which limit other direct compensation for independent directors to less than $100,000. The more stringent rules come amid the resignation last month of William Spears, a UnitedHealth board member for 15 years, after the company's probe revealed undisclosed financial entanglements with Dr. McGuire.

UnitedHealth also said it reached a new, four-year employment agreement with Mr. Hemsley that is remarkably spartan compared with his and Dr. McGuire's previous contracts. Under its terms, Mr. Hemsley will receive a base salary of $1.3 million, $1 million less than Dr. McGuire earned as CEO. Far from the power Dr. McGuire enjoyed to negotiate and, in some years, set the date for his own option awards, Mr. Hemsley's contract doesn't set any minimum or target level for bonuses or other incentive-linked compensation. Rather, any additional bonuses are "solely at the discretion" of the board's compensation committee, the company reported in a filing with the SEC. "It's unusual for someone to relinquish that much control over how his bonus gets set," Mr. Reda said.

Shares in UnitedHealth fell $1.57 to $48 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

UnitedHealth Options Probe Cost Higher Than Expected (Update7) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, November 9, 2006

Nov. 8 (Bloomberg) -- UnitedHealth Group Inc., the largest U.S. health insurer, said its restatement of earnings to correct accounting for stock-based compensation ``will be significantly greater'' than the $286 million it estimated in May.

The insurer also said today it will reduce the value of stock options awarded to two top executives and delay filing third-quarter earnings to U.S. regulators. UnitedHealth is among at least 167 companies that have disclosed probes into backdated options in a broadening U.S. scandal, including 71 which changed previously reported financial results.

Departing Chief Executive Officer William McGuire will lose about $200 million because of the restatements, said his lawyer, David Brodsky. Stephen Hemsley, who replaces McGuire on Dec. 1, will give up about $190 million, Minnetonka, Minnesota-based UnitedHealth said. Last month, both agreed to let their option dates be reset to the highest share price in the grant year.

The repricing ``probably removes one more overhang on the stock, but you can't draw any more conclusions at this point about what McGuire has or hasn't done wrong,'' said Les Funtleyder, an analyst at Miller Tabak in New York, in a telephone interview.

UnitedHealth said its financial statements from 1994 through September this year ``should no longer be relied upon'' because they may not reflect costs of stock-based compensation.

Oct. 15 Agreement

McGuire agreed Oct. 15 to be replaced by Hemsley, the current president and chief operating officer, after an independent inquiry found evidence that company options were backdated during the past 12 years.

Investigators are trying to determine whether companies inflated the value of options awarded to senior executives by backdating or timing the grants to coincide with days when the stock price was low.

The shares fell $1.57, or 3.2 percent, to $48 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

DOJ_NMG_0092243

Brodsky, with Latham & Watkins in Washington, said today in a statement that his client's agreement to reprice options ``means McGuire will receive no benefit at all from dating issues in connection with the options."

``All of the remaining value of his options are the result of the outstanding performance of the company, which saw 8,400% growth under his leadership," Brodsky said.

Chief Financial Officer

Patrick Erlandson resigned as chief financial officer of UnitedHealth and will be succeeded by G. Mike Mikan, the company said. Forrest Burke was named acting general counsel, replacing David Lubben, who resigned Oct. 15.

The company also said it strengthened its requirements for defining the independence of its directors and restricted charitable contributions to organizations run by independent directors. UnitedHealth also prohibited business relationships between the independent board members and executives employed by the company.

An internal inquiry by Washington law firm Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP examined 29 option grants from 1994 through 2006 and found that the measurement dates for most were incorrect and many ``were likely backdated," according to a summary of the report, released Oct. 15.

`Central To'

McGuire was ``central to" a process that set many option dates ``at or near" the lowest price in a quarter or year, raising his potential profit over 12 years, the law firm said.

In the WilmerHale report, McGuire stated that grant dates on the CEO's options ``typically coincided with" a memo, phone call, meeting or discussion with at least one member of the board's compensation committee.

The report's authors responded that there were ``relatively few instances in which there are either direct or circumstantial evidence to establish that a grant date was selected on that particular day."

McGuire is under investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the U.S. Department of Justice and the Minnesota Attorney General. The company also faces shareholder lawsuits.

UnitedHealth on Oct. 19 said third-quarter net income rose 38 percent after acquisitions raised the number of policyholders. Earnings climbed to $1.1 billion, or 79 cents a share, beating analysts' estimates by 3 cents, and the company increased its forecast for next year.

Revenue rose 55 percent to $18 billion after the acquisition of PacifiCare Health Systems Inc., with 3.3 million members in medical plans, helped push the number of people covered by UnitedHealth policies to more than 70 million, up 24 percent in a year.

UnitedHealth's Options Just Got Messier (BSWK)

The health insurer says costs for backdated stock options will balloon beyond its prior estimates. The new CEO has his work cut out for him

UnitedHealth Group (UNH) faces a whopper of a bill from backdated stock options. It's also hoping to renew favor with investors by repricing options for several executives and bringing new leaders into its executive suite.

Less than a month after ousting its CEO over the options scandal, the suburban Minneapolis health insurer told investors Nov. 8 that it expects to take "significantly greater" charges than the $286 million it had previously predicted. The company also said its financial statements for the past dozen years are suspect and shouldn't be relied on, pending restatements. The reviews also will cause the company to delay filing its third-quarter report with the Securities & Exchange Commission.

The news came as UnitedHealth announced that its new chief executive, Stephen Hemsley, has agreed to have his options from 1997 and 2002 reset to the highest share price in the year in which they were granted. He also agreed to give up gains from options that were suspended in 1999 and reinstituted in August, 2000. The decision cuts the value of his options by $190 million. "My decision is in keeping with my personal goal of avoiding even the appearance of any unintended benefit from any past option grants to me," Hemsley said in a press release. Under Hemsley's new four-year employment agreement with UnitedHealth, he's guaranteed only a base salary. Widespread Restatements

Hemsley replaces company founder and current CEO, Dr. William McGuire, who will have the exercise prices reset for all of his options with recorded grant dates between 1994 and 2002. McGuire resigned as board chairman on Oct. 15 after an external review found that many of his stock options were most likely backdated (see BusinessWeek.com, 10/16/06, "Hard Times for UnitedHealth").

McGuire is scheduled to leave the company on Dec. 1. The terms of his severance are still being negotiated. At the end of last year, McGuire's options were worth $1.78 billion. He has agreed to have them repriced to their highest point in the grant year. That will shave about $200 million from the value of McGuire's options, his attorney, David Brodsky, told The Associated Press on Wednesday.

The options backdating scandal has snared more than 120 companies to date, many of which will need to restate results to account for the compensation expense and pay taxes for options that were mishandled. The practice of backdating, which is allowed under accounting rules as long as it's disclosed, allows the recipient of a stock option to snag an immediate paper gain, since the strike price is set below the current share price. First Priority

UnitedHealth also ousted its chief financial officer, Patrick Erlandson, who has been in that position since 2001. Erlandson will remain with the company, and be succeeded by G. Mike Mikan, a senior vice-president of finance. In addition, UnitedHealth designated Forrest Burke as acting general counsel, from his former role as general counsel for UnitedHealthcare, Uniprise, and specialized-care services.

The company says senior executives and its former general counsel, David Lubben, have agreed to reset the dates on all options from 1994 to 2002 to the day they were actually granted. They also have agreed to a formula to account for income on options they have already exercised. "The effect of these changes is to remove any potential whatsoever for these individuals to have financially benefited from any option misdating," the company said.

Cleaning up the options mess is Job No. 1 for Hemsley, who joined the company in 1997. In a conference call with analysts last month, he apologized for the fiasco and promised new managers with "stature, expertise, and integrity. We will be unrelenting in achieving the highest standards for governance and integrity" (see BusinessWeek.com, 10/18/06, "The Ties UnitedHealth Failed to Disclose"). Changing the Culture

Still, some analysts want to see results—and the debacle's costs—before saying the company has found its way. "Their corporate governance has been abysmal, and they've made a few changes over the last couple months," said Brandon Troegle, an analyst at research firm Morningstar in Chicago. "I think they're all very positive changes, but they're reactionary. There's always more they could do."

The latest options news, coupled with uncertainty over what newly empowered Democrats in Washington might plan for the privatized health industry, sent UnitedHealth shares down 3.2% on Nov. 8, to $48, on the New York Stock Exchange. The stock is down by more than a third from its 52-week high of $64.61 in December.

"They have to prove there's a cultural change in the organization," says Sheryl Skolnick, a senior vice-president at investment bank CRT Capital Group. She's watching to see what sort of retirement package McGuire will get. The whole mess, Skolnick predicts, will be largely closed by the spring. Investors will be hoping that estimate proves accurate.

UnitedHealth Expects Greater Charges Due To Options (LABIZ)

Los Angeles Business, November 9, 2006

UnitedHealth Group Inc. announced Wednesday a series of actions to address the problems of backdating stock options at the company.

The company said in a statement that it cannot yet determine the amount of "cash charges resulting from potential tax liabilities," but that it will be "significantly greater" than the $286 million initially anticipated.

The board of the Golden Valley, Minn.-based health insurer said that due to the adjustments necessary to correct the backdating of stock options, its quarterly reports from 1994 to September 2006 "should no longer be relied upon."

The company also is withholding the filing of its 10-Q report for the third quarter of 2006.

Here are some of the additional actions taken by UnitedHealth:

New President and CEO Stephen Hemsley signed a four-year employment agreement, and voluntarily agreed to reprice any stock options questioned by the independent WilmerHale report of the company's internal finances. This will reduce the value of Hemsley's past compensation by $190 million.

Outgoing CEO William McGuire also agreed to reset his options dates from 1994 to 2002 to the highest stock price during those years, but the company did not indicate the reduced dollar value of that recalculation.

The board named Mike Mekan as executive vice president and chief financial officer (CFO) to replace CFO Patrick Erlandson, who resigned.

The board strengthened requirements for ensuring the independence of its directors, going further than the standards of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the New York Stock Exchange.

After this announcement, shares of UnitedHealth's (NYSE: UNH) stock dropped $1.96, or 3.95 percent, to $47.61 in mid-day trading on the New York Stock Exchange. It closed at $48, down $1.57 from Tuesday's $49.57 closing price.

UnitedHealth is the parent company of Cypress' PacifiCare Health Systems.

Fannie Mae Spending Over $1B On Review (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, AP Business Writer

AP, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Fannie Mae said Wednesday it expects to spend more than $1 billion this year on the massive review of its accounting and preparing financial statements as the mortgage giant pushes to complete it by year's end.

The government-sponsored company, which finances one of every five home loans in the United States, is emerging from an accounting scandal that brought the ouster of top executives and a record $400 million civil fine in a settlement with federal regulators. Fannie Mae also said it would miss a regulatory deadline Wednesday for filing its financial report for the third quarter of 2006. The company hasn't filed an earnings statement since late 2004.

Federal regulators that year accused Fannie Mae of serious accounting problems and earnings manipulation to meet Wall Street targets, and the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered the company to restate earnings back to 2001.

Washington-based Fannie Mae is the second-largest U.S. financial institution after Citigroup Inc.

The anticipated restatement has been estimated at $10.8 billion, though Fannie Mae says it expects the final amount could be lower. The company said in August it believes that the accounting review has uncovered the last of the errors.

In its third-quarter filing Wednesday, Fannie Mae said it expects to spend about $850 million this year on the complex reworking of its accounting and related expenses - including legal fees for its defense against suits filed by shareholders - and more than $200 million on preparing financial statements for periods after 2004 to bring its reporting current.

The process "has required, and continues to require, a substantial amount of time and resources because the restatement entails significant complexities," the company said in its filing with the SEC.

Last May, the federal agency that regulates Fannie Mae and its smaller government-sponsored sibling, Freddie Mac, issued a blistering report alleging a six-year accounting fraud at Fannie Mae. Regulators said the scheme included manipulations to reach quarterly earnings targets so that company executives could pocket hundreds of millions in bonuses from 1998 to 2004.

The Justice Department had pursued a criminal investigation, but federal prosecutors said in August they had shut down their probe. The SEC still could bring civil actions against individual executives, including people no longer at Fannie Mae, with the burden of proof less stringent than in criminal prosecutions.

In May, the company disclosed new accounting problems that had been uncovered in its business of issuing securities backed by the billions of dollars of home mortgages annually that it buys from lenders and bundles together for resale to investors worldwide.

Similarly, Fannie Mae in March disclosed new accounting problems that had been uncovered in several areas, including loans, investment securities, houses acquired through foreclosures, interest on delinquent home loans, and reverse mortgages.

They all are in addition to the accounting-rule violations that came to light in September 2004 involving derivatives, the financial instruments that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac use to hedge against swings in interest rates, and its mortgage commitments.

The two were created by Congress to pump money into the $8 trillion home-mortgage market to keep interest rates low and make home ownership affordable for low- and moderate-income people. Freddie Mac has been emerging from its own accounting scandal, which surfaced in mid-2003.

Fannie Mae shares rose $1.74, or 2.9 percent, to $41.64 in midday trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

S.E.C. Is Seeking To Help Small Companies On Audits (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

Regulators are seeking a way to lighten the burden of the Sarbanes-Oxley law on smaller companies by addressing the focus and cost of audits of internal controls, Christopher Cox, the chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said yesterday.

Mr. Cox said in an interview that the goal was to focus the attention of auditors on only those controls that could be important to assuring the accuracy of financial records, a measure required by Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, and to hold down the cost of the audits.

“There will be an audit for everybody, which is a major decision we took,” he said, adding that the nature of the audit could change. “It is supposed to be risk-based, so that the auditor’s time is focused on the areas of greatest risk.”

He said that was particularly important for smaller companies, some of which have complained that costs are excessive. The burden of such audits has also been blamed for a reluctance of foreign companies to list their securities on American markets.

Mr. Cox said his goal was to smooth the way for the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board to propose a new auditing standard in the area, and for the S.E.C. to approve it, by this spring. To do that, he said, he has held extensive consultations with Mark Olsen, the chairman of the oversight board.

The commission appears to be seeking a middle road in a contentious fight that pits advocates of strong controls on corporate misbehavior — who fear any weakening of the law that was passed in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals — against corporate executives who see an opportunity to roll back what they see as overregulation and, at the same time, perhaps adopt other business-friendly policies. A committee appointed by the previous chairman of the commission, William H. Donaldson, urged the S.E.C. to eliminate audits for many smaller companies.

Some members of Congress have said they will push for legislation next year, and commissions appointed by business interests are planning to produce proposals for legislation soon. But other legislators have urged regulators to find ways to cut costs without having to reopen the law.

Mr. Cox said that many were taken by surprise by the cost, noting that Section 404, which requires company managements to assess the state of internal financial controls, was based on existing legislation affecting financial institutions.

"That did not cause the sky to fall," he said of the earlier rule, "and there was no advance warning that the sky would fall" when Section 404 was adopted.

But, he said, the accounting oversight board decided to go further than bank regulators had gone. He said he expected the revised audit standard to be easier to comply with, but added: "I am very concerned that no matter what we do in this audit standard, we will not have much impact on audit fees. But it is our intention to do so, in a way that gives investors far more bang for the buck."

Mr. Cox said the commission would propose new rules to provide guidance to companies on how to evaluate internal controls.

And, he said, it is likely to accept the size categories proposed by the small-business advisory committee, even while requiring audits of all companies. For two years, companies with market capitalizations under $75 million would be required to evaluate their own internal controls but not to have the results audited.

Audits would begin in the third year, and continue every year thereafter. But, he said, they would most likely focus on the "suitability of the design of internal controls," noting that in many cases the auditor would in any case have to go beyond those controls to conduct the financial audit.

Somewhat larger companies, with capitalizations of up to $700 million, would also get less expensive audits, he said, although he conceded that details were still up in the air. The S.E.C. hopes to encourage auditors to use the work of others, and work they did in previous years, to reduce current costs, and not to focus on control issues that are unlikely to create problems even if the controls are weak.

The goal, he said, was to "relieve investors of unnecessary costs" while providing "higher-quality risk-based audits that will focus on what is truly material to a company's financial statements."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jefferson, Carter Go On The Attack As New Orleans Runoff Campaign Starts (AP)

By Cain Burdeau

AP, November 9, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, handicapped by an FBI bribery investigation, embarked Wednesday on a monthlong and grueling contest against a young but politically experienced challenger seeking to end his 16-year turn as this city's face in Congress.

State Rep. Karen Carter played up the old-versus-new dynamic at a Wednesday news conference, keying on the hurricane-battered city's recovery.

"We are tomorrow's leaders," she said. "We will stop waiting for someone to save us, because we're going to save ourselves. We're going to stand up for what is still good about New Orleans and embrace new visions and change.

"The torch of leadership is passing — pay attention — it's passing. Change is coming."

"I've heard that before," Jefferson said later at his own news conference. "It took place in a speech in 1960 by President Kennedy. So, it's a time of youth phrase. Right now, it's simply a bunch of catch words."

The eight-term congressman faces his toughest political test yet as he attempts to energize a base of supporters cast afar by Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0092247

Jefferson, 59, won about 30 percent of the vote in the multiparty primary Tuesday, outpacing 12 challengers lured into the race because of his vulnerability stemming from the FBI bribery investigation into his African business dealings.

Carter, 37, got about 22 percent of the vote, finishing second to earn a spot in the Dec. 9 runoff. But analysts said Jefferson's showing was poor for an incumbent.

"We can assume that the voters who voted for other candidates will not vote for Jefferson" in the runoff, said Susan Howell, a political analyst at the University of New Orleans.

"At this point, frankly, it's Karen Carter's to lose," said Larry Powell, a politics professor at Tulane University. "She has a lot of corn-fed earnestness about her and she will be attractive."

Both candidates are black. Carter drew from a more diverse crowd of voters, analysts said. Jefferson received nearly 72 percent of his roughly 27,700 votes in predominantly black precincts, according to an analysis by Edward Chervenak, a politics professor at the University of New Orleans.

Carter found her votes in both predominantly white and black precincts and she had a strong showing in more racially mixed neighborhoods, Chervenak said.

Jefferson said he will seek to shore up the black vote by canvassing in the heavily populated West Bank, which was not struck by Katrina's flood waters, and traveling to Atlanta, Houston and other places where people were displaced.

Carter said she will strive to keep her "gumbo" of political allies — whites, blacks, Republican backers — intact while attempting to draw in people who voted for the 11 other candidates in the primary.

Jefferson's legal troubles — including allegations in an FBI affidavit that he hid bribe money in a freezer — came to light shortly before Katrina hit on Aug. 29, 2005. Though he has not been charged with a crime, the allegations led to his loss of a spot on the House Ways and Means Committee.

The scandal has hurt the city's recovery efforts, Carter charged at her morning news conference.

A few hours later a tired-looking Jefferson, flanked by his wife, a minister and trade union representatives, touted his record in Congress and declared his re-election bid alive and well.

"Seventy-nine percent of the people haven't voted for her," he said. "By miles I'm better able to do the job."

Carter, Jefferson Gear Up For Runoff (NOTP)

By Frank Donze, And Michelle Krupa%%par%%staff Writers

New Orleans Times-Picayune, November 9, 2006

They must scramble to plug vote gaps

Conventional political wisdom says that a congressman who lands in a runoff, particularly after 16 years in office, should seriously consider cleaning out his desk.

For U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, the adage may be even more apropos, given that Hurricane Katrina scattered much of his traditional voter base last year just as FBI agents were ramping up their federal bribery probe into his business dealings in Africa.

But maybe not.

A day after running ahead of 12 challengers with 30 percent of the vote in Tuesday's 2nd Congressional District primary, the New Orleans Democrat wasn't talking like someone preparing to pack up.

In fact, his voice hoarse from weeks of nonstop campaigning, Jefferson said he is looking forward to the Dec. 9 runoff with state Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans, who finished second with 22 percent.

Asked to comment on Carter's election-night observation that 70 percent of the electorate rejected him Tuesday, the eight-term incumbent noted that nearly eight in 10 voters in the district "haven't voted for her either."

As for Carter's call for a passing of the torch "to a new generation of leadership," Jefferson said, "It's a time-used phrase. "But right now it's simply just a bunch of catchwords. I don't know that one ought to pass off an effective, active leader for someone who has some philosophical notion that there ought to be a passing of the torch."

But political observers say the situation he finds himself in is less than ideal.

"He got 30 percent. For an incumbent, that's terrible," said Ed Renwick, director of Loyola University's Institute of Politics.

But Renwick noted that Carter has work to do if she is to replace Jefferson as the representative of a district that spans Orleans and Jefferson parishes.

Votes up for grabs

A precinct analysis of the election results by University of New Orleans political scientist Ed Chervenak, who broke down the vote by race, reveals the challenges that lie ahead for both candidates.

Jefferson, the numbers show, will have to expand his African-American base, much of which remains displaced more than a year after the storm. In addition, he must pick up support from voters who chose one of two West Bank Democrats -- state Sen. Derrick Shepherd of Marrero or former New Orleans City Councilman Troy Carter.

Perhaps the most daunting task facing Jefferson is how to increase his share of the white vote, which largely abandoned him on Tuesday, the analysis shows.

Carter, who fared well among white voters, is likely to pick up the lion's share of support that went to lawyer Joe Lavigne, a white New Orleans Republican who finished fourth on the strength of numbers that rivaled Carter's in majority white precincts.

"Republicans are going to vote for Karen Carter. There's no doubt," UNO political scientist Susan Howell said. "And they're going to turn out to vote. If you're going to vote the anti-corruption ticket, she's the reform candidate."

Meanwhile, Carter also must improve her numbers among black voters and, to a larger degree, across Jefferson Parish, where she failed to win a single precinct. As expected, Shepherd led the way in his home parish with 34 percent.

Though Jefferson Parish residents across most of the West Bank and a sliver of south Kenner comprised only about a third of the 91,000 voters who cast ballots Tuesday, their influence will be crucial in the runoff, political observers said.

The other candidates

Almost 70 percent of suburban ballots went to candidates other than Jefferson and Karen Carter.

The bulk -- more than 10,000 of 31,381 votes -- were won by Shepherd, who enjoyed widespread backing from the Jefferson Parish political establishment, which seized on his candidacy as its best chance to exploit New Orleans' reduced population and send a Jeffersonian to represent the 2nd District.

Also in the mix was Algiers resident Troy Carter, who failed to win a significant number of precincts but nevertheless surpassed Karen Carter in his Jefferson Parish take. Lavigne, meanwhile, earned nearly as many suburban votes as Troy Carter and Karen Carter combined.

All those votes are now up for grabs, and they could provide a substantial boost to Karen Carter to tip the scales in her favor, Chervenak said.

"One of the wild cards is Shepherd," he said. "He does very well in the white precincts in Jefferson Parish, and he does well in the heavily black precincts as well. The key is whether Karen Carter can tap into the Derrick Shepherd/Troy Carter vote, especially in heavily white precincts."

Shepherd did not return calls Wednesday, and it is unclear whether he intends to endorse a candidate in the runoff.

But at an unusual joint session of the Jefferson Parish Council and the New Orleans City Council aimed at fostering regional unity, several top suburban politicians who backed Shepherd in the primary suggested Wednesday that they may stay out of the runoff. Their neutrality could well be viewed as a tacit endorsement of the sitting congressman.

A Jefferson victory, of course, would give the incumbent two more years in Congress, during which he could be indicted in the federal bribery case. Such a scenario has the potential to lead to a special election to fill the seat.

In one gambit being discussed among Jefferson Parish power brokers, Shepherd then would get the chance to run again, giving Jefferson Parish another shot at installing a native son to represent them in the 2nd District.

Treatment of evacuees

Parish President Aaron Broussard said the "chess pieces" are still in play regarding an across-the-board runoff endorsement by the Jefferson Parish guard.

He said Karen Carter's comments to Spike Lee in the filmmaker's Katrina documentary could be a liability with suburban voters. Carter labeled as unjust, inhumane and un-American the decision by Jefferson Parish law enforcement leaders to block New Orleans evacuees from walking across the Crescent City Connection in an effort to flee the devastated city.

"My observation is there is a friction factor between a number of segments and their experience in dealing with Karen Carter," he said, adding that the conflict went beyond the bridge debate to incidents in the Legislature. He would not be specific.

Meanwhile, Sheriff Harry Lee, who endorsed Troy Carter in the primary, railed against Karen Carter on Wednesday. Lee said he would not support Jefferson in light of his reduced effectiveness since news of the federal probe broke.

But the sheriff said he may work to defeat Carter because of her criticism of his deputies, who he says blocked the bridge to protect property and because there were no supplies or shelter for the evacuees on the West Bank. Evacuees countered that they had no intention of looting, and were simply seeking safety, but were stopped at gunpoint by Jefferson Parish law enforcement officers.

"It's personal between her and me," Lee said. "I'm thinking of getting some people together who she so severely affronted by running her foul mouth. I may spend some money and get the clip of Spike Lee's film and show what she said about those of us on this side of the river."

Carter said she is prepared for a rough-and-tumble runoff, especially in light of the grueling primary in which she said Jefferson and others "tried to distort and slander my record," forcing her to spend money to defend herself on TV and radio.

"I'm armored," she said, "and I'm ready."

Who's backing whom

DOJ_NMG_0092249

Carter stuck to her campaign mantra that she would re-establish credibility in the 2nd District. She said her message is bolstered by the political watershed of Tuesday's elections that put Democrats in control of the U.S. House of Representatives. The presumptive Speaker of the House, U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., took to the national airwaves Wednesday promising to clean up Congress' sullied image.

"I expect this to be a discussion about ethics . . . and the statement that Ms. Pelosi made this morning that will be the most open and transparent Congress in the history of this country," Carter said.

Howell said Jefferson is likely to paint Carter as too aligned with white interests by continuing to highlight her connections with the city's two leading Republican power brokers, developer Joe Canizaro and shipbuilder Donald "Boysie" Bollinger, who have pumped money into her campaign.

At the same time, Howell expects Jefferson to try to persuade voters that he alone has the interests of African-American voters at heart, a strategy New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin used effectively in his May re-election bid.

In the mayor's race, however, Nagin was able to play on fears circulating through the diaspora that the city's white elite were actively working to prevent the return of black residents; such anxiety largely has abated. Nagin also was facing a white opponent, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu.

"But when the faces are both African-American, it's much harder to pull that off," Howell said, adding that Carter could defend herself against such claims by pointing to her political pedigree: Her father, Ken Carter, was one of New Orleans' first black property assessors, and she is a long-standing standard-bearer of BOLD, the black political organization based in Central City.

The controversy swirling around Jefferson also makes his predicament starkly different than the one Nagin faced.

"Nagin didn't have quite the anchor on his back that Jefferson does," pollster Bernie Pinsonat said.

Letten: New Orleans' Future Depends On Tackling Crime, Corruption (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

The city's survival depends on getting a handle on violent crime and corruption and creating opportunities for young people, a federal prosecutor said Wednesday. "And that's a heck of a tall order, but that's something we need to do," Jim Letten said.

Letten, U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana, spoke during a think-tank's briefing series. He was joined by state Supreme Court Justice Catherine Kimball in addressing the rebuilding of New Orleans' criminal justice system after Hurricane Katrina.

The system faces considerable challenges. For example, there's a backlog of court cases; the chief of trials for the Orleans public defender's office has asked for additional resources, saying constitutional rights of defendants are being violated; and a depleted police force has been dealing with violent crime.

Last month, a district court judge ordered that four inmates be released and their trials postponed until the defender's office can adequately represent them.

Kimball told the Bureau of Governmental Research breakfast there were problems with the system long before the August 2005 storm, particularly in how the city and state funded it. Court fines and fees have helped fund programs, but Katrina, which sharply reduced the city's population, exposed problems with relying on that, she said.

Over the last 14 years, the Supreme Court has funded "considerable programs," including juvenile justice programs, for New Orleans, because the city hasn't taken the initiative, she said. "How that goes about changing, I don't know."

Mayor Ray Nagin, in his 2007 budget proposal, listed public safety and bolstering the police department as priorities. A budget must be approved by Dec. 1.

Kimball and Letten, attending the breakfast meeting with members of the City Council and the police chief, said funding alone won't fix the problems the city faces. Katrina just laid bare problems that have existed in the community for years, Letten said. There are now concentrations of "disenfranchised" residents, and people with guns, in areas like New Orleans' Central City and Jefferson Parish, "rampantly killing each other," Letten said. Police are doing the best they can, he said.

"It's not going to be tomorrow that we solve this; it's not going to be next week or next year," said Letten, who serves on a task force on rebuilding the system with Kimball and others. But unless nonpolitical decisions are made - and money is put where it's needed - "we're not even going to get the ball rolling."

"The survival of this town depends on getting a handle on violent crime, corruption, so we can keep and attract industry - diversifying our economy and, for God's sake, building a decent school system so that kids who grow up in public housing, poor neighborhoods and Section 8 housing can get the opportunities they need to actually get jobs and not go into the drug trade," Letten said.

FBI Searches Office Of Knox Judge-executive (LEXHL)

SOUTH-CENTRAL KENTUCKY BUREAU

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), November 9, 2006

FBI agents searched the offices of Knox County Judge-Executive Raymond C. Smith on Wednesday.

Bruce Murphy, Smith's deputy judge-executive, said four agents accompanied by a Kentucky State Police trooper served a search warrant at the office Wednesday morning.

The warrant sought audiotapes and other records concerning fiscal court meetings in 2004 and 2005 and documents related to four companies: Grade All Construction, Partin Construction, BKW Wood Products and Kentucky Phoenix, according to a copy Murphy released to the Herald-Leader.

Those four companies won contracts to provide goods or services to the county, Murphy said.

Smith had an ownership interest with his brother in at least one of the companies, BKW Wood Products. The company won a bid during Smith's term to provide equipment services to the county, Murphy said.

But Murphy said that when Smith took office, he essentially turned the company over to his brother. The warrant could indicate the FBI is investigating bids awarded by the county.

A spokesperson for the agency was not immediately available.

Murphy said there was nothing improper about the contracts related to the four companies. The companies won county business through a competitive, sealed bid process, the deputy judge-executive said.

Murphy said agents searched through records for two to three hours. Smith was not in at the time; they did not ask to see him and did not question anyone before leaving with a variety of records, Murphy said.

A state audit released this year raised questions about $2.7 million in county spending. Smith has said there is no money missing from the county and that it finished the fiscal year in June with a healthy surplus.

Smith, a Democrat, was beaten by a substantial margin in Tuesday's election by Republican J.M. Hall.

Bath Co. Judge Exec Indicted In Vote-Buying Scheme (WTVQ)

By Bennett Haeberle

WTVQ-TV, November 9, 2006

OWINGSVILLE, KY -- Bath County Judge Executive Walter B. Shrout has been indicted on charges he took part in a vote-buying scheme during this year's primary election.

In a federal indictment unsealed Wednesday, Shrout, 54, was charged with conspiracy, making a false statement to a federal agent and obstruction of justice.

Shrout now becomes the 10th person indicted in relation to the vote-buying scheme that started weeks before the May primary.

In the days leading up to the election, prosecutors allege Shrout gave several thousand dollars to five people so they could then use cash to pay would-be voters to vote for Shrout.

Among those given money were: Norman Lewis Crouch, William Mike Butcher, Anthony "Buck" White, Steven R. Crouch and Belinda Crouch. All five were indicted in July, and have since been arraigned on federal charges.

This latest indictment, dated Nov. 3, also states Shrout lied to an FBI investigator last month about being involved in the scheme and offering $100,000 to Steven R. Crouch and Butcher to "keep quiet about his involvement."

Shrout, an incumbent who won Tuesday's midterm election unopposed, defeated Mike Swartz in the May primary. Swartz was also among those indicted on vote fraud charges in July.

In a May interview with Action News 36, Walter Shrout defended some of those indicted, calling them "good people." He also denied having any involvement in the scheme. Calls to his office Wednesday went unreturned, and Shrout failed to show up for FEMA meeting with local administrators. He is scheduled to be arraigned later this month in U.S. District Court in Lexington.

Feds After Clout Sick List (CHIST)

By Fran Spielman And Tim Novak, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092251

A federal grand jury is demanding records from City Hall regarding injury claims of city workers, a move that comes two weeks after the Sun-Times reported Chicago patronage workers claim to be hurt at a rate that exceeds the nation's most dangerous jobs.

Grand jurors have issued a subpoena to the City Council Finance Committee, headed by Ald. Edward M. Burke, seeking an array of records on injured city workers, many who have been off work for years and collecting disability checks.

The subpoenas, according to City Hall sources, demanded that the city turn over:

· A list of all city workers receiving workers' compensation payments as of Sept. 1.

· A list of all city workers who have been declared to be "permanently and totally disabled" -- a designation that entitles them to disability payments as long as they live, as well as other benefits, including a city pension.

· A copy of a Sept. 11, 2002, memo written by Burke's then-top administrator, Stephen Murray, who, the Sun-Times has reported, suggested several measures to ferret out fraudulent injury claims and cut the city's costs.

· Copies of all workplace-accident reports filed since Jan. 1, 2005.

· Copies of any audits and reviews of City Hall's workers' compensation program.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office declined to comment. A spokesman for Burke said the Finance Committee "will cooperate fully with any requests for documents and/or information."

The Sun-Times' "Clout's Sick List" investigation -- published Oct. 19, 20 and 22 -- reported that one in five patronage workers listed on the once-secret clout list kept by Mayor Daley's former patronage director had filed workers' compensation claims. That injury rate far outpaces those for any occupation tracked by the U.S. Department of Labor, including underground coal miners and foundry workers. Most of those patronage workers had filed at least two claims. Some had filed more than a dozen.

Able-bodied stay at homeThe city has spent more than $38.9 million to resolve 1,719 injury claims filed by those workers; another 708 claims are still pending.

Many of the records sought by the federal subpoenas also were sought by the Sun-Times under the Illinois Freedom of Information Act. But Burke's staff refused to release any records that identified injured city workers.

Under a city ordinance that dates to 1913, the Finance Committee has sole authority to settle injury claims filed by city of Chicago employees. Those claims typically are settled for less than $100,000, though the city never discloses those settlements.

The Sun-Times also reported that the city estimated 91 workers -- including relatives of public officials -- have been deemed able to return to work in less physically demanding jobs but remain off, collecting disability checks worth as much as $40,000 a year, because the Daley administration hasn't found them suitable jobs.

Malvo Apologizes At Md. Sentencing (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Sniper Lee Boyd Malvo offered a tearful apology yesterday to relatives of the six people he and his accomplice killed in Montgomery County, minutes before he was sentenced to six consecutive terms of life in prison without the possibility of parole.

"I'm truly sorry, grieved and ashamed of what I've done to the families and friends," Malvo said as he listed the names of the Montgomery victims he and John Allen Muhammad shot from afar with a powerful rifle in October 2002. "Each of you relive this every morning, every birthday, every anniversary, every time you look in your children's eyes."

A handful of relatives attended the afternoon hearing in Rockville, which marked the last chapter of the snipers' legal proceedings in Maryland.

Malvo said he was most haunted by the death of Ride On bus driver Conrad Johnson, 35, the sniper's last victim. According to Malvo's testimony, his death was the only fatal shooting in Maryland in which Malvo pulled the trigger.

"I thought of his sons, who just for once would like to play basketball with their father," Malvo said. "Just one more time see his face."

Sonia Wills, Johnson's mother, stood a few feet from Malvo in the well of the courtroom, looked into his eyes and spoke in a low, booming voice.

"I must say for the past four years I have hated you," Wills said. "Right now, I, Conrad's mother, forgive you. . . . I have to, my dear. I can't go on hating you. That won't bring Conrad back."

Victoria Snider, sister of sniper victim James L. "Sonny" Buchanan, 39, was more stern.

"I have watched Lee Boyd Malvo express enjoyment of killing, to feeling bad about it, to admitting killing my brother, Sonny, to denying it," she said. "I say to you, Mr. Malvo: You were old enough to know right from wrong."

The other four Montgomery victims were Lori Lewis Rivera, 25; Sarah Ramos, 34; Premkumar A. Walekar, 54; and James D. Martin, 55.

DOJ_NMG_0092252

Prosecutors and Malvo's attorneys said Malvo, 21, has experienced a transformation during his months in Maryland. They said his remorse is genuine, and they commended him for cooperating with prosecutors in Muhammad's May trial in Montgomery, in which Malvo took the stand to offer the first public, firsthand account of the shootings.

"Before the Montgomery County trial of Mr. Muhammad, we certainly knew the what," Assistant State's Attorney Vivek Chopra said. "But it was only after Mr. Muhammad's testimony that we knew so much more about the how and the why."

Malvo testified that he fell under the spell of Muhammad as a young and vulnerable teenager who had all but been abandoned by his parents in Jamaica. The elder sniper took him on a cross-country trip in 2002 that began in Washington state, terrorized the District and its suburbs for three weeks in October and ended in suburban Maryland, where they were arrested. Malvo told law enforcement officials in Maryland this year that the pair shot 27 people, 17 of whom died.

Malvo has cooperated with law enforcement officials in recent months to close some of the unresolved cases in jurisdictions outside the Washington area. Last month, he met with detectives from Tucson, who offered him immunity from prosecution in exchange for a detailed account of the slaying of a man shot while playing golf in March 2002.

William C. Brennan, one of Malvo's attorneys, said yesterday that he had been contacted by authorities in another state where the pair are suspects in a homicide. He declined to identify the case but highlighted Malvo's continued willingness to cooperate with law enforcement officials.

Malvo and Muhammad were also convicted of murder in separate trials in Virginia in 2003. Muhammad, who is on death row in Virginia, acted as his own attorney during the month-long Maryland trial, was convicted of six counts of murder and was also given six consecutive life terms. Malvo was sentenced to life in prison in Virginia.

Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan praised Malvo for cooperating with authorities and for apologizing to victims' relatives. He told him that crossing paths with Muhammad had significantly worsened his already bleak prospects.

"You could have been somebody different. You could have been better," Ryan said. "What you are is a convicted murderer. You will think of that for the rest of your life. You knowingly, willfully and voluntarily participated in the cowardly murders of innocent, defenseless human beings."

PI Arrested On Charges Of Defrauding Top Litigation Firms (LAW)

By Anthony Lin, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, November 9, 2006

Federal law enforcement officials in New York have announced the arrest on wire fraud charges of a Montana private investigator who allegedly defrauded two of Manhattan's top litigation firms by promising to sell them "proof" of misconduct by opposing parties and counsel.

The criminal complaint filed Wednesday by the Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney's Office charged that Michael Lair had approached New York lawyers working on two high-profile cases and received more than $80,000 to provide information he ultimately failed to produce.

Lair, 46, is the president of Bozeman, Mont.-based consumerdefense.com Inc., a company that claims to investigate consumer complaints and conduct research in connection with fraud cases.

The complaint, sworn out by Special Agent B.J. Kang of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, did not identify any matters or lawyers by name, only describing one case as involving a large insurance company engaged in litigation with its former chairman and the other as involving a pharmaceutical company's suit against a hedge fund.

Sources familiar with both matters confirmed that the insurance company case was the dispute between AIG Inc. and its former chairman, Maurice R. Greenberg, and that the hedge fund matter was Biovail Corp.'s securities fraud suit against SAC Capital Management.

The lawyers who dealt with Lair included Robert G. Morvillo of Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason, Anello & Bohrer, which is one of a team of firms representing Greenberg, and Michael J. Bowe of Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman. Morvillo is one of the city's most well-known white-collar litigators and the Kasowitz firm, led by Marc E. Kasowitz, is also regarded as a top litigation shop.

In both cases, prosecutors allege Lair offered to sell one party sensitive information, then turned around and offered to sell the other side the information that their opponents had hired him to perform illegal and unethical acts.

The Morvillo firm paid Lair $75,000 on behalf of Greenberg, whose dispute with AIG centers on his efforts to place AIG clients with his C.V. Starr & Co. group of insurance brokerages. A source familiar with the matter said Lair had offered to provide information about alleged misconduct by PricewaterhouseCoopers, AIG's auditor, but had never provided any information.

According to the criminal complaint, Lair then approached lawyers for AIG and told them he had been hired by the Morvillo firm to hack into AIG's computers to obtain telephone and e-mail records.

The complaint states that a search of documents stored by Lair in Montana provided no evidence that any law firms contacted by Lair had requested he conduct any illegal or unethical conduct.

"On the contrary, the documents I reviewed demonstrated that Lair had reached out on numerous occasions to attorneys involved in highly publicized cases ... with a promise to provide them with existing incriminating evidence in exchange for money," Kang stated in the complaint.

The complaint also states that an individual who used to work for Lair told the FBI that Lair "spent time looking for reports concerning highly publicized cases on the Internet." He would then reportedly ask the companies involved to retain him but would never actually do any work.

Bowe of Kasowitz Benson said Wednesday that Lair had contacted him in March 2006, claiming to have information relevant to Biovail's suit, which charges that SAC Capital, a powerful hedge fund led by Steven A. Cohen, colluded with analysts to publish misleading reports that damaged the pharmaceutical company's stock. Bowe said the firm paid Lair less than $5,000 to cover travel expenses to New York but never received any information and ceased communications with him.

According to the complaint, Lair then tried in September to get SAC Capital's lawyers to pay $50,000 for the "information" that the Kasowitz firm had hired him to hack into computers at SAC Capital. By this time, the FBI had been alerted and Lair's communications with SAC Capital's lawyers were monitored.

Bowe said Wednesday it was not unusual for lawyers in high-profile cases to be approached by dubious individuals claiming to have information. Boies, Schiller & Flexner partner Nicholas A. Gravante echoed that sentiment in a statement issued on behalf of Greenberg's legal team.

"We are cooperating with the government's investigation." Gravante said. "Lair held himself out as an investigator who could help lawyers assemble facts necessary to defend their clients' interests. Although hiring investigative firms is routine practice in complex cases, in this case Lair failed to honor his obligations."

Both SAC Capital and AIG are represented by the firm of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison but lawyers at the firm declined to comment on the matter Wednesday.

Lair, who was expected to present himself today in federal court in Montana, could not be reached for comment. If convicted, he faces up to a maximum of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Ex-Penn Prof Charged With Child Porn (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

PHILADELPHIA — A former University of Pennsylvania business professor who was previously convicted in a teen sex sting was indicted Wednesday on charges he produced and distributed child pornography.

Lawrence Scott Ward, 64, was arrested in August as he returned from Brazil through Washington Dulles International Airport.

Federal authorities who searched his laptop computer said it contained a video of young children engaged in sexual activity. They also said they found videos showing the defendant involved in sex acts with teenage boys.

The three-count indictment charges that Ward produced, imported, and possessed child pornography. His arraignment was set for Thursday in Virginia.

Ward's attorney, Peter Greenspun, did not immediately return a telephone call seeking comment. He previously called the government's case "horribly weak."

Ward was convicted in 1999 of soliciting sex from a Pennsylvania state trooper posing as a 15-year-old male prostitute, a prosecutor said at Ward's recent bail hearing.

Mobsters Would Call Reality TV Show 'Throwing Up Gotti' (NYS)

By Jerry Capeci

New York Sun, November 9, 2006

It was the week before Christmas in 2004. There was food and wine on the table and an FBI bug hidden underneath. A trio of veteran wiseguys was trashing a reality TV show that struck close to their hearts, "Growing Up Gotti," the saga of John Gotti's racy, platinum blonde daughter, Victoria, and her three teenage sons, dubbed "Hotti Gottis" for their well-gelled good looks.

"It's a soap opera, and the kids look like girls," the host, Genovese capo Ciro Perrone, 85, thundered. He is owner of a popular Italian restaurant in Ozone Park, Don Peppe, where the men regularly gathered at a big round table in the back for dinner and discussion.

"It's one of the most disgusting, insulting shows" on television, the aging capo's longtime right-hand-man, John Yannucci, said, according to a report about the discussion written by FBI agent John Penza.

DOJ_NMG_0092254

Colombo soldier Ralph Scopo, a close Howard Beach pal of the late Gambino boss, was "so embarrassed" for his late friend's family that he said he couldn't talk about it, Mr. Penza wrote in an affidavit that was filed last year with the federal judge who approved the bugging.

Worse, Scopo noted, the Gotti boys in the show were incomprehensible. "The kids can't even talk," he said.

In fact, the vocabulary and diction of sons John, Carmine, and Frank was so poor that A&E ultimately resorted to subtitles to help viewers figure out what they were saying.

The wiseguys, of course, weren't alone in their distaste. The conversation took place on December 14, two days after the New York Post's Phil Mushnick wrote in his "Prime Time" column that "you don't have to be Italian to be offended" by the crude, vulgar, and negative stereotypes that fueled "Growing Up Gotti."

Federal Grand Jury Charges Ex-Muvico Worker (MH)

By Patrick Danner

The Miami Herald, November 9, 2006

Fort Lauderdale-based Muvico Theaters' former information-technology director faces a federal charge of sabotaging the movie-chain's ticketing-sales system last spring on the opening weekend of Mission Impossible III.

Joseph Harlen Shook, 36, of Broward County, was charged in a one-count grand jury indictment of hacking Muvico's computer system to disrupt ticket sales in May -- which the company says cost it about $100,000.

Shook could face up to 10 years in prison and a maximum fine of $250,000 if convicted. Shook couldn't be reached for comment.

Shook worked for Muvico for nearly three years, the last as its director of information technology. But Shook was dismissed in February as part of some cutbacks, according to Muvico spokesman John Spano.

"We're really happy that justice has been served," Spano said.

Shook made an initial appearance Wednesday in federal court but did not enter a plea and was released on $100,000 bail, the Associated Press reported.

Muvico had said its computer system was disrupted at 5:55 p.m. on May 5, a Friday, paralyzing the operations of the 233-screen chain. It was unable to sell tickets either online or by credit card at six theaters, according to the indictment.

AFFECTED THEATERS

The theaters affected were in Davie, Boca Raton, West Palm Beach, St. Petersburg, Tampa and Hanover, Md., the five-page indictment reads. The incident happened during what the chain says is its busiest time of the year.

Shook is accused of using a wireless-networking adapter to gain access to Muvico's computer system. The investigation was conducted by the FBI.

In an unrelated case, another former Muvico employee was arrested in December by the Broward Sheriff's Office on two felony counts of computer-related offenses against the company.

Spano said the former employee took a plea and is on probation.

RECENT TURMOIL

Muvico has faced considerable turmoil in recent months and has been at the center of lawsuits and countersuits. Its founder and chief executive, Hamid Hashemi, was fired in January. Hashemi and his wife then sued the privately held theater chain, claiming he was ousted in a power struggle with Muvico's new owners.

The company, however, said he was fired because of malfeasance.

In court documents, Muvico accused Hashemi of submitting personal expenses with no apparent business purpose, using company resources and funds for personal benefit and placing people on the payroll and health plan who didn't work for the company.

CIVIL LAW:

Judge: Group Can Subpoena White House (AP-Y)

AP, November 9, 2006

A federal magistrate judge has ruled that a reproductive rights group can seek White House e-mails and other documents as part of its lawsuit promoting broader access to the morning-after pill.

The ruling by Viktor Pohorelsky allows the Center for Reproductive Rights to subpoena more than three years of Plan B-related communications between the White House's domestic policy office and select Food and Drug Administration officials. The documents include e-mails, letters and records of conversations.

DOJ_NMG_0092255

The group sued the FDA seeking to lift all age restrictions on nonprescription sales of the Plan B emergency contraceptive pills. It seeks the documents to determine whether the White House interfered with the FDA's handling of a request by manufacturer Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. to allow over-the-counter sales.

The ruling issued Monday but disclosed Wednesday rejected a government effort to block the group from trying to subpoena the records.

Pohorelsky also allowed the group to take testimony from Dr. Sandra Kweder, deputy director of the FDA's office of new drugs, and Jay Lefkowitz, a former White House domestic policy aide.

Former FDA Commissioner Mark McClellan said in an earlier deposition that he gave Lefkowitz "occasional updates" on Barr's Plan B application, according to a transcript released by the group.

In August, the FDA said it would let women 18 and older buy Plan B without a prescription, but younger women would still need a doctor's note. Barr expects pharmacies nationwide to begin selling the pills over the counter to adults by the middle of November.

The morning-after pill is a high dose of the most common ingredient in regular birth control pills. When taken within 72 hours of unprotected sex, the two-pill series can lower the risk of pregnancy by up to 89 percent.

High Court Weighs Ban On Late-Term Abortions (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- One day after voters in three states rejected ballot measures to restrict abortions, the Supreme Court took up the Bush administration's appeal to reinstate the first federal ban of a specific abortion procedure.

Three federal appeals courts struck down the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, finding it violated a five-to-four Supreme Court opinion in 2000 that invalidated a similar Nebraska law because it made no exception to preserve the woman's health. Solicitor General Paul Clement told the justices that Congress had avoided the flaws of the Nebraska statute, by making official findings that the procedure was never medically necessary and defining the procedure itself more specifically.

WSJ reporter Jess Bravin2 discusses arguments in today's Supreme Court hearing on partial birth abortions, including what are the issues in the case and the potential impact of Tuesday's elections. MORE

· Abortion Foes Face Pair of Big Tests3

11/8/06

· Plus, read the case docket4 in Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood and the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 20035, provided by FindLaw6.

But the biggest change may have been on the court, where antiabortion activists hope two Bush appointees will uphold restrictions on the procedure and, perhaps someday, an outright ban. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who voted with the majority in the 2000 Nebraska case, has since retired, and her successor, Justice Samuel Alito, brings a record of skepticism toward abortion-rights arguments. Justice Alito said nothing through two hours of arguments yesterday. The other Bush appointee, Chief Justice John Roberts, vigorously questioned lawyers for both sides, as he typically does.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, one of the dissenters in 2000, asked probing questions of both sides, suggesting concerns the federal law may overreach and prohibit procedures that could be medically necessary. That could portend another fractured court opinion.

Mr. Clement argued that the federal ban, signed by President Bush after two similar bills passed by a Republican-controlled Congress were vetoed by President Clinton, draws a "bright line" between lawful abortions, where fetal demise is induced in the uterus, and those where it takes place "when the living fetus is over halfway outside of the womb." Safe alternatives were always available, he said, so the measure would not deter a single abortion, but rather abolish an aberrant practice favored by a minority of physicians.

But those facts were disputed by several justices, who pointed out that lower courts, after exhaustive hearings, had established no medical consensus on the procedure and that some of Congress' findings were inaccurate.

Justice David Souter said the government's position required the court to overrule its 2000 opinion or overrule the lower courts' finding on the medical evidence, or conclude that when courts and Congress find different facts, Congress is right. "Which of the three do we take?" he asked.

"Well, we would urge you to take any one of them," Mr. Clement said.

With Tuesday's election results, the court may be the best opportunity for abortion foes to restrict the procedure. Voters in California and Oregon rejected measures requiring parental notification before pregnant minors could obtain abortions, while South Dakotans repealed a law the Legislature adopted that banned all abortions except when the woman's life is in jeopardy.

Justices Have Pointed Abortion Discourse (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Supreme Court justices Wednesday sharply questioned attorneys on both sides of the legal battle over what opponents call partial-birth abortions as the high court weighed whether to uphold Congress's ban on the procedure.

In an intense morning of arguments, lawyers for the Bush administration and supporters of abortion rights gave starkly contrasting views: A law passed by Congress labels it a gruesome and inhumane practice. Supporters argue that such abortions in the second trimester of pregnancy sometimes are the safest for women.

A man in the audience began shouting midway through the proceedings, disrupting the hearing briefly before police dragged him away.

Seven justices took part in questioning both sides about whether the court should defer to congressional findings that these abortions are never medically necessary. Abortion advocates disagree, saying there is strong medical evidence to the contrary.

Full ImageJustice Samuel Alito, hearing his first abortion cases since joing the court earlier this year, sat silently through two hours of arguments. Justice Clarence Thomas was sick and did not attend, Chief Justice John Roberts announced.

"We have no evidence in the record" as to how often such a situation arises? Roberts asked.

"No, your honor," replied attorney Priscilla Smith, who argued for striking down the federal law.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg questioned the rationale that abortion opponents are using in the case, pointing out that the assertion that partial-birth abortion is a particularly gruesome procedure also could apply to the most commonly used method of abortion in the second trimester.

"I don't think so, Justice Ginsburg," Solicitor General Paul Clement replied.

(AP) Anti-abortion activist Grant Crum, stands in front of the Supreme Court in Washington, Wednesday,...

Full ImageGinsburg asked whether the procedures in the two types of abortions are "basically the same," making it hard to distinguish whether a doctor could be prosecuted for performing the banned method.

"I just don't think the record supports" that notion, Clement responded.

At issue is the fate of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act, which Congress passed and President Bush signed into law in 2003.

Six federal courts on both coasts and in the Midwest have struck down the law as an impermissible restriction on a woman's constitutional right to an abortion that the Supreme Court established in its landmark Roe v. Wade ruling in 1973.

A day earlier, abortion was on several state ballots. In South Dakota, voters repealed a state law that virtually outlaws abortions, an issue that itself could end up before the court.

Full ImageCalifornia and Oregon voters rejected measures that would have required that teenagers get their parents' consent before having an abortion.

A long line of people hoping for a seat inside stretched across the court's plaza hours before the session was to begin. Dozens of people camped through a rainy night in Washington to ensure their place near the head of the line.

Partial-birth abortion is not a medical term, but abortion opponents say it accurately describes "a rarely used and gruesome late-term abortion procedure that resembles infanticide," as Solicitor General Paul Clement said in court papers. Clement will argue the case for the administration.

Abortion-rights proponents dispute almost every aspect of the government's case, including the name for the procedure. They say the law has a much broader reach than the government claims and would threaten almost all abortions that take place after the third month of pregnancy.

Doctors most often refer to the procedure as a dilation and extraction or an intact dilation and evacuation abortion. It involves partially extracting a fetus from the uterus, then cutting or crushing its skull.

(AP) Anti-abortion activist Mary Lou Greenberg, right, speaks to people gathered outside the Supreme...

Full ImageThe procedure appears to take place most often in the middle third of pregnancy. There are a few thousand such abortions, according to rough estimates, out of more than 1.25 million abortions in the United States annually. Ninety percent of all abortions occur in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, and are not at issue.

By a 5-4 vote, the court invalidated a similar law in Nebraska in 2000 because it encompassed other abortion methods and did not contain an exception that would allow the procedure to preserve a woman's health, an underpinning of Supreme Court abortion rulings.

Two things have changed in the past six years, the composition of the court and Congress' involvement in the issue by tailoring a law to overcome the objections raised by justices in the Nebraska case.

Abortion opponents are optimistic the court will uphold the law because Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, part of the majority in the 2000 case, has retired and her place was taken by Justice Samuel Alito.

Bush appointed both Roberts and Alito, and most legal analysts believe that neither man will be especially supportive of abortion rights.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, the court's swing voter following O'Connor's departure, dissented so strongly in the Nebraska case that many court observers believe he is unlikely to switch sides.

The cases are Gonzales v. Carhart, 05-380, and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, 05-1382.

Justices Hear Arguments On Late-Term Abortion (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — There were moments on Wednesday, during Supreme Court arguments on a federal law that bans a disputed method of abortion, that the proceedings seemed more like a medical school seminar than an appellate argument.

Such familiar constitutional concepts as the right to privacy were not mentioned during the two hours, but the methods doctors use to dilate a pregnant woman's cervix were discussed in detail, repeatedly.

What exactly was the procedure that the law, the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, sought to prohibit, the justices wanted to know. When, if ever, was the procedure necessary? What would be the impact of banning it? What alternatives were available to women seeking second-trimester abortions and to doctors performing them?

Among the justices most interested in the medical details was the one whom both sides consider most likely to be in a position to control the outcome, Anthony M. Kennedy.

Justice Kennedy's questioning suggested that he had not made up his mind, despite his strongly worded dissenting opinion when the court struck down Nebraska's version of the federal law six years ago, and despite his obvious distaste for the procedure at issue. Instead, his questions suggested that he remained open to persuasion that the law placed doctors in legal jeopardy and imposed an unconstitutional burden on their patients' right to terminate their pregnancies.

One example was his response to the assertion by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement that it was never necessary for doctors to use the banned procedure because a more common procedure, one not covered by the statute, "has been well tested and works every single time as a way to terminate the pregnancy."

Justice Kennedy responded: "Well, but there is a risk if the uterine wall is compromised by cancer or some forms of pre-eclampsia and it's very thin. There's a risk of being punctured."

His comment reflected arguments that the doctors challenging the law have made. They say that "partial-birth abortion" — known medically as both "intact dilation and evacuation" and "D and X," for dilation and extraction — is often safer because the removal of an intact fetus avoids injury to the uterus. The more common method of second-trimester abortion, in which the fetus is dismembered, can leave behind bone fragments.

Whether Justice Kennedy was eventually persuaded remained unclear. In some respects, the arguments were as interesting for what did not occur as for what did.

For example, no member of the court appeared particularly interested in the plaintiffs' effort to depict the federal law as a violation of the separation of powers and a threat to the "independence of the judiciary," as Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights, described it. Ms. Smith's point was that, since the court held in the Nebraska decision that a ban on the procedure must include a health exception, Congress should not be permitted to defy the court by failing to provide such an exception.

Ms. Smith represented doctors who successfully challenged the law in Federal District Court in Nebraska and before the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis. That case is Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380. Eve C. Gartner, a senior staff attorney at Planned Parenthood, represented the clinics that successfully challenged the law in the federal courts in California. That case is Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382. The Bush administration appealed the two rulings to the Supreme Court.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not ask any questions during the arguments. As the successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who voted with the 5-to-4 majority in the Nebraska case, Justice Alito is obviously in a position to play a central role. Justice Antonin Scalia, who can usually be counted on to carry the anti-abortion side of the argument, appeared unusually disengaged, limiting his intervention to a few comments.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., on the other hand, was active throughout the arguments. At times, he appeared to be trying to bolster the defense of the statute by the solicitor general. At other times, the chief justice appeared eager to find differences between the federal law and the Nebraska law. Differences in the way the state and federal laws defined the procedure could be the basis for a decision that upholds the federal law without disavowing a recent precedent.

Solicitor General Clement urged the justices to defer to the findings Congress made when it passed the law, including that the procedure is never medically necessary. “Those determinations should be upheld as long as they represent reasonable inferences based on substantial evidence in the Congressional record,” Mr. Clement said, adding that “that standard is amply satisfied here.”

Justice John Paul Stevens challenged the solicitor general. “Are not some of the findings by Congress clearly erroneous?” he asked. Justice Stevens gave the example of a finding that no medical schools provide instruction in the procedure, while in fact, a number of medical schools do teach it.

“I think the district court could effectively undermine that one finding,” Mr. Clement conceded.

With the court’s precedents requiring that abortion restrictions include an exception for medical necessity, the outcome of these cases may depend on how the majority defines necessity. There was considerable discussion of whether the procedure’s safety advantage was “significant” or only “marginal” and there was a constitutional difference between the two.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who wrote the court’s decision in the Nebraska case, asked whether the court might rule that the procedure could be used “only where appropriate medical opinion finds it necessary.” Justice Breyer added: “Now, if Congress is right, there will be no such case, so it’s no problem. But if Congress is wrong, then the doctor will be able to perform the procedure and Congress couldn’t object.”

No Pointers To Ruling In Abortion Case (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Two hours of oral argument on a federal "partial birth" abortion ban at the Supreme Court yesterday showed that the justices are intensely focused on the procedure's medical details and health implications -- but produced few clues as to how they might rule.

As expected, the court's four most liberal members, Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, sounded skeptical about the statute. Of the court's conservatives, only Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said much at all, asking questions that implied the law should be upheld.

That left plenty of time for Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, whom both sides in the case consider the likely swing vote, to listen to the lawyers and air his concerns -- though he did not tip his hand.

At one point, Kennedy, who dissented when the court struck down a similar state ban in 2000, repeated a concern he voiced in that case. "Your argument," he told Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for doctors challenging the law, "is that there is always a constitutional right to use what the physician thinks is the safest procedure."

But later, Kennedy expressed worry that the federal ban might leave some women at "risk if the uterine wall is compromised by cancer or some forms of preeclampsia," a dangerous spike in blood pressure.

Such health questions are central to the most important abortion case to reach the court in half a decade.

The federal law, passed by Congress and signed by President Bush in 2003, bans the procedure known medically as "intact dilation and extraction," which usually occurs in the second trimester of pregnancy. It generally involves the breech delivery of a fetus, followed by the collapsing of its skull to permit removal. The term "partial birth abortion" is preferred by opponents of the procedure.

The ban does not apply when a woman's life is at risk, but Congress made no exception to preserve a woman's health. Abortion rights advocates say this omission is unconstitutional under the 2000 Supreme Court ruling. All lower federal courts to consider the matter have agreed, so the law has not yet been enforced.

But Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, defending the law, told the court yesterday that Congress properly found that "partial birth abortions were never medically necessary, and that safe alternatives were always available such that no woman would be prevented from terminating her pregnancy."

As a result, he said, Congress had authority to ban what he called "a particularly gruesome procedure that blurred the line between abortion and infanticide."

That argument drew a sharp response from Stevens, who noted that the alternative procedure, dilation and evacuation, requires the dismemberment of the fetus before removal. "Congress has made the judgment that it is far preferable to ensure that fetal demise takes place before any delivery begins," Stevens noted sardonically. "That's the big issue."

DOJ_NMG_0092259

"The basic point of this statute is to draw a bright line between a procedure that induces fetal demise in utero and one where the lethal act occurs when the child or the fetus, whichever you want to call it, is more than halfway outside of the mother's womb," Clement replied.

Clement said that Congress is entitled to legislate the distinction. "The one is abortion," he said. "The other is murder."

But Smith noted that there is no such bright line because doctors performing dilation and evacuation sometimes bring out a fetus up to the midsection while trying to dismember it in utero.

Depicting the federal ban as a direct challenge to the court's authority, Smith told the court, "The only course here that preserves independence of the judiciary, that exemplifies the importance of [settled precedent], not to mention the only course that will protect women from needless risks of uterine perforation, infertility, sepsis and hemorrhage, is to hold this act unconstitutional."

The most dramatic moment of the morning came moments later, at about 10:40 a.m., when a loud voice cried out from the back of the courtroom.

"Abortion is the shedding of innocent blood!" shouted a man later identified by the court as Rives Miller Grogan, 40, of Los Angeles. He was immediately tackled and dragged out by Supreme Court police, who charged him with violating a federal law against disrupting court sessions, as well as with offenses related to resisting arrest.

Grogan's protest, the first such incident in recent memory at the court, momentarily stunned the spectators and justices and interrupted Smith, who was explaining that Congress's findings that the procedure is never medically necessary were "simply unreasonable" and so thoroughly contradicted by medical experts as to carry no legal weight.

Roberts challenged that claim, asking Smith if the "marginal benefit in safety" from using the procedure is "enough to override the state's articulated interest?"

Smith responded that doctors have testified "that the reduction in risk" from using the procedure is "significant."

Kennedy had earlier asked Smith how often in practice such risks arose, but she conceded that there were no statistics.

As if to reinforce Kennedy's concern on that point, Roberts returned to it several times during the argument, telling Smith at one point that "we don't have any record evidence about how often the complications arise, so it's hard to get a handle on exactly what the difference is in terms of safety."

High Court Hears Cases On Ban Of Abortion Method (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Bush administration lawyer urged the Supreme Court on Wednesday to uphold the nation's first criminal ban on an abortion method, saying so-called partial-birth abortions are "too close to infanticide" and not a medical necessity.

Safe alternatives are always available, U.S. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said in defending a law passed by Congress in 2003.

But two abortion-rights advocates argued that the ban, if put into effect, would unwisely limit the options of doctors who perform abortions in the second trimester and would expose some pregnant women to more dangerous surgery.

These doctors believe that the procedure medically known as dilation and extraction, or D&X — in which the fetus is removed intact — "reduces the risk of serious complications," including bleeding and infection in the uterus, said Priscilla Smith, a lawyer for the Center for Reproductive Rights in New York.

"What Congress has done here is take away from women the option of what may be the safest procedure for her," said Eve Gartner, a lawyer for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

The case could prove a turning point for the Supreme Court on abortion. With the arrival of President Bush's two conservative appointees, there appears to be a five-vote majority, including Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, to uphold stricter regulation of abortion.

Six years ago when the court struck down a Nebraska ban on the practice, Kennedy wrote an impassioned dissent, describing D&X as "abhorrent."

Abortion-rights advocates hope he will switch sides. But Wednesday, Kennedy suggested that the disputed procedure might be "purely elective and not medically necessary."

New Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. said nothing. But he and Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. have been counted as likely to uphold the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act.

The measure, a proud achievement of Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress, coincidentally came before the court the day after its prime sponsor Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) went down to defeat and the GOP lost control of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0092260

Most of the two-hour argument Wednesday was about the scope of the law, which would ban a procedure used only after the 16th week of pregnancy. Critics call it "partial-birth" abortion because doctors extract the living fetus partway from the uterus, then collapse its skull before pulling the fetus the rest of the way out.

Minimizing the law's impact, Clement described D&X as a "very aberrant, atypical procedure" and said a ban would affect "a very small minority of second-trimester abortions."

Most such abortions use "dilation and evacuation," or D&E, in which the fetus is dismembered in the uterus before it is removed.

Moreover, a doctor who planned to remove the fetus intact could "induce fetal demise at the outset" — injecting it with a drug to stop its heart — without violating the law, Clement said, because the fetus would emerge dead.

Some medical experts, however, say such injections pose too great a risk of exposing the woman to a deadly chemical.

Even if the law is upheld, Clement said, doctors can go to court and ask for an exception that "focuses on particular medical conditions" that call for the D&X procedure.

Several liberal justices objected during the argument to talk of "infanticide." They stressed that most second-trimester abortions involved fetuses that could not live on their own.

Some "are only 4 or 5 inches long. They are very different from fully formed babies," Justice John Paul Stevens said.

"So anything about infanticide, babies, all that, is just beside the point because what this bans is a method of abortion," added Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Clement refused to back down. Congress was interested in "maintaining a bright line between abortion and infanticide," he said.

Once a fetus emerged alive from the uterus, if it were killed, "I think we'd call that murder," he added.

The two lawyers arguing against the law sought to portray its reach as broad. They stressed that the ban does not use medical terms, such as D&X or D&E.

It could "place doctors at risk of prosecution" for D&E abortions if they removed a large part of the fetus, said Gartner, Planned Parenthood's lawyer. Rather than banning only one procedure, the law could ban the most common second-trimester procedure, she said.

Roberts disagreed. What counts is the doctor's intent, he said. A doctor who intends to do a D&E "wouldn't be covered by this law," he said.

Roberts conceded the D&X procedure might have "a marginal impact on safety" for patients, but he questioned whether that should be enough to strike down the entire law.

Smith replied that medical experts said the issue went well beyond marginal benefits.

"The reduction in risk is significant," she said, saying the D&X method "reduces the risk of serious complications, such as uterine perforation, which … lead to hysterectomies and infertility."

After Congress passed the law, judges in San Francisco, New York and Omaha barred it from taking effect. The Supreme Court heard the government's appeal in two cases Wednesday and will issue a ruling in several months.

Supreme Court Abortion Hearing Disrupted (SH)

By Hannah Guillaume

Scripps Howard, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A screaming man charged through the main doors of the Supreme Court's chambers during a hearing in a contentious abortion case Wednesday.

"Abortion is a sin," shouted the man, later identified by court officials as Rives Miller Grogan. Four court employees dragged him out of the courtroom.

Grogan's last known residence is in Los Angeles. He was taken to the U.S. Capitol Booking Center before being transported to D.C. Superior Court.

He was charged with creating a noise disturbance, resisting arrest and other related offenses, a Supreme Court spokesman said.

Some spectators left their seats and headed toward the door. None of the justices said anything about the disturbance. Such disturbances are rare in the well-guarded court chamber. Court regulars said the last one they remembered was in1983 when Hustler publisher Larry Flynt shouted obscenities during a hearing in his own case.

In less than a minute, the lawyer who had been speaking resumed her remarks, although the man's screams could still be heard in the hallway.

The court was hearing two abortion cases, Gonzales v. Carhart and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, both challenging the constitutionality of the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0092261

Opponents argue the law is invalid because it does not allow an exemption to preserve a woman's health. It does contain an exemption to preserve a woman's life.

Justices Anthony Kennedy and Stephen Breyer asked the most questions during the two-hours of argument. Both asked about possible harm to women because of the lack of a health exemption.

Kennedy voted to uphold Nebraska's late term abortion law in 2000, even though it did not contain a health exemption. The court ruled the law unconstitutional for that reason. Kennedy is thought to be a likely swing vote in the cases argued Wednesday.

Since that decision, the court's frequent swing vote, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, has retired and two new conservative justices have joined the court.

Breyer asked technical questions about the procedure and the statute's language.

Kennedy said, "It doesn't make sense to say there is an alternative procedure if you can't get access to it."

Representing Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Solicitor General Paul Clement argued the law would not affect a woman's health or her right to choose an abortion.

Lawyers for Dr. Leroy Carhart and Planned Parenthood argued that banning "intact dilation and extraction" abortions will endanger women's lives and limit their ability to choose.

In adopting the law, Congress heard from medical experts and issued findings that a ban would not harm women's health.

Lawyer Eve Gartner, representing Planned Parenthood, said Congress' findings were inaccurate. She said women need to make decisions about procedures with their doctors, not with the slow-moving courts.

She and Carhart's lawyer listed health concerns not raised during congressional hearings, including death, kidney disease and liver disease.

Justice Clarence Thomas was not in court because he was ill, Chief Justice John Roberts said. Thomas is expected to vote in the case. A decision is expected by next summer.

Voting Booth Glitches Show Where Fixes Needed Ahead (USAT)

By Richard Wolf, Usa Today

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — As a dress rehearsal for the 2008 presidential election, Tuesday's experiences at the nation's 183,000 polling places succeeded by failing.

Where voters encountered balky equipment, it pointed up the need to examine paper trails and other methods for verifying their votes.

Where voters weren't helped by struggling poll workers, it illuminated the need for increased recruitment and better training.

And where they were misinformed or misdirected by automated "robocalls" and leaflets, it reignited calls for laws that would crack down on such practices.

All of those problems and more surfaced Tuesday in what state and federal officials said was a practice run for the 2008 election. And while none of the problems caused nearly as much trouble as the "hanging chads" of 2000, they laid bare the election system's growing pains.

"There continue to be deep concerns about the patterns of voting in our country," Chellie Pingree, president of the civic group Common Cause, said. "The level of problems that we heard about out there is still completely unacceptable."

A hotline run by Common Cause received 16,000 calls. Another headed by the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law got 20,000. The Justice Department received only about 250 calls and e-mails, down from 1,200 in 2004.

"There was nothing out of the ordinary," Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said. "They tended to be routine problems, and fairly isolated."

The 2002 Help America Vote Act authorized $3.9 billion in federal aid to states to overhaul their antiquated voting systems. Since then, most states have ditched punch-card, lever and paper voting methods in favor of electronic machines or those that scan paper ballots.

This was the first election in which all the mandates of the federal law came into play. That included states developing statewide databases to determine voters' eligibility. A number of states also enacted laws requiring certain types of identification, only to have courts overturn many of them.

The combination of new machines, new databases and new ID requirements, along with poll workers who average 72 years of age, was expected to lead to problems.

In turn, those problems were expected to show the way to reforms needed by 2008, when more than one in four election officials will be new to the job.

With Democrats coming to power in Congress, elections experts say the following changes should be debated, beginning with a December hearing of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission:

·Legislation sponsored by Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., that would impose harsh penalties on people who deceive voters. "We need to have clear laws that create some criminal penalty and perhaps fines for that type of behavior," says Jon Greenbaum of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

·Legislation sponsored by Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., that would mandate paper trails on electronic voting machines. Virginia, facing a recount in a Senate race that will determine which party controls the Senate, has no paper trails.

"You couldn't have a better example about why we need to do things differently," Pingree says.

·More money for states to purchase machines and train poll workers. About $800 million of the $3.9 billion authorized in 2002 never was appropriated. States "have spent their wad," said Kimball Brace of Election Data Services.

·Making Election Day a federal holiday, which would free up poll workers and polling stations.

·Pushing more states to allow same-day voter registration. That would eliminate much of the need for provisional ballots, which often are not counted. Six states allow it now. Congress also could set standards for when those ballots should be counted.

·Standards for equitable distribution of voting machines, so that some voters don't wait for hours. Says Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the Election Assistance Commission: "It may be 2010 before we really see the full promise of all

Monitors Report Smooth Election (BRADV)

By Richard Burgess

Baton Rouge Advocate, November 9, 2006

OPELOUSAS — Poll watchers from the Justice Department and the NAACP reported a smooth election day in St. Landry Parish, despite concerns of voting irregularities in a close contest between a black female interim sheriff and her white male opponent.

Former State Police Trooper Bobby Guidroz won election over interim Sheriff Laura Balthazar on Tuesday with 20,210 votes, or 51 percent, according to complete but unofficial returns.

U.S. Attorney Donald Washington said Wednesday that the roughly 24 Justice Department monitors who roamed parish precincts Tuesday reported no issues with voter access or intimidation.

He said some routine election problems arose, such as a few names mistakenly left off voter rolls, but the issues were quickly resolved by the Clerk of Court's Office.

"It was quiet, and people who wanted to get out and vote got out and voted," said St. Landry Parish First Assistant District Attorney Frank Trosclair, whose office manned phones Tuesday to field election-day complaints.

Poll watchers for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Legal Defense and Education Fund also reported no problems.

Clifton Lemelle Sr., a retired educator from Eunice who helped organize the NAACP monitors, said he heard scattered complaints of people campaigning too close to the polls but no confirmed reports of intimidation.

or of voters being wrongly turned away from the polls.

Lemelle said he believed the biggest issue was the reaction of some parish officials last week to news that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People planned to monitor the elections.

Clerk of Court Charles Jagneaux, citing information he had received from state officials, initially said that the NAACP had no legal right to bring in poll watchers, which are generally allowed only as representatives of a candidate or a government agency.

The poll watchers were allowed in after the NAACP presented a court order in a lawsuit filed over voting rights in post-Katrina New Orleans that stipulates the organization can monitor elections in several parishes, including St. Landry.

Lemelle said the confusion most likely spurred a backlash vote.

"I think it inflamed the white voters, and it created a 1960s, 1970s climate of 'nobody from the North is going to tell us how to vote,'" Lemelle said.

Kristen Clarke-Avery, assistant counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, said the election monitors focused on Opelousas and Grand Coteau, where Friday night someone attempted to set fire to a 5-foot-tall wooden cross in front of town hall.

The incident remains under investigation.

“Although we did not encounter major defects in the process, the election makes clear that race is still a divisive issue,” she said.

Touch-screen Voting Will Be Reviewed (SLPD)

By Stephen Deere, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 9, 2006

Now that the votes have been tallied, St. Louis County election officials and voter rights advocates will begin counting the number of problems voters had casting them.

High on the list of priorities: the county's touch-screen voting machines, which had their first major test on Tuesday.

John Diehl, chairman of the county's Election Board, said most problems with the machines were confined to 20 or fewer of the county's 450 polling sites.

Diehl, a Republican, admitted that lines were long in some places, but said it was mostly due to heavy voter turnout and a lengthy ballot.

As for the new equipment, he said the problems with the touch-screen machines happened when paper rolls jammed after poll workers had replaced them. The machines are equipped to print voters' choices on paper as the picks are made.

He said the turnout for the August primary, when the county introduced the touch screens, was so low comparatively that few polling places required paper-roll replacements.

"We had to change them three and four times, and we could see by two in the afternoon that calls multiplied about paper jams," he said. "That accounted for 90 percent of the issues we had to deal with."

But one voting rights advocate argued that problems were more widespread and were the result of poorly trained election judges and a lack of specialists to monitor the touch-screen machines.

"There wasn't enough (specialists) to meet the need," said Denise Lieberman, an attorney with the voter advocacy group Advancement Project and former legal director of the ACLU of Eastern Missouri. "The election judges simply didn't have the skills."

Diehl said the county had trained 200 poll workers to boot up and shut down the machines, as well as 25 specialists assigned to locations throughout the county and 28 pairs of roving specialists to respond to problems.

Both Diehl and Lieberman said they had yet to compile comprehensive lists of the problems and their locations.

The midterm election marked sort of a role reversal for the county — where reports of voting problems have typically been uncommon — and the city of St. Louis, where elections have been marred by lawsuits and an inquiry from the U.S. Justice Department.

On Tuesday, the county also had some malfunctions with paper ballots.

Diehl said the long (19-inch) ballots stressed some optical scanners that read them.

In some cases, people feeding the ballots into the scanners tried forcing them and got error messages in response.

"That's just a training issue that we are going to have to go over with some of our poll judges," he said.

Lieberman said some people reported that when the scanners broke down, judges began stacking ballots in the open.

Diehl said he didn't know if the report was true, but said many of the Advancement Project's complaints during the day only added to the difficulties.

Tim O'Neil of the Post-Dispatch contributed to this report.

Secretary Of State To Take Over Supervision Of Boston Elections (BOS)

The Boston Globe, November 9, 2006

BOSTON --Secretary of State William Galvin said Wednesday he would take over the supervision of the city's election department after some precincts ran out of ballots during Tuesday's election, forcing voters to wait as police cruisers rushed to bring more.

"I can't have 'We'll try to do better next time.' That's not acceptable," Galvin said Wednesday. "What they did yesterday was put the rights of voters at risk and that's unacceptable."

Galvin said the law required him to determine a pattern of misconduct -- which he believes there is -- then create a solution to the problems.

"My view of the remedy is there has to be some supervision," he said. "I have no desire to micromanage the operations of the city of Boston. ... I'm interested in making sure that the basic function of the department is carried out."

Galvin said a similar move was made in Boston in the 1980s, when the Secretary of State's Office appointed a monitor to review, control and direct the department.

DOJ_NMG_0092264

Jennifer Mehigan, a spokeswoman for Mayor Thomas Menino, said the city would cooperate with the state. Menino also is drawing from other sources to help fix election problems.

"He is speaking with different outside consultants," Mehigan said. "We're looking at the communication between the wardens and the city, the elections department and other procedures like that."

Galvin said late Tuesday he was considering the move, after being forced to tell Menino to send ballots in police cruisers to a half-dozen polling places where ballots ran low.

The mayor's office said problems began in the evening, when the after-work crowd was larger than expected, and city vehicles used to replenish ballot supplies ran into traffic. Menino said Wednesday that precincts were given enough ballots for 50 percent turnout, but some had turnouts that were higher.

He denied the shortages were in only poor or minority neighborhoods -- a contention made by some anxious voters waiting Tuesday.

Boston also had problems in September during the primary, when ballots in eight precincts were inadvertently uncounted.

The U.S. Justice Department also filed a lawsuit in July 2005, alleging that Boston's election practices discriminated against Hispanic and Asian voters. The department dropped the lawsuit later that year, when city officials agreed to provide voting materials in Chinese and Vietnamese and to allow federal observers to monitor polling places through 2008.

Heads May Roll Over Ballot Bungle (BOSH)

By Michele McPhee, Boston Herald Police Bureau Chief

Boston Herald, November 9, 2006

Mayor Thomas M. Menino said city staffers face “reassignment” as the state seeks legal oversight of Boston’s Elections Department after a ballot shortage forced police to make rush deliveries to angry voters at the polls.

“I am very, very angry. This should not have happened,” Menino told the Herald. “Will people be reassigned? It’s possible. We certainly need a management plan for the Elections Department.”

Secretary of State William Galvin told city officials he plans to utilize his legal right to manage the city Elections Department.

Meanwhile the mayor has said he will hire a consultant to “shake up” the department and file quarterly progress reports to Galvin.

The state printed more than 300,000 ballots for Hub voters, but just half those were delivered to polling locations, leaving largely minority strongholds such as East Boston, Hyde Park, Mattapan, Roxbury and Dorchester without enough ballots, infuriating voters who were forced to wait for hours to cast their ballots.

Some precinct wardens began handing English-speaking voters ballots printed in other languages, or told voters to leave their phone numbers and they would be called when there were ballots available. Officials estimate that 2.2 million people voted in Tuesday’s election.

“How can we not be prepared for people who wanted to exercise their right to participate in democracy? We need to know what went on out there,” City Councilor Felix Arroyo said.

Arroyo joined fellow councilors Sam Yoon, Chuck Turner and Charles Yancey in filing an order to hold a public hearing on election issues.

City Council President Michael F. Flaherty said he does not believe Elections Department officials engaged in malfeasance, but believes an investigation is warranted.

“The breakdown that occurred needs to be addressed to ensure the public’s confidence in their election system. Voters are a precious commodity,” he said.

This is the second voting snafu this year. Eight precinct wardens, who are paid $150 on Election Day, were fired after they were “too tired” to tally votes in the Senate race between incumbent Sen. Dianne Wilkerson and her challenger, Sonia Chang-Diaz, prompting a recount, Menino said.

In 2003, a lawsuit was filed about voting problems in the city, issues severe enough that the U.S. Justice Department is now supervising Boston elections.

Michigan Turns Back College Affirmative Action (WSJ)

By Suzanne Sataline And John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

In 2003, when the Supreme Court upheld affirmative action in college admissions, many observers felt that the issue had been settled for years to come.

Think again.

DOJ_NMG_0092265

Voters in Michigan, where the state university successfully fought in that Supreme Court case to preserve minority preference, repudiated it in a ballot initiative Tuesday. An initiative passed by Michigan voters will ban affirmative action in admissions to public colleges and in government hiring. Currently, the University of Michigan and other selective public institutions in the state consider race as one of many factors in admissions decisions. The ban takes effect 45 days after the vote.

Ward Connerly, the California businessman behind the Michigan initiative, yesterday said he is exploring bringing similar proposals to other states, including Illinois, Missouri and Oregon. And next month, the Supreme Court will revisit the question of race-based enrollment, this time in the context of K-12 public-school assignments.

"If we can win in Michigan, a blue state with a Democratic governor...this initiative would pass" anywhere, said Mr. Connerly, a former University of California regent who led successful campaigns to ban racial preferences in college admissions in California and Washington. "If you give the American people a chance to decide whether they want everybody treated equal regardless of race, nine times out 10 they would vote for it."

Late yesterday, an affirmative-action group known as By Any Means Necessary filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan against Gov. Jennifer Granholm claiming that the ban is unconstitutional, said the group's attorney George B. Washington. A spokesman for the governor couldn't be reached to comment.

Affirmative-action supporters said the initiative will reduce black and Hispanic enrollment at the University of Michigan and Michigan State University and said they hope to challenge it in court. "We believe affirmative action is a positive tool for society," University of Michigan President Mary Sue Coleman said in an interview. Depending on the court's interpretation, she said, the initiative could stymie the university's efforts to attract more black students overall, and more women into science and engineering programs. She said the university will seek legal permission to judge current applicants under its old criteria, which take race into account.

John C. Brittain, chief counsel of the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights under Law, a Washington, group that has defended affirmative action before the Supreme Court, called the initiative "a very dangerous step that turns back the clock on civil rights." He said he expected civil-rights lawyers to figure out ways to mount a constitutional attack on the initiative -- perhaps using the language of the U.S. Supreme Court's Michigan decision permitting affirmative action.

In its decision, the Supreme Court allowed colleges to use preferences, but didn't require that they do so, which left room for Michigan voters to impose a ban.

Polls had indicated that the vote on the initiative would be close. But Michigan voters on Tuesday approved the measure, called Proposal 2, by a margin of 58% to 42%, with 100% of precincts reporting.

"We won in places no one ever expected we'd win," said Doug Tietz, campaign manager for the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, the group that sponsored the referendum. Analysts said voters may have been reluctant to tell pollsters that they supported the initiative for fear of being tagged as racist by the state's academic, political and business establishment, which largely opposed it.

Linda Chavez, chairman of the Center for Equal Opportunity, a Sterling, Va., nonprofit that opposes racial preferences and campaigned for the initiative, said such initiatives are most successful in states like Michigan that have flagship public campuses where white applicants are angry about losing competitive spots.

The Michigan vote could also draw more attention to pending cases before the Supreme Court. It will hear arguments Dec. 4 on the constitutionality of using race as a factor in school assignments in Louisville, Ky., and Seattle. In both cases, white parents whose children were passed over for entry to sought-after public schools sued the school districts.

Mr. Tietz said his next target may be the college admissions preference sometimes referred to as "white affirmative action" -- the edge given to children of alumni. During the campaign, he said, his group was "forceful and straightforward" in opposing so-called legacy preference, while supporters of affirmative action dodged that issue.

He said he would "work hand-in-hand" with affirmative-action supporters to end legacy preference. "My kids someday will not need a legacy boost," said Mr. Tietz, an alumnus of the University of Michigan, which considers legacy status in admissions decisions. "I want them to work hard and earn their spot, so no one will say, 'You got in because of your dad.'"

A black firefighter who was served dog food in his dinner by fellow firefighters at the Westchester station will receive $2.7 million.

A black firefighter who was served dog food in his spaghetti by fellow firefighters will be paid more than $2.7 million to settle a lawsuit alleging racial harassment within the Los Angeles Fire Department.

The award, approved on an 11-1 vote Wednesday by the Los Angeles City Council, is the latest in a recent string of settlements of lawsuits by firefighters claiming discrimination and harassment and retaliation against those who complain.

It is believed to be the largest payout for misconduct in the department's history, which was long considered among the nation's finest, but has often been the target of complaints about hostility toward African American and female firefighters.

Firefighter Tennie Pierce, 51, alleged in his lawsuit that Firefighter Jorge Arevalo mixed canned dog food into Pierce's dinner at their Westchester station two years ago; that Capt. John Tohill purchased the dog food; and that Capt. Chris Burton knew about the prank but didn't warn Pierce. All three men were present when Pierce ate the dog food.

Pierce "took a large bite, at which time he noticed the other firefighters were laughing and making noises," the lawsuit says. He took a second bite, then demanded to know what was in his food, "but no one would tell him." Pierce then left the kitchen "with his co-workers laughing at him."

A Fire Department investigation suggested the incident was intended to "humble" Pierce — who stands 6 feet 5 — after his team won a fire station volleyball game. A lawyer for one of the defendants initially called the incident "a good-natured prank … [not] in any way motivated by race."

But a UC Santa Cruz professor who was hired by Pierce's attorney to review department records of discrimination complaints said the prank was clearly intended to "humiliate and dehumanize" Pierce.

"The association of a black man and dog food resonates with the deep historical roots of slavery and the corresponding dehumanization," said sociologist David Wellman, co-author of "Whitewashing Race: Colorblind Policies in a Color Conscious America."

"It's not just silly stuff. It's racially motivated…. The organization labels it as macho, 'boys will be boys' behavior. I think it's more about keeping blacks out by making their lives so miserable that they don't want to stay."

In addition to the three firefighters, the lawsuit named the city as a defendant because the fire captains allegedly allowed a hostile workplace to exist in violation of department policies forbidding harassment. The two captains were given one month off without pay as punishment. Arevalo was ordered off work for three days without pay. As part of the settlement, they were dismissed from the lawsuit, so they are not liable financially.

Fire Chief William Bamattre admitted the incident was "intolerable" and violates department "guidelines on what's professional performance.... That type of harassment or prank or whatever you call it is not consistent with what the public expects from the Fire Department, the confidence the public has in us."

But Councilman Dennis Zine, a police officer for 38 years and the lone vote against the settlement, said he thought the $2.7-million award was "outrageous for something that caused no serious injury, no permanent harm…. "

"That's not to say it was right, not to justify what they did. But $2.7 million?…. I don't think it was a racial deal. It was a prank that turned sour, but did it go bad to the point that he's harmed for life? That it should cost the taxpayers $2.7 million?"

In his lawsuit, Pierce said that for more than a year after the October 2004 incident he was subjected to "verbal slurs, insults [and] derogatory remarks" — including taunting by firefighters "barking like dogs [and] asking him how dog food tasted" — in the presence of supervisors.

In addition to the payout, the settlement provides for Pierce to remain on fully-paid administrative leave until April, when he reaches his 20-year service anniversary. Then he can retire with an annual pension amounting to half of his salary for life.

Pierce was out of town and could not be reached for comment Wednesday. But his attorney, Genie Harrison, said the incident — and the unwillingness of other firefighters at the table to intervene — was a "shocking betrayal" for Pierce, who grew up in South Los Angeles.

"He was targeted by people he considered brothers and then was mercilessly harassed out of the job that meant so much to him," Harrison said. "Now he's calling for the public's help to change the working environment for African Americans who remain on the department."

The department hired its first black firefighter in 1897, but for almost 60 years blacks were assigned only to segregated stations in black neighborhoods. As the city's black population grew, all-black crews began displacing white firefighters, who often responded with animosity. In 1936, white firefighters at a Central Avenue station who were forced to move to accommodate a black crew responded by trashing the station with garbage and human waste.

In the 1940s, pressure mounted to integrate the force. But then-Chief John H. Alderson declared integration a "social experiment" and refused; 90% of white firefighters joined a fund-raising campaign to support him. Those who expressed a willingness to live and work alongside blacks were ostracized by peers and often disciplined for insubordination.

The city's fire stations were officially integrated in 1956, but blacks were denied kitchen privileges and subjected to such vicious hazing that off-duty black firefighters began patrolling integrated stations, some carrying guns.

DOJ_NMG_0092267

In 1974, the department entered into a federal consent decree that required half of all new recruits to be black, Latino or Asian American. The decree was lifted in 2001, but some blame it for lowering morale and stoking resentment among white male firefighters who considered it reverse discrimination and complained that it allowed the hiring of unqualified minorities.

Today the 3,600-member department is 53% white, 29% Latino, 12% black and 5% Asian American. Women make up 2.7% of the department.

But some say the diversity masks problems that has continued to hold minorities back.

In 1994, complaints of discrimination reached such a fever pitch, the City Council ordered an audit of the department and held hearings that led to the resignation of Chief Donald Manning. The audit found that women and minorities were frozen out of management positions and often drummed out of the department as rookies.

An audit earlier this year by City Controller Laura Chick revealed similar findings. Among black firefighters, 87% said they had experienced or witnessed discrimination.

Some firefighters say pranks are part of the firehouse culture and not directed specifically at blacks. But black firefighters report much of the teasing they experience involves racial slurs, offensive comments or pranks aimed at humiliation.

"Blacks have experienced this for over 300 years," sociologist Wellman said. "They have a gyroscope that picks up hostile stuff that somebody else would not see as hostile.

"Culture becomes very important," he said. "In the black community people come together and talk about the way they've been treated. They run it up the flagpole … 'Tell me if I'm off the wall here.'

"Their group picks it up and your group doesn't because their group has a history that yours doesn't share."

Stun Guns Avert Trouble, Harford Police Say (BSUN)

By Justin Fenton, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, November 9, 2006

From a suicidal teenager to a suspected car thief who flees on foot, some people who have refused to cooperate with Harford County police have been getting a wake-up call -- the 50,000-volt variety.

The Harford County Sheriff's Office is believed to be among the first police agencies in Maryland to issue Taser stun guns to its deputies, who have used the devices to stop people who flee or refuse to comply with orders, and for the mentally ill who become violent.

The agency has been issuing stun guns to patrol deputies since last year, and they have used them on at least 28 occasions since January. One incident involved a 50-year-old schizophrenic woman who had barricaded herself in a closet and was shocked with a stun gun because a deputy feared she could get to weapons in another room.

The agency says the devices, which have been criticized for causing fatalities, have been most effective as a deterrent to violence and limit injuries to suspects and officers. A spokesman said assaults on officers were down.

"It is far more useful than engaging someone in hand-to-hand combat or taking action with a baton," said Robert B. Thomas, a spokesman for the agency.

The agency first purchased stun guns in 2002 and has been phasing them into the arsenal of weapons used by all patrol deputies. Harford is not alone -- more than 7,000 of the 18,000 police agencies in the United States use the weapons, according to a March report by Amnesty International, and 1,700 police departments have purchased them for every officer.

With increased use, however, has come greater scrutiny. Amnesty International said there had been at least 156 deaths across the country related to police stun guns in the past five years, and dozens of excessive-force lawsuits have been brought by people who say they were injured by officers.

"The good part about having all officers equipped is that when they encounter a threat, they don't have to call for assistance or wait for a SWAT team to arrive," said Doug Ward, associate director of the Johns Hopkins University's Division of Public Safety Leadership. "The downside is that they tend to find ways to use them, and there are horror stories from across the country where people encounter medical issues after getting [stunned] multiple times."

Other area jurisdictions are considering purchasing stun guns or are using them on a limited basis. The Anne Arundel County Council approved the use of the weapons in the spring, and police there are researching the technology.

Baltimore County officers are testing 10 of the devices on the streets and have used them more than two dozen times since April, said Maj. Mark Warren, who spent six months as a fellow at the Police Executive Research Forum in Washington studying stun-gun policies across the country.

In Harford County, Sheriff R. Thomas Golding has authorized deputies to use the devices for the past two years. Deputies take an eight-hour training course and are issued the devices along with their service weapons. The agency, which has about 130 patrol deputies, has 149 stun guns in use, and 32 more have been ordered.

Reports on 12 incidents that were provided to The Sun showed that the stun guns were used primarily in domestic situations, two of which did not result in arrests. The most recent incident in which a stun gun was used occurred during the drunken-driving arrest of a 38-year-old woman who had driven her car into a utility pole and fought four deputies as they tried to arrest her.

In another incident, Columbus Mosby, 51, of Edgewood said he could feel the electricity coursing through him when deputies used a stun gun on him in August. He had questioned why his 15-year-old was in handcuffs after receiving a littering citation. Mosby was arrested after he ignored an officer's command to keep quiet.

The shock "lifted me to the tip of my toes, and my wife was telling me, 'Just lay down' -- I couldn't even lay down on the ground," Mosby said. He was shocked again when he didn't lie down, and he said the stun gun left a small scar on his back where the darts landed.

When shocked with the devices, suspects lose control of their muscles and collapse. The effects usually last long enough for an officer to put handcuffs on a suspect, although some recover quickly and could continue to resist. The Taser X26 model, which Harford deputies use, shoots barbed darts attached to wires that pass electricity into a person's body.

Mosby disputes a report of the incident in which he was involved, which says he swung at an officer, and he adds that he was unarmed. "I don't understand it," he said. "I wasn't fighting them."

The agency's policy on when to use Tasers and stun devices does not describe the circumstances in which they should be used, saying only that they "may be utilized as an alternative to lethal force and shall be maintained consistent with the manufacturer's training and recommendations."

When a stun gun is used, the deputy must fill out a use-of-force report, which is reviewed by a six-member committee.

Golding said the devices have helped deputies avert dangerous situations many times.

"We've heard a lot of stories where, when the deputy pulls that out and [aims it at] the individual, they become compliant," Golding said. "When you have that, it's served its purpose."

A research arm of the Justice Department is conducting a two-year study of cases in which a suspect died after being subdued with a stun gun. The National Institute of Justice said there have been more than 180 deaths in the past 10 years, with most occurring since 2000.

The Police Executive Research Forum studied 96 stun gun-related deaths between 1999 and 2005. In four out of five cases, the person had taken some type of drug, which might have contributed to the deaths.

"We think they're very good when used properly," said Joshua Ederheimer, director of the forum's Center on Force and Accountability. "They appear to have a minimal effect in the overwhelming majority of uses."

Despite his work researching and developing guidelines with the research forum, Warren, the major with the Baltimore County Police Department, said his agency wants to continue to study how stun guns are used by its officers before issuing them.

"We're hoping we can gain a full understanding of the practical positives and negatives," Warren said. "It's easy to say on paper how others do it and what we expect, but you need to determine the impact on your particular department or community. A trial program will help us deal with those issues."

ANTITRUST:

Business May Face Democrats' Scrutiny (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

Democrats are expected to turn a harsher light on business. A call for a delay in an FCC vote on a big merger might be the start.

WASHINGTON - John Dingell, the incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Wednesday that he wants the Federal Communications Commission to delay its vote on the AT&T Inc. acquisition of BellSouth Corp.

Dingell, saying the combination raises a "significant antitrust question," sent a letter to the FCC asking that it hold off on the vote until after the new Congress convenes in January. The agency has delayed a vote on the merger three times.

Dingell's request might be an opening shot in the House Democrats' new oversight of big business. California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who is in line to become speaker, has promised to fight early on in the next Congress to lower the price of prescription drugs available through Medicare. Efforts to curb military spending are also likely, political and financial analysts said, after an election whose outcome was influenced in large part by voters' dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq.

But with the two parties stalemated in the Senate, where it usually takes 60 votes to pass major legislation, the pharmaceutical and defense industries might find themselves beset more by unwelcome rhetoric in Congress than any changes in law.

Few substantial changes in corporate America are expected to result from Democratic-led initiatives during the next two years -- with the exception of a proposed increase in the minimum wage that might get substantial Republican support.

The long-term outlook for the biotechnology and homeland security businesses might benefit, analysts said, from anticipated Democratic efforts to promote stem-cell research and inspect more cargo containers at ports. And the alternative energy sector could also get a boost.

But heightened scrutiny of other sectors, ranging from drugs to defense to hedge funds, could darken their prospects on Wall Street.

Yet despite the Democrats' victories, the Dow Jones industrials rose 19.77, or 0.16 percent, to 12,176.54. The blue chips closed above the intraday record of 12,167.02 set on Oct. 26. The Standard & Poor's 500 index was up 2.88, or 0.21 percent, at 1,385.72, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 9.06, or 0.38 percent, to 2,384.94.

Liz Claiborne To Buy Kate Spade For $124M (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Liz Claiborne Inc., moving to expand its reach into luxury department stores, Wednesday said it agreed to acquire privately held Kate Spade LLC, a maker of high-end fashion accessories, for $124 million (â,¬97 million) in cash.

The deal, expected to close late this year, includes an undisclosed amount of assumed debt.

New York-based Kate Spade, which makes the kate spade and Jack Spade brands, had net sales of about $84 million (â,¬65.75 million) for the year ended July 30. Its product line includes handbags, small leather goods, accessories, luggage and baby products.

Kate Spade sells in U.S. department stores, including Neiman Marcus, Saks Fifth Avenue, Nordstrom, and Bloomingdale's, as well as 19 Kate Spade stores, four Kate Spade outlets and one Jack Spade store.

Kate Spade also has distributors in Asia and licensing agreements for shoes, eyewear, tabletop and paper products.

Despite having more than $5 billion (â,¬3.9 billion) in annual sales and more than 40 brands in its stable, Liz Claiborne, also based in New York, so far has been a limited player in handbags and accessories. Its brands include Ellen Tracy, Dana Buchman, Lucky Brand, and Juicy Couture.

Neiman Marcus Group Inc., which owned a majority stake in Kate Spade, put the company on the market in September 2005.

In morning trading, shares of Liz Claiborne edged up 7 cents to $42.12 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Spanish Utility Approaches Scottish Power For Deal (WSJ)

By Jason Singer In London And Keith Johnson In Madrid

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

The latest effort by a European energy giant to strike a major deal -- Iberdrola SA's preliminary approach to Scottish Power PLC -- signals that utilities believe they need to be larger to survive in a future dominated by the search for newer and cleaner ways of producing energy.

Iberdrola of Spain made an approach to Scottish Power, which has a market value of £10.9 billion ($20.8 billion), as a prelude to a possible offer, according to people close to the situation. Scottish Power said in a statement that its board "has received an approach which may or may not lead to an offer being made." It added that the board would study any offer at the appropriate time.

An Iberdrola spokesman said the company "has not presented any offer." At 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, Scottish Power's American depositary receipts were up 14% to $58.37.

A potential deal would mark the latest in a series of deals and attempted acquisitions involving some of Europe's biggest electricity producers in Spain, France, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom. The consolidation comes as European companies from several industries have been linking up across national boundaries. The willingness of banks to finance big deals and the end of a long period of restructuring at many companies have made the current wave of mergers and acquisitions among the busiest Europe has seen.

The fit with Scottish Power, which has a dozen onshore wind farms in the U.K., could be good for Iberdrola, which has significant interests in hydro and wind power, at a time when utilities are scrambling to meet stringent European emissions regulations and environmental targets. Renewable energies, which enjoy price supports in nearly every European country, also offer better-than-average returns for power companies. Scotland is one of Europe's windiest locales, and Scottish Power's modest wind-farm development would leave scope for Iberdrola to install bigger turbines as well as offshore wind farms, which offer greater economies of scale.

Another possible attraction for Iberdrola is the potential to be a part of a new generation of nuclear-power plants in the U.K. While Scottish Power has no nuclear profile, Iberdrola could use its U.K. base as a platform for expanding its nuclear operations. Iberdrola operates all or part of six nuclear plants in Spain.

Scottish Power's retail arm has more than 5.2 million U.K. customers. It also operates electricity generation, natural-gas storage facilities and energy-management activities in the U.K., U.S. and Canada. In the year ended March 31, it had profit of £1.54 billion on revenue of £5.45 billion. Scottish Power was the subject of takeover offers from E.On AG of Germany last year but rebuffed them.

Iberdrola could be seeking a defensive move to safeguard it from a hostile approach. Iberdrola was part of a failed bid by Gas Natural SDG SA in September 2005 for Endesa SA. In that deal, Iberdrola had agreed to purchase some of Endesa's power-generating assets that would have been hived off by Gas Natural if its bid was successful.

Spanish builder Actividades de Construccion y Servicios SA, which owns a 35% stake in Spanish utility Union Fenosa SA, acquired a 10% stake in Iberdrola late last month. Bankers and analysts said the sudden share-buying swoop was designed to facilitate the merger of Fenosa and Iberdrola and create a new national champion in electricity.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Judge Sends Hub Officer In Drug Case Back To Jail (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 9, 2006

Says he violated bail conditions

To be released on bail last month, Boston police Officer Carlos A. Pizarro agreed to extraordinarily strict conditions: a search of his home, no cellphone, no computer, house arrest, and only preapproved visitors.

His wife promised to alert the court if Pizarro violated any conditions.

Yesterday, a federal judge put Pizarro, 36, back behind bars after ruling that he had immediately broken the rules. Pizarro, one of three officers facing federal cocaine and heroin charges in one of the biggest corruption cases in the department's history, was ordered held without bail until the case is resolved.

US District Judge William G. Young found that Pizarro violated his bail conditions by agreeing to let the government search his Dorchester home for contraband before he was released, then quickly calling his wife to "change the situation in that house."

On Sept. 22, after Pizarro agreed to the search during a bail hearing, he telephoned his wife from the Barnstable County jail and warned her to toss certain items, including "little pink things" and "a brown little bottle."

Prosecutors allege that Pizarro, who knew jail calls are monitored, used code words to warn his wife to get rid of illegal drugs.

Pizarro told his wife, Michele Joyce , that she was "not all set" for the search and warned her to throw out "the little pink things," according to a transcript of the telephone call that was filed in federal court. Prosecutors allege Pizarro was talking about steroids.

He also made reference to a "hospital thing," which prosecutors allege was a syringe, and to "a brown little bottle," which the government believes meant injectable testosterone.

Pizarro's lawyers, however, disputed the government's contention that Pizarro was talking about illegal drugs. They say he was talking about sex-enhancing drugs, including Viagra, and other prescription drugs during the call. At one point, he told his wife to save something he'd left in his top dresser drawer because he'd need it when he came home.

"It would be pure speculation to try to figure out from the transcript what he was talking about, and there's certainly no evidence of contraband," said Jeffrey Denner , one of Pizarro's lawyers.

Denner said Pizarro had also warned his wife during the call that he had lawfully-owned guns in the house, which she should turn over to the police. Denner said a transcript of that portion of the call wasn't filed with the court.

Prosecutors suggested that the judge ask Pizarro's wife about what she had allegedly removed from the home.

Young apparently decided he had heard enough and opted not to question her.

Young said he had warned Pizarro before releasing him on bail Oct. 11 that "I would police the bail restrictions strictly."

He ordered Pizarro, who was seated in the courtroom, taken into custody immediately, saying that while prosecutors and defense lawyers may argue over what Pizarro was talking about during the recorded call, it was undisputed that the officer "called his wife to dispose of something."

Pizarro, a 10-year department veteran, was arrested July 20 in Miami on charges that he and two other officers, Roberto Pulido and Nelson Carrasquillo , protected 100 kilograms of cocaine while it was being trucked to Boston in June by undercover FBI agents posing as drug dealers. Pulido, 41, a 10-year veteran of the force, and Carrasquillo, a seven-year veteran, are also charged with protecting an earlier shipment of 40 kilograms of cocaine.

Carrasquillo is free on bail. Pulido, the alleged ringleader of the group, has been ordered jailed without bail pending trial.

An FBI affidavit filed in the case alleges that Pulido was involved in a wide array of crimes, including identity theft, steroid trafficking, and protecting illegal after-hours parties where uniformed officers mingled with drug dealers and prostitutes.

Judge Tosses Cop Back In Jail For Call About Hard Evidence (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, November 9, 2006

The dirty laundry of an alleged dirty cop spilled out in federal court yesterday when Boston patrolman Carlos Pizarro raised sexual impairment as his defense for a damning call to his wife.

A furious U.S. District Court Judge William G. Young yesterday yanked Pizarro's house-arrest privileges and sent him back to the slammer after learning Pizarro was recorded on a prison phone allegedly instructing his wife, Michele Joyce, to destroy criminal evidence in their Dorchester home.

The 20-minute call was placed on Sept. 22 from the Barnstable House of Correction just three hours after Pizarro - who was busted by the FBI in July with fellow officers Roberto Pulido and Nelson Carrasquillo - learned authorities would search his home prior to his Oct. 11 pre-trial release.

"He called his wife and told her to dispose of something," Young said. "One can draw inferences from those undisputed facts."

But Pizarro's lawyer, Jeffrey Denner, argued the disgraced officer knew he was being recorded and, when speaking in code to Joyce, was referring to natural and doctor-prescribed remedies for "sexual issues" he was embarrassed about.

"He did not want to bring it up over the telephone," said Denner, who declined to explain those "issues" to the Herald.

Prosecutors, according to court documents, believe Pizarro and Joyce were actually discussing getting rid of steroids and testosterone shots.

Pizarro directs Joyce to a "rack of clothes," "little pink things" and the "top drawer in my dresser," according to a transcript of the conversation.

"Did you throw them out?" he asks her at one point.

"No," Joyce answers.

"Those are, save 'em, because I'm gonna nail someone and be home with you," Pizarro said in what prosecutors suspect is a nod to Viagra.

Joyce laughs. "Oh, that's good," she said. "No, hopefully you won't have a hard time. My God, at least once anyways!"

Joyce wept uncontrollably after her husband was remanded back into custody.

Pizarro, Pulido and Carrasquillo are alleged to have hired themselves out as muscle for cocaine shipments and to have hosted orgies with hookers, among other betrayals of their badges.

Operation 'Burn Down' Leads To Charges Against 17 (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

Chicago police and the FBI arrested and charged 17 people in a Wests Side gang roundup Wednesday.

Following an investigation by the Joint Task Force on Gangs, FBI special agents and Police narcotics investigators arrested 11 suspected members and associates of the Satan Disciples, according to an FBI release.

After over two years of investigation, Operation "Burn Down" led to charges against 17 suspects including four who were already in local custody on unrelated charges. "Burn Down," which began in September 2004, included undercover operations to purchase drugs and court-authorized electronic surveillance of phones used by one or more of the defendants, the release said.

The suspects were charged in criminal complaints filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court in Chicago with numerous felony counts of conspiracy and possession of a controlled substance with intent to distribute, the release said.

Of the 17 charged, 15 were arrested, including suspects ranging in age from 19 to 45. Charges were also filed against two suspects, now the subject of a nationwide manhunt -- Charles Spauding, aka "Wedo," 25; and Celeste Melendez, 20, both with a last know address of 1718 W. 33rd Pl. in Chicago, the release said.

Among those arrested were the defacto head of the Chicago chapter of the Satan Disciples, Kenneth Gayton, the release said. He is accused of overseeing an operation that controlled distribution of both powder and crack cocaine in and around the Southwest Side, primarily in the vicinity of 18th Street and California Avenue, and 42nd Street and Campbell, the release said.

One of the city's oldest street gangs, the Satan Disciples were formed in the 1960's, with widespread presence in Chicago, northwest Indiana and southern Wisconsin and factions in Texas, Oklahoma and Florida.

All of the suspects in custody are being held at the Metropolitan Correctional Center until scheduled appearance before Magistrate Judge Michael Mason in U.S. District Court on Thursday.

If convicted of the charges, those in custody face a possible life sentence in prison.

Anti-gang Sweep Snares 19 On Drug, Weapons Charges (COLDISP)

By Kevin Kidder

Columbus Dispatch, November 9, 2006

Multi-agency force fans out in search for 63 suspects

Nineteen suspected gang members from across Columbus were arrested yesterday, as police conducted a methodical sweep as part of the mayor's anti-gang initiative, officials announced.

They were some of the 63 suspects that police, the DEA, the U.S. marshal's office and parole officers were searching for last night, said Columbus police Sgt. Chantay Boxill.

Those arrested yesterday were mainly wanted for drug or weapons charges and had been identified by police as members of gangs that did business on the South Side, though they live all over the Columbus area, she said.

All those arrested were in the Franklin County jail at Jackson Pike last night, she said.

Mayor Michael B. Coleman joined police for several hours yesterday as they rounded up the suspects.

"This is an ongoing effort," Coleman said. "It's the worst of the worst, or some of the worst of the worst."

Coleman had been hoping that one particular gang member — whom he wouldn't name — would be arrested. "I describe him as an animal," he said. That man wasn't in custody as of late last night.

"The message is, we will not accept gang violence in the city of Columbus. I can't tolerate this," the mayor said.

Police hoped for more arrests last night and the sweep likely is to continue through this weekend, Boxill said.

The anti-gang initiative was inaugurated by Coleman in 2005 to combat gang-related violence. Scores of gang members have been arrested since then.

It features a three-pronged approach: Police crack down on crime in the targeted neighborhood, other city agencies descend on the neighborhood to clean it up and social-service agencies work to help youths find alternatives to gangs, Coleman has said.

Trial For Newport Alderman Gets Underway (NEWPIND)

By Melissa Lore, Independent Reporter

Newport Independent, November 9, 2006

"Now, the rest of the story," Newport Alderman Pinky McFarlin's attorney said Monday afternoon, quoting Paul Harvey, to begin his opening statements. McFarlin's trial began Monday after jury selection was completed.

Prosecutor Anne Gardner's opening statements explained that McFarlin is charged with selling Xanax and crack cocaine on 20 different dates to an informant from May through November of 2004. Evidence expected to be introduced will include tape recordings of conversations held between the informant and the defendant in the defendant's home.

Gardner told the jury that they would hear several drug terms and conversations in which McFarlin would say "bringing the game to town," referring to bringing drugs to Newport. She said that there would be conversations in which McFarlin would educate the informant about how to hide crack cocaine and when not to take money because it could be "federali money."

Witnesses expected to testify against McFarlin will include an expert witness for the DEA, who took the stand Monday afternoon to explain the procedure for the use of an informant; a Fred's pharmacist; a bondswoman; and Lucas Hardaway, McFarlin's nephew.

McFarlin's attorney, Melvin Thompson, told the jury that the defendant was enticed by the drug task force. He continued by giving a brief history of McFarlin's life and various injuries he has sustained by working that require him to regularly use pain killers Lortab and Lorcet, prescribed by doctors, adding that, after the birth of his daughter, McFarlin realized he was addicted to the drugs and admitted himself into a drug rehab program for three or four months, which resulted in his staying clean and sober for three or four years.

"It was fairly common knowledge he was addicted," Thompson said, offering that others in the community knew that McFarlin was in pain and would offer their own pain medication to help him get relief.

The attorney continued the scenario by explaining McFarlin's relationship with the informant, Debra Johnson, who came to him for legal help and discovered that he was using pain killers on a regular basis and wanted to swap the hydrocodones she had for a neck injury.

DOJ_NMG_0092273

Thompson finished his statements by telling the jury that the DTF knew Johnson was selling drugs to McFarlin. "The government played on his addiction."

Missoula County Approves Marijuana Initiative (MIS)

By Tristan Scott

Missoulian, November 8, 2006

A ballot measure recommending Missoula County law enforcement officials make adult marijuana offenses their lowest priority passed Tuesday night.

The measure, dubbed Initiative 2, won the support of 22,502 Missoula voters, or 53 percent. Opponents of the initiative totaled 19,565, or 46 percent, and included some of Missoula County's top law enforcement officials.

The initiative will make marijuana crimes the single lowest priority for Missoula County authorities, but won't include marijuana sales or drug use by minors as low-priority offenses.

In no way will Tuesday's passage of Initiative 2 legalize the drug, according to Angela Goodhope, a spokeswoman with Citizens for Responsible Crime Policy, the group that proposed the measure and landed it on the ballot.

Proponents of the initiative, sponsored by Citizens for Responsible Crime Policy, say Initiative 2 strives to place increased emphasis on crimes that threaten people's lives and property and on other, more pressing drug issues. The proposal calls for a Community Oversight Committee that would consist of community members, criminal defense attorneys and a drug rehabilitation counselor who would investigate marijuana arrests and produce a report on the initiative's effects seven months after its passage.

"We are very pleased that Missoula voters approved a clearer, safer and smarter crime policy," Goodhope said.

Police Chief Rusty Wickman and Sheriff Mike McMeekin have publicly voiced their concern about the initiative, saying they worry federal dollars could be yanked from Missoula's drug enforcement programs in retaliation to the measure.

Goodhope said all evidence suggested the contrary, pointing to Seattle's passage of a similar measure several years ago as evidence.

In Missoula, like Seattle, the measure strives to place increased emphasis on crimes that threaten people's lives and property and on other, more pressing drug issues.

"None of the negative outcomes our opponents predicted will come true," Goodhope said. "We know

Missoula OKs Initiative Relaxing Enforcement Of Marijuana Laws (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

MISSOULA (AP) — An initiative that makes enforcing marijuana offenses against adults the lowest priority for Missoula County law enforcement passed Tuesday night.

Initiative 2 won the support of 22,502 Missoula voters, or 53 percent. Opponents totaled 19,565, or 46 percent, and included some of the county's top law enforcement officials.

The measure leans on local law enforcement to make ''citations, arrests, property seizures and prosecutions for adult marijuana offenses Missoula County's lowest law enforcement priority.''

It does not include marijuana sales or drug use by minors as low-priority offenses. And in no way will it legalize the drug, said Angela Goodhope, a spokeswoman for Citizens for Responsible Crime Policy, the group that proposed the measure and landed it on the ballot.

Proponents say Initiative 2 strives to place increased emphasis on crimes that threaten people's lives and property and on other, more pressing drug issues.

''We are very pleased that Missoula voters approved a clearer, safer and smarter crime policy,'' Goodhope said.

The proposal calls for a Community Oversight Committee — consisting of community members, criminal defense attorneys and a drug rehabilitation counselor — to investigate marijuana arrests and produce a report on the initiative's effects seven months after its passage

Police Chief Rusty Wickman and Sheriff Mike McMeekin have publicly voiced their concern about the initiative, saying they worry the measure's passage could lead to the loss of federal dollars from Missoula's drug enforcement programs.

Goodhope said all evidence points to the contrary, citing a similar measure that passed in Seattle several years ago.

''None of the negative outcomes our opponents predicted will come true,'' Goodhope said. ''We know that for a fact.''

Voters Take On Pot, Sick Pay, Minimum Wage And Healthcare (LAT)

By Lee Romney And Steve Chawkins , Times Staff Writers, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092274

Voters on Tuesday weighed in on a vast array of local issues, with three cities leaning toward relaxed marijuana enforcement and San Francisco on the verge of becoming the first U.S. city to require all employers — regardless of size — to provide paid sick leave.

In San Francisco and Berkeley, voters were voicing their disapproval of the current administration in measures calling for the impeachment of President George W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney on grounds including warrantless spying and what were presented as other wartime civil rights violations.

In returns from Santa Monica, Santa Barbara and Santa Cruz, voters were siding with proposals requiring local police to make marijuana arrests their lowest priority. Financed largely by Ohio insurance magnate Peter Lewis, the measures were opposed by many police officers, who described the issues as unnecessary and a possible obstacle to investigating major crimes.

"I think voters here have sent a really clear message — that the war on drugs has failed and it's time for a new approach," said Lara Cassell, an organizer of the effort in Santa Barbara.

In San Francisco and Santa Cruz, worker advocates pushed measures that alarmed small business owners. The San Francisco sick leave measure — which would apply even to part-time and temporary help — was placed on the ballot on the last possible day by four county supervisors and is backed by the group Young Workers United. As the evening wore on, the measure appeared to be headed for victory, to the chagrin of some business groups.

"For this to end up on the ballot, let alone passing without any public comment, without any discussion, is more than unfortunate. It's outrageous," said San Francisco Chamber of Commerce President Steve Falk. "This amounts to a 3.5% increase in costs for all businesses that don't provide sick days now, without any discussion of alternatives."

Voters in Santa Cruz, meanwhile, seemed doubtful about a citywide boost in the minimum wage, to $9.25, with automatic yearly increases. San Francisco, Santa Fe, N.M., and Washington, D.C., have similar citywide minimums, and proponent Nora Hochman said Santa Cruz needs one because it has "Burger King wage levels" with some of the steepest housing and gas prices in the country.

"My nickname is Nora 'You're ruining Santa Cruz' Hochman," she said. "The perception is business is going to fail wholesale. Well, that hasn't happened in any other community, and it's not going to happen here."

Also in Santa Cruz, voters were picking sides in a nasty town versus gown dispute, with the city seeking to curtail campus growth. On Tuesday, they appeared to heavily favor a measure barring the city from providing services to UC Santa Cruz until the university agrees to offset environmental strains.

Development measures in San Luis Obispo and Santa Clara counties also were bitterly debated before Tuesday's election. In San Luis Obispo County, voters were on the way to approving a long-debated shopping center that was designed to placate environmentalists with a butterfly preserve, an organic farm and more.

In Santa Clara County, a measure that would restrict development on ranchland and open hillsides was trailing late in the evening. Proponents called it a key to smart-growth policies, while opponents saw it as an attack on private property rights.

In several areas across the state, rural hospitals captured the attention of voters.

Nowhere was the situation as stark as in Trinity County, where officials had said that if two tax measures failed, they would be forced to begin shutting down the public hospital Wednesday.

That would have left no emergency room in the remote county, hours from the nearest hospital. On Tuesday night, the measures were approved by a wide margin.

"It's a huge thing for the community," said County Administrator Larry Layton, who said layoff notices had already been drafted. "They got what they need to keep the hospital in continuous operation."

In Mendocino County, voters were asked to choose between the recently deceased longtime incumbent, Norm Vroman, and his challenger, attorney Meredith Lintott. If Vroman wins, the Board of Supervisors will appoint a successor. Meanwhile, the acting district attorney has gone to court seeking a special election.

No matter the outcome, the 1st District Court of Appeal has ordered the results sealed, for now.

Many Local Measures Approved (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Martha Groves, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

Santa Monica residents vote for clean beaches, clean government. Pasadenans opt to strengthen campaign finance reforms.

Voters in several Los Angeles County cities approved a slew of local ballot measures in Tuesday's election, addressing issues ranging from political reform and street parking to preserving open space and clean beaches.

Nearly a dozen municipalities put a total of 18 measures on local ballots.

Claremont voters approved Measure S, a $12.5-million bond measure to purchase and preserve a 183-acre parcel of open space that has long been a favorite of hikers and nature lovers in eastern Los Angeles County.

Residents had rejected an earlier attempt by city officials to pass a special assessment to buy the land, known as Johnson's Pasture. On Tuesday, the bond measure, backed by the mayor and three City Council members, passed with 70% of the vote.

To the west, Pasadena voters approved clarifications to a 2001 City Charter reform intended to tighten campaign contributions. Measure B, which passed on a 61% to 39% vote, would ban those bidding for city contracts worth more than $25,000 from making political contributions and give county prosecutors power to call witnesses and bring charges in political corruption cases.

More important, the vote settles a bitter legal fight led by the Pasadena City Council, which argued that political reforms passed in 2001 were unclear and overly burdensome.

Those casting ballots in Pasadena were far less kind to Measure A, which proposed allowing the National Football League to renovate the landmark Rose Bowl for use by a pro football team. Voters threw the measure for a big loss, defeating it 72% to 28%.

In Santa Monica, voters defeated an effort to alter one of the nation's toughest clean-government laws, which bans politicians from taking campaign cash or employment from anyone doing business with the city.

With all of the votes counted, 53% of the city's voters rejected Proposition W, which the City Council had backed. The measure would have overturned the Oaks Amendment, passed in 2000.

"At the end of a very long ballot, the public rejected undue influence by developers and other special interests in local government," said Carmen Balber of Election Watchdog, a political action committee sponsored by the Campaign for Consumer Rights.

An overwhelming majority — 71% — voted for Proposition U, which gives the Santa Monica city manager the power to hire and fire city department heads without having to get approval from boards and commissions. In doing so, Santa Monica followed such cities as Beverly Hills, Burbank, Culver City and Long Beach, which have exempted department heads from Civil Service employment rules in an effort to make government more responsive.

Two-thirds of voters favored Proposition V, which would levy a parcel tax for cleaning up heavily polluted beaches and Santa Monica Bay.

And a resounding 65% of voters approved Proposition Y, which would make the personal use of marijuana by adults on private property the city's lowest police enforcement priority. Santa Monicans for Sensible Marijuana Policy had said the measure would send a message to Sacramento and Washington that voters want more common-sense marijuana laws.

Inglewood residents turned away a proposed 0.5% increase in the city sales tax to raise money for police and emergency services.

Lakewood voters overwhelmingly approved two measures to keep their streets clear by making it illegal to park a recreational vehicle or trailer on a public street without a permit.

And in Westlake Village, 55% of voters rejected a measure to amend the city's general plan to develop 22 acres of private land into a retail complex anchored by a home improvement store.

Voters Not High On Pot Amendment (GJS)

Grand Junction Sentinel, November 8, 2006

Colorado voters have pitched Amendment 44 aside like an assortment of stems and seeds found at the bottom of an empty bag of weed.

Tuesday's election results showed that the amendment failed by a wide margin statewide. Across Colorado 688,987 or 60.7 percent voted against the amendment, compared to 445,280 votes or 39.3 percent, in favor.

In Mesa County, voters turned the amendment down by an even greater margin. Results were 31,637 votes or 68.2 percent against Amendment 44 and 14,240 or 30.7 percent in favor.

The amendment would have decriminalized possession of less than one ounce of marijuana by adults over the age of 21. Currently state law makes possession of an ounce or less of pot a class 2 petty offense punishable by a fine of up to $100.

Though David Cox of Palisade and Rex Newkirk of Grand Junction are among the minority of voters in this year's election, they say they will continue breaking the law partaking of the green herb where and when they choose.

For them the amendment was never about personal use, it was about reforming a system.

"The idea of this wasn't to change our personal lives, but to dismantle a criminal infrastructure by moving toward regulation," said Cox, a member of SAFER Colorado, the organization that got Amendment 44 onto this year's ballot.

"I never expected it to pass the first time," he said. "Everyone who was working on this was hoping it would pass, but anyone who is realistic knew it wouldn't."

Cox, 25, says he has been smoking pot for the last seven years. But it wasn't always that way.

"My mom caught me trying to smoke marijuana when I was 12," said Cox, who works on his father's peach farm in Palisade. "And she put a stop to it."

It wasn't until six years later that he got high.

"It was the most terrifying experience I ever had," Cox said. "I could tell that this substance was a strong step away from reality."

Then, sometime before graduating from the University of Colorado at Boulder with a bachelor's degree in electrical engineering, he got stoned again.

"We had a fantastic time, a phenomenal time," he said.

Now Cox, will smoke up to four times in a week, but never to excess, he said.

"I got too many dreams. I got too many other things to do with my life then get high all day," Cox said.

Newkirk, 51, is the owner of a tower painting company, ABC Tower Services, said he has been smoking since the eighth grade. "Marijuana is not a drug; it's an herb, a plant," Newkirk said shortly before torching a bowl of weed at Lincoln Park.

He got his start smoking marijuana when he and a friend scored some bud and smoked it off the top of an empty can of chewing tobacco, he said. Newkirk says these days an ounce of weed, which costs him $25, will last a week or two. Nearly everyone he knows smokes marijuana.

"At least 85 percent of them smoke marijuana," Newkirk said. "I meet very few people who don't smoke marijuana."

But there are people who begin smoking and find the smoke too thick to handle. Those are the people Carol Mulligan, co-owner of Inner Journey Counseling in Grand Junction, sees daily. She said the use of marijuana pulls people into social circles they might not otherwise be involved with, because in order to buy marijuana, you have to visit a criminal.

"It could be putting you into that lifestyle," she said. "It could be the start of experimenting with other drugs and into another lifestyle."

But that is why people like Cox and Newkirk say it is time to legalize marijuana.

Decriminalizing marijuana and making it available to purchase legally could break up existing social circles. It could eliminate the "us vs. them" feeling experienced by those who regularly break the law to buy and smoke marijuana, Cox and Newkirk said.

"I like policemen; I fear bad laws," Newkirk said. "This is all about liberty."

Voters Decide On Ballot Initiatives, Proposals On Social Issues (WINS)

WINS Radio, November 8, 2006

NEW YORK (1010 WINS) -- The House, Senate and Gubernatorial races were not the only choices facing voters Tuesday.

A score of initiatives, proposals and amendments appeared on ballots in 37 states, including gay marriage bans, gay marriage definitions, marijuana legalization and animal rights.

South Dakota voters Tuesday rejected a sweeping abortion ban that would outlaw the procedure under almost any circumstances, effectively blocking a challenge to Roe v. Wade.

Earlier this year the state legislature in South Dakota voted to pass a similar measure, which would ban abortion even of pregnancies resulting from incest or rape, except if the mother's life was at stake, but opponents of the ban pushed to allow South Dakotans to decide the measure at the voting booth instead. The measure was struck down 56 percent to 44 percent. It would have been the toughest abortion law in the nation, allowing the procedure only to save a pregnant woman's life.

In Arizona alone, voters were met with 19 separate measures, more than any other state.

Arizona voted against gestation crates for pigs and sheep, which some say are too small for pregnant animals to turn around. Michigan voted to ban any hunt of the state's "bird of peace," the mourning dove.

Michigan residents also voted to bar affirmative action with respect to employment in public institutions such as education.

Arizona voters approved four proposals that arose out of frustration over the influx of illegal immigrants: one measure makes English the state's official language, while another expands the list of government benefits denied to illegal immigrants.

Voters weren't keen about another, more quirky Arizona measure: They defeated a proposal that would have awarded $1 million to a randomly selected voter in each general election.

Arizona also bucked a strong national trend by refusing to change its constitution to define marriage as a one-man, one-woman institution. The measure also would have forbidden civil unions and domestic partnerships.

A total of eight states voted on amendments to ban gay marriage: Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin approved them. Similar amendments have passed previously in all 20 states to consider them.

In Colorado specifically, voters supported the definition of marriage into the state's constitution by a wide margin. Many votes from Colorado counties have yet to be counted, but according to the Denver Post so far Wednesday many suburban Colorado areas outside Denver opposed giving same-sex couples the same rights as heterosexual married couples, like legal rights for inheritance and medical purposes. Denver itself has yet to be counted.

The wage hikes passed in Arizona, Colorado. Missouri, Montana, Ohio and Nevada.

Minimum wage increase proposals varied. In Ohio the increase would raise the minimum wage of $5.15 an hour to $6.85 an hour, with an annual cost of living increase.

Nevada decided Tuesday they didn't want legalized marijuana sold at state-sanctioned pot shops and approved constitutional amendments raising Nevada's minimum wage and curbing government seizures of private property.

The question to legalize adult possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana and require the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale failed 58 percent to 42 percent.

The setting of Nevada's minimum wage at $1 above the federal standard was given final approval. It previously had been well-received by Nevandans in 2004.

Nevadans also appeared to favor the more restrictive of measures to limit exposure to secondhand smoke.

The questions on secondhand smoke both sought to restrict smoking in public places, but to varying degrees. With about half the votes tallied, the lesser of the two options was narrowly failing, while more restrictive, which imposes tougher limits on secondhand smoke, was passing.

A question on the Nevada ballot requiring lawmakers to fund education before other state budgets, also was favored in partial returns.

The Missouri stem cell measure passed by a narrow margin. It had become a key factor in the state's crucial Senate race, won by Democratic challenger Claire McCaskill, who supported it, over incumbent Republican Jim Talent, who opposed it.

In Ohio and Arizona, anti-smoking activists won showdowns with R.J. Reynolds Tobacco company. Voters in each state approved a tough ban on smoking in public places and rejected rival, Reynolds-backed measures that would have exempted bars. Voters in Arizona and South Dakota approved increases in tobacco taxes, while similar proposals were voted down in Missouri and California.

Colorado voters joined Nevada in rejecting measures that would have legalized possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by anyone 21 and older. South Dakotans voted down a proposal that would have allowed marijuana use for some medical purposes. A winning measure in Rhode Island will restore voting rights to felons on probation and parole.

Elsewhere, land use was a hot issue, part of a backlash against a 2005 Supreme Court ruling allowing the city of New London, Conn., to buy up homes to make way for a private commercial development.

The concept of "eminent domain" was prevalent on ballots in Florida, Georgia, Arizona, California, South Carolina, Oregon, Arizona, North Dakota, Michigan and New Hampshire. Voters approved measures in all these states to restrict the government's power to use eminent domain to seize privately owned land for other private development.

California rejected the restriction on eminent domain. Arizona's winning measure went beyond the others, requiring state and local authorities to compensate property owners if land-use regulations lowered the value of their property: Idaho rejected a similar measure.

South Dakota voters defeated a measure that would have made their state the first to strip immunity from judges, exposing them to the possibility of lawsuits. In Maine, Nebraska and Oregon, voters defeated measures that would cap increases in state spending.

Pennsylvania voters gave the state the go-ahead to borrow $20 million so that nearly 33,000 veterans in the state who participated in the Persian Gulf War could collect one-time payments up to $525.

In Alaska, voters rejected a proposal to tax North Slope oil companies $1 billion a year until a natural gas pipeline is built. The tax would have been levied against the leaseholders of the North Slope's 35 trillion cubic feet of natural gas reserves until the gas starts flowing to market. Opponents of the measure said the tax would have killed the $25 billion pipeline project; proponents said it was the only way to force oil companies to commit to building a pipeline.

Nevadans: Say No To Pot, Raise Minimum Wage, Restrict Smoking (AP)

AP, November 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092278

RENO, Nev. (AP) - Nevadans on Tuesday rejected selling legalized marijuana at state-sanctioned pot shops, approved the tougher of two competing anti-smoking measures, raised the minimum wage and took steps to curb government seizures of private property.

At the same time, voters denied a measure twice approved by the Legislature to pay lawmakers for every day they work, instead of capping salaries at the current 60-day limit.

Question 7, to legalize adult possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana and require the state to set up procedures to tax and regulate its sale failed, 56 percent to 44 percent.

The dueling anti-smoking initiatives had different outcomes.

Polls showed early support for both anti-smoking measures slipping as Election Day approached, and proponents acknowledged voters seemed confused by similar ballot language.

Question 4, a business-backed initiative called the Responsibly Protect Nevadans from Second-Hand Smoke Act, would have imposed minimal restrictions on smoking in areas of bars and restaurants that allow children. It failed 52 percent to 48 percent.

Instead voters approved the Clean Indoor Air Act backed by public health groups. It bans smoking in any bars that serve meals, as well as in slot machine sections of grocery and convenience stores, video arcades, shopping malls, school grounds and day-care centers. Question 5, which still permits smoking in gambling areas of casinos, was approved 54 percent to 46 percent.

Voters gave final approval to setting Nevada's minimum wage $1 above the federal standard, currently $5.15 an hour, with 69 percent voting yes and 31 percent voting no. The measure, which provides an exemption for employers to offer health insurance, passed by a similar margin in 2004.

It also includes automatic cost-of-living increases based on inflation, capped at 3 percent a year, unless the federal government raises its minimum wage - something that hasn't happened since 1997.

A measure placing restrictions on government use of eminent domain was approved 63 percent to 37 percent. It will appear again on the ballot in 2008.

Another constitutional amendment requiring lawmakers to fund education before other state budgets also received final voter approval, 55 percent to 45 percent.

Two other proposed constitutional amendments passed by the 2003 and 2005 legislatures were put to voters and rejected.

One allowing state lawmakers to call themselves into special session failed 52 percent to 48 percent. Another reducing the size of the Board of Regents and changing how they are selected was narrowly defeated, 51 percent to 49 percent.

Voters also overwhelming amended the state's sales tax to exempt farm machinery while expanding exemptions for the trade-in value of used vehicles. That measure passed 69 percent to 31 percent.

While other states and local governments have decriminalized possession of small amounts of marijuana, the Nevada measure sponsored by the Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana went further. It directed the state Department of Taxation to set up procedures to license and regulate pot growers, distributors and retailers.

Backers argued law enforcement spends too much time and money arresting small-time dope smokers, and that legalizing marijuana would not only raise tax dollars for the state, but free officers to concentrate on more violent crimes.

Critics - including law enforcement, civic groups and the nation's drug czar - countered that marijuana is a gateway drug that could lead to harsher substances and negate anti-drug efforts.

Regardless, they argued that possession, sale and cultivation would still be illegal under federal law and likely not be tolerated by federal authorities.

Voters Say No To Legalizing Marijuana, Yes To Hiking Minimum Wage And Eminent Domain (EN)

Ely News, November 8, 2006

Nevada voters were just saying no to legalizing marijuana, welcoming a hike in the state's minimum wage and keeping alive eminent domain reform, among other decisions on ballot initiatives on Tuesday's ballot.

With at least 1,620 of 1,913 precincts statewide reporting, Question 7, which would have allowed Nevada residents 21 years of age or older to possess an ounce of marijuana or less, was being rejected by 56 percent of voters. Only 44 percent were in support.

Las Vegas police Lt. Stan Olsen, who oversees legislative affairs for the department and who worked against Question 7, said the measure, the latest in a string of failed efforts to legalize the drug here, was pushed by outsiders rather than Nevadans.

"They were trying to use us as a social experiment, as lab rats. Voters are engaged. They're bright. This was a bad bill of goods, and they knew it," Olsen said. "The voters didn't want it. The community didn't want it. There's nothing good that can come out of legalizing marijuana."

Despite the apparent loss, backers of the measure were heartened by the turnout in favor of the measure.

"This will be the all-time biggest vote for ending marijuana prohibition in the history of this country," said Neal Levine, Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana campaign manager. "This is an enormous amount of progress. Unfortunately, we fell a little bit short."

Levine said his group would continue its efforts to win over Silver State voters and "it is a 100 percent certainty this will be back on the ballot" in 2008 or 2010.

Outside a Henderson polling place, Jim Taylor, a 50-year-old Henderson Republican, said he was strongly against Question 7.

"They want to legalize marijuana, but I think that's not a solution, it actually makes more of a problem," he said.

But 25-year-old Larry McKenzie, a Henderson voter who described himself as independent, said he wanted the measure to pass.

"They waste so much time arresting people who smoke weed when they could invest that cop time and jail space in worse crimes," McKenzie said. "I have friends who are potheads. They're not going to change, and they're not hurting anybody. My friends are very harmless."

Voters were backing Question 6, which would raise the minimum wage by $1 an hour, to $6.15, on Jan. 1. Those in favor of passage led those against, 69 percent to 31 percent.

Question 6 also would automatically tie future increases to changes in the consumer price index.

"People know you can't live off of the minimum wage, much less eat off the minimum wage," said Danny Thompson, executive secretary-treasurer of the Nevada AFL-CIO labor union, which supported the measure. "That's reflected in the (voting) numbers."

Thompson believes the increase is modest, and "is not going to destroy any businesses. It's not going to drive people out of Nevada."

Even though voters were supporting Question 2 by a 62 percent to 38 percent margin, the measure restricting how and when local and state governments can forcibly seize private land using eminent domain won't become law anytime soon.

The measure -- also known as the People's Initiative to Stop the Taking of Our Land, or PISTOL -- is a proposed constitutional amendment and, as such, must pass voter muster again in 2008 before it can take effect.

"The people know we need to have some kind of harness put on government to make sure there are not these technical ways to use eminent domain and take people's property," said Don Chairez, a PISTOL backer. "The people really feel we can't trust the politicians" to fix the problem.

Nonetheless, Clark County Commissioner Bruce Woodbury, who headed the PISTOL opposition and also chairs the Regional Transportation Commission, is urging the 2007 Legislature to enact its own eminent domain restrictions prior to the 2008 vote, in hopes of nixing the need for PISTOL.

Both Woodbury and Chairez said they are amenable to discussions on how to rewrite law to match PISTOL's intent while addressing governmental concerns that PISTOL would cripple public works projects. That doesn't mean Chairez is willing to sacrifice PISTOL, though.

"The bottom line is, we need PISTOL as a safety valve," Chairez said.

In other ballot questions Tuesday, voters were in support of Question 1, which would require the Legislature to fund public education before other state programs. The measure, which would go into effect in time for the 2007 Legislature, led with 55 percent of the vote, with 45 percent against.

Question 8, which would end sales taxes on the value of a trade-in when buying a vehicle at an auto dealership, was winning by a wide margin, 69 percent to 31 percent. It would also exempt farm equipment from sales tax.

Question 11, which would lift pay limits on legislators, was opposed by 70 percent of voters. Only 30 percent supported the idea of paying legislators for up to 120 days worked, rather than capping pay at the regular session's 60-day limit.

Voters were tightly split on Question 10, which would allow the Legislature to call itself into special session. It was being rejected by 52 percent of voters, with 48 percent behind it. Currently, only the governor can call a special session.

Question 9, which would shrink the size of the state's Board of Regents that oversees state colleges and allow the governor to appoint some of its members, also was closely contested, with 51 percent against and 49 percent in favor.

Lyon Says No To Stricter Smoking Laws, Legal Marijuana (RGJ)

Reno Gazette Journal, November 8, 2006

With Lyon's polls closed and votes tallied late Tuesday night, questions Nos. 4 and 5, regarding creation of stricter smoking bans in various public places were both voted down on the County level alongside Question No. 7 regarding legalization and regulation of one ounce or less of marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0092280

In Lyon, Question No. 4 was answered with 57.60% “no” (42.40% “yes”) while Question No. 5’s margin was slimmer with 51.23% “no” (48.77% “yes”). Question No. 7 stood at 59.01% “no” and 40.99% “yes”.

As of 11:20 p.m., with all but three counties reporting numbers and nearly all reporting at 100 percent, related questions on the state level were looking favorable for approval to Question No. 5 and close but not as favorable for No. 4. Also No. 7 was leaning toward “no” by nearly 10 percent

All Lyon precincts had reported in and votes counted near 11 p.m. with ballot questions in tow. Other Lyon-specific ballot questions and results are as follows:

-Question No. 14: Regarding authorization to issue general obligation school bonds to finance construction, improvement and equipping of school facilities; Yes (59.17%) No (40.83%)

-Question No. 15: Regarding the Lyon County Board of Commissioners adopting an ordinance to increase sales tax in Lyon one quarter of one percent; Yes (44.28%) No (55.72%)

-Question No. 16 regarding formation of a mosquito abatement general improvement district within Smith Valley; Yes (50.34%) No (49.66%)

Results for remaining ballot questions, as reported in Lyon County, are as follows:

-Question No. 1: Regarding the State Legislature funding public schools before any other item in the State budget; Yes (45.23%) No (54.77%)

-Question No. 2: Regarding property valuation in eminent domain cases; Yes (60.32%) No (39.68%)

-Question No. 6: Regarding increase of minimum wage; Yes (63.70%) No (36.30%)

-Question No. 8: Regarding exemption from tax on the value of used automobiles and farm equipment; Yes (68.52%) No (31.48%)

-Question No. 9: Regarding the election of certain members to the Board of Regents of the University of Nevada; Yes (44.20%) No (55.80%)

-Question No. 10: Regarding convening, limiting time and limiting matters for discussion with in a special session of the Legislature; Yes (43.58%) No (56.42%)

-Question No. 11: Regarding payment of compensation to members of the Nevada Legislature during regular and special sessions; Yes (24.53%) No (75.47%)

On the State Level, as of 11:20, trends were as follows:

-Question 1: Yes by nearly 10 percent

-Question 2: Yes

-Question 6: Yes

-Question 8: Yes

-Question 9: No by just more than 1 percent

-Question 10: No by just less than 5 percent

-Question 11: No

Voters Reject Eight Of Eleven Issues (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

SIOUX FALLS (AP) -- Whatever the reason -- too many issues, too long, too confusing -- South Dakota voters rejected eight of the 11 issues on Tuesday's general election ballot.

The one that attracted the most attention was the referral of the 2006 state law that would have banned all abortions. That law was rejected 55 percent to 45 percent.

Other measures that failed would have repealed video lottery, legalized medical marijuana, changed how property taxes are assessed, allowed people to sue judges, opened up legislative hearings, lowered the tax on cell phones, and required school to start after Aug. 31.

Ballot measures that passed Tuesday raise the tax on cigarettes, limit the use of state aircraft and change the state constitution to ban gay marriage.

The long ballot and controversy over some of the issues forced voters to do their homework.

Dale Baker, 77, a retired mechanic from Burke, said he prepared for the long ballot by studying a sample ballot and the attorney general's explanation of the measures before voting on Tuesday.

The same with Ron Kjellson, 70, of Watertown. He read newspaper stories about the long list of ballot measures before deciding how to vote.

"I made a little cheat sheet for myself and listed out everything I wanted to do," he said.

VIDEO LOTTERY

DOJ_NMG_0092281

For the fourth time since it began 17 years ago, South Dakota voters said they want to keep the state-sanctioned video lottery -- and the millions of dollars it raises.

This time, the measure passed 67 percent to 33 percent.

Video lottery supporters said dumping the games would cut $112 million a year from the state budget, creating a financial crisis for state government and jeopardizing state funding of schools.

Martha Berry, a 70-year-old retiree from Box Elder, said she voted to keep the games because they have benefited more than they have harmed. She said removing the funding source could have forced legislators to implement an income tax.

"Income tax wouldn't affect us, basically, but I see young couples that can't afford another tax," she said.

Berry said she thinks more of the proceeds should go to education.

SUING JUDGES

A constitutional amendment that opponents said would create chaos in the courthouses and halls of local government was soundly defeated.

A ballot issue that would have let people seek criminal charges or file lawsuits against judges and other government officials they believe have violated their rights failed 89 percent to 11 percent.

Supporters said it would apply only to judges. But opponents said it would include members of school boards, county commissions and city councils because those officials sometimes make decisions of a judicial nature.

Cathy Bultsma, 62, of Platte, said she voted against the amendment because she believes it would have provided too many opportunities for people unhappy with court decisions to make trouble.

GAY MARRIAGE

South Dakota's constitution will be getting new language that says only a marriage between a man and a woman is valid.

The amendment, which passed voters 52 percent to 48 percent, invalidates civil unions, domestic partnerships or other "quasi-marital" relationships in South Dakota.

A gay marriage ban already is in state law, but proponents of the amendment said putting it in the constitution makes it harder for judges to mess with it.

MEDICAL MARIJUANA

South Dakotans have rejected a proposed law that would have let some people smoke marijuana to provide relief from pain.

Supporters of the proposal wanted South Dakota to become the 12th state to allow some medical patients to smoke marijuana.

But it was defeated 52 percent to 48 percent.

Law officers said allowing medical marijuana would send a mixed message to children concerning drug use.

PROPERTY TAXES

A plan to change the way homes and other real estate are assessed for tax purposes was defeated Tuesday.

Opponents of Amendment D garnered 80 percent, while the plan received 20 percent support.

The plan would have used the sales price of each piece of real estate as its assessed value in the future.

State Sen. Bill Napoli of Rapid City, who promoted the amendment, had said the measure would prevent large increases in assessments that are caused when similar property is sold for inflated prices.

CELL PHONES

An attempt to repeal a 4 percent tax on the gross receipts of cellular telephone companies went begging Tuesday.

Opponents of the repeal outnumbered supporters 61 percent to 39 percent.

Verizon Wireless forced the public vote after losing a court challenge of the gross receipts tax.

The 2003 Legislature passed the tax to help balance South Dakota's budget, with the state getting 60 percent and counties 40 percent. Lawmakers at the time said it was fair because other kinds of phone companies already pay property taxes or a gross receipts tax.

Ron Kjellson said he voted against the proposal, partly because it was pushed by an out-of-state company. "I don't think they're being taxed unfairly," he said.

OTHERS

-- South Dakota schools will not be forced to wait until at least Aug. 31 to start classes. Voters defeated Initiated Measure 3 by a margin of 57 percent to 43 percent.

-- State-owned aircraft should be limited to official business, voters decided. Initiated Measure 5 passed 55 percent to 45 percent.

-- The state tax on cigarettes will nearly triple, thanks to approval of Initiated Measure 2. The tobacco tax increase had 61 percent support to 39 percent opposition. The state tax on cigarettes goes to $1.53 a pack.

-- A special commission's recommendations dealing with the Legislature was defeated 68 percent to 32 percent.

Liberal Activists Hail Referendum Votes On Abortion, Gays (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

Democratic social values prevailed in many state elections, as voters rejected pro-life measures on abortion, passed a measure supporting embryonic stem-cell research and, for the first time, defeated a measure to restrict marriage to one man-one woman unions.

"Women voters cleaned house. Women are fed up" with Iraq policy, the "so-called economic recovery" and the "relentless efforts to limit women's reproductive rights," the liberal National Organization for Women said.

"American voters sent a clear message yesterday that the era of gay-bashing to win elections is over, as voters flatly rejected anti-gay and divisive candidates," said Joe Solmonese, president of Human Rights Campaign, which spent $5 million on election-related activities.

The elections show "that supporting fairness for gay and lesbian families is not a liability, while aligning with the extreme Christian right is," said the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force (NGLTF), which is meeting this week with 2,000 homosexual rights activists in Kansas City, Mo., to review the elections and plan strategies.

Referring to the defeat of Arizona's Proposition 107, which would have defined marriage as only the union of one man and one woman, NGLTF leader Matt Foreman said the marriage issue "just doesn't have the juice it had just two years ago."

"People are getting sick of it," he said.

Tuesday wasn't a full sweep for liberal social issues -- measures to legalize marijuana failed in three states, a well-funded Colorado measure to create a domestic-partner system didn't survive and seven state marriage amendments passed.

Still, the results were sobering to leaders of social conservatives.

"The values voters of 2004 could be called the integrity voters of 2006," Family Research Council President Tony Perkins said. "The message is that values are not just something you talk about at election time. Values should guide public policies and personal conduct. This should be a clear message to both parties that values voters vote values, not party.

"That revelation may be an inescapable reality for Republicans, but it should serve as a warning to the many Democrats who leveraged the values gap by running as pro-life, pro-family candidates," Mr. Perkins added. "Those integrity voters will be back at the polls in two short years."

Among the Democrat victories were passage of a Missouri measure to allow embryonic stem-cell research and defeats of "parent notification" abortion measures in California and Oregon and a ban on abortions in South Dakota. In Kansas, voters also failed to re-elect Attorney General Phill Kline, who has been in a court battle to obtain 90 abortion records as evidence of illegal late-term abortions, child rape and other crimes. Democrat Paul Morrison said Tuesday he will look at Mr. Kline's evidence, but he is expected to drop the case.

Winners & Losers (USAT)

USA Today, November 9, 2006

There's more to the election results than just Democrats winning and Republicans losing.

Thumbs up

Uncertainty: Once again, Americans woke up the day after an election with key races still undecided.

Vice President Cheney: He spent Election Day in South Dakota, hunting for the first time since he accidentally shot a companion in February. This time, there were no reports of injuries.

Sen. Barack Obama: The Illinois Democrat wasn't on Tuesday's ballot, but he barnstormed the country to help candidates, published a best-selling book, landed on the covers of Time and Newsweek— and mentioned that he just might run for president in 2008.

Sen. Joe Lieberman: This year's Comeback Kid, he won another term in Connecticut as an independent after losing the Democratic primary.

Michael J. Fox: The actor, who has Parkinson's disease, campaigned for candidates who support stem-cell research and was accused of exaggerating his symptoms by conservative radio host Rush Limbaugh. Candidates backed by Fox in Missouri, Wisconsin and Maryland won, and Missouri voters approved protections on the research.

YouTube: The video-sharing Internet site was the place to debut campaign ads this year. A clip of Sen. George Allen, R-Va., calling a rival's volunteer "macaca" was viewed almost 300,000 times.

DOJ_NMG_0092283

Presidential vetoes: President Bush vetoed just one bill in his first six years. Democrats' new clout on Capitol Hill means he might be wielding his veto pen more often.

Howard Dean: The Democratic Party chairman feuded with top Democrats in Congress over his plan to send cash to states where his party typically doesn't win much. It paid off with victories in red states such as Montana and Colorado.

James Madison High School in Brooklyn: Graduates include New York Sen. Charles Schumer, who ran Senate Democrats' campaign operation, Vermont Sen.-elect Bernie Sanders and Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Voting and drinking: Oklahoma voters approved a referendum allowing liquor stores to stay open on Election Day; they had been limited to sales from 7-9 p.m. only.

Dead candidates: In Texas, Republican state Rep. Glenda Dawson died two months ago but easily defeated Democratic challenger Anthony Dinovo. In South Dakota, Democrat Marie Steichen, also dead for two months, defeated incumbent Republican county commissioner Merlin Feistner.

Thumbs down

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld: Somebody in the administration had to take a hit in the wake of Tuesday's Democratic wins, although one might wonder if things would have turned out better for Bush if Rumsfeld had left a week earlier.

The Bush dynasty: George H.W. Bush is happily retired; George W. Bush can't run again; term limits precluded brother Jeb from another campaign for Florida governor. When will George P. Bush, 30, Jeb's son and the likeliest candidate from the next generation, be ready?

Karl Rove: The "architect" of Bush's campaigns predicted GOP victories on Tuesday and was wrong. So much for his hopes of a permanent Republican majority.

The GOP's vaunted get-out-the-vote plan: Democrats figured out how to do it, too.

Conspiracy theorists: Warnings that voting machines were rigged to favor Republicans didn't pan out.

Washington Redskins fans: Former quarterback Heath Shuler, reviled during his 1990s tenure as a Redskin, heads back to town after winning a North Carolina seat in the House of Representatives. Shuler, a Democrat, was 4-15 in games he played in three losing seasons with the Redskins.

The Ten Commandments: Voters in Boise rejected a proposal to return a 40-year-old granite monument inscribed with the rules to a public park.

Sen. John Kerry: The Massachusetts Democrat's botched joke implying that the uneducated end up in Iraq might have reminded people why they didn't vote for him two years ago.

Famous voters: Chelsea Clinton, South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, Republican Congressman Steve Chabot of Ohio and Missouri Secretary of State Robin Carnahan all had problems when they tried to vote.

Potheads: Voters in Colorado and Nevada rejected proposals to legalize adult possession of up to an ounce of marijuana. South Dakotans voted against medical use of marijuana.

Claim Under Marijuana Act Denied (WPI)

By Richard Hanners

Whitefish Pilot, November 8, 2006

A Kalispell man who claimed protection under the state's Medical Marijuana Act after he was caught smoking marijuana at a downtown Whitefish bar will have his day in court later this month.

But he may have to seek another line of defense or appeal to a higher court, now that Whitefish City Court Judge Bradley Johnson has denied the man's motion to dismiss the charge based on the act.

According to court records, on Sept. 8, Flathead County sheriff's deputy Travis Bruyer observed Lucas Venters, 23, of Kalispell, on the upstairs deck at Flanagan's Central Station lighting marijuana in a glass pipe. Venters then allegedly passed the pipe on to Andrew Nuckles, who then allegedly passed it on to Christopher Brann, both of Kalispell.

Bruyer reported that he seized the pipe and a container of marijuana from Venters. Venters told Bruyer his possession and use of marijuana was allowed under the state's Medical Marijuana Act. He was charged with possession of dangerous drugs and drug paraphernalia.

Nuckles and Brann were charged with misdemeanor possession of dangerous drugs. They received deferred sentences in Whitefish City Court and paid a $100 fine.

In a two-page document submitted to city court, Venters claims to have a "debilitating medical condition." He said he has been "in pain every day for the past 10 years due to my spinal, thoracic and neck injuries/conditions," and that he has severe or persistent muscle spasms.

DOJ_NMG_0092284

"These spasms limit what type of work I can do, and what types of recreational activities/sports I can participate in," he said. "Some days, just bending my neck downward to tie my shoes, etc. causes my back to spasm quite painfully."

Venters claimed that state law allows individuals who suffer from a debilitating medical condition to smoke marijuana, and "that even if a user is not registered with the state Department of Public Health and Human Services, a medical defense may be raised under the Montana Medical Marijuana Act."

In his brief in opposition to Venters' motion to dismiss, Whitefish city prosecutor Clif Hayden set aside the possibility that federal law may preempt the state's Medical Marijuana Act in order to address Venters' case.

Hayden argued that Venters' conduct "does not fall within the parameters of the act" because he did not possess a registry identification card from the Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services.

Such a card may be obtained through application by providing the department with a written certification that the person is a qualifying patient; the name, address and date of birth of the qualifying patient; the name, address and phone number of the qualifying patient's physician; and the appropriate fee, Hayden said.

"According to the MMMA definitions, 'qualifying patient' means a person who has been diagnosed with a debilitating condition by a physician," he said. "In other words, you need an opinion from a licensed physician to register."

Hayden noted that according to the MMMA, evidence must be presented "that a physician has made a determination that the benefits of use of marijuana outweigh the potential harms for a given patient."

"In this case, the defendant offers nothing but his own analysis of how his alleged symptom fits the MMMA definitions," Hayden said. "He has offered no medical evidence, physician's opinion or otherwise that the benefits outweigh the potential harmful effects."

Johnson ruled on Venters' motion on Oct. 25, saying Venters "failed to assert facts that are vital to claiming protected status under the act."

"Recognizing the scrutiny that the act will invite from both state and federal authorities, the standard may require strict compliance by anyone attempting to invoke the act as a shield to prosecution," Johnson said.

Johnson agreed with Hayden that Venters had failed to satisfy the criteria of the act by not being officially designated as a qualifying patient. But Johnson went further, noting how Venters shared his pipe with two others on Flanagan's deck.

"Assuming that the defendant contends that his open smoking of marijuana was within the scope of 'medical use' as defined within section 50-46-102(5), his 'sharing' of his personal-use medical marijuana with others would tend to negate the limited protection granted by the legislature," Johnson said. "His actions would exceed the purpose of merely alleviating his personal symptoms or effects of his debilitating medical condition. Such activity would encompass criminal conduct not protected by the statutes."

Lawndale To Initiate Ban Of Marijuana Dispensaries (TORDB)

By Shirley Hsu

Torrence (CA) Daily Breeze, November 9, 2006

Leaders reject a recommendation to allow but regulate facilities that distribute pot for medicinal purposes.

Lawndale City Council members this week quickly shot down a proposal to regulate medical marijuana dispensaries in the city, opting instead to direct staff to look into banning the establishments altogether.

Without much discussion on the topic, the City Council voted unanimously Monday to reject the recommendation from the Planning Commission that it adopt the ordinance regulating dispensaries, praised by one medical marijuana advocate for being the most comprehensive set of regulations he had ever seen.

"This ordinance covers everything," said Chris Fusco, a field coordinator for medical marijuana advocacy group Americans for Safe Access, before the council's decision. "I think it perfectly addresses the concerns of the community and the needs of medical cannabis patients."

The ordinance would have required dispensaries not be located within 600 feet of schools, playgrounds, parks, churches and similar community centers; that they close before 7 p.m.; that they not allow minors without a parent; and that they have security guards to patrol the dispensary and a two-block radius surrounding it. Patrons must immediately leave the site and not consume medical marijuana until they return home.

Councilman Larry Rudolph made the motion to reject the ordinance and instead look into a ban.

"I don't think it's appropriate anywhere," he said, adding that because other South Bay cities have banned them, Lawndale would become a magnet for dispensaries. He said he believed drugs would get in the hands of children and that it was too easy to get a doctor's recommendation.

DOJ_NMG_0092285

"Until the court sorts this one out, I don't want one here," he said, referring to the conflict between state law, which permits usage of the drug by "seriously ill" patients with doctors' recommendations, and federal law, which classifies the drug as a controlled substance.

Dispensaries have recently met with a cold reception in the South Bay, with Torrance, Gardena, Hawthorne, Hermosa Beach, Lomita, Rancho Palos Verdes and Redondo Beach issuing temporary or permanent bans. Lawndale in June enacted a temporary ban on the establishments.

The regulations Lawndale rejected would have prohibited alcohol, allowed the distribution of plant cuttings, and limited the amount of marijuana provided to individuals to amounts consistent with state law, a provision Fusco said showed foresight. Many of the regulations were similar to those approved in May by Los Angeles County supervisors for unincorporated areas of the county.

City staff disagreed with the Planning Commission on one point, recommending prohibiting the consumption of marijuana on dispensary property.

Two Lawndale residents spoke in opposition of marijuana dispensaries, and two others spoke in support.

Bob Burrill of San Pedro, who with his wife had hoped to open a dispensary in Lawndale, said on-site consumption is necessary for employees and volunteers because many are patients themselves.

ATF Arrests Arkansas Man For Possessing Illegal Guns (NAMN)

By Trish Mehaffey

Northwest Arkansas Morning News, November 9, 2006

FAYETTEVILLE -- A Fayetteville militia member was arrested Wednesday by teams of special agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and other federal and state agencies and local police in connection with illegal firearms.

Fayetteville police Lt. Mike Reynolds said 14 search warrants were executed Wednesday in Fort Smith and Fayetteville and one of the warrants was for a lieutenant commander of the Militia of Washington County, Hollis "Wayne" Fincher, of 16085 East Black Oak Road.

"We assisted ATF and several other agencies in arresting Fincher. I don't believe he has a criminal history with us. That's all I can tell you," Reynolds said.

Washington County Sheriff Tim Helder said he couldn't comment on the arrest or Fincher.

Fincher was arrested without incident at his residence, according to an ATF news release.

Senior ATF Special Agent Austin R. Banks said he was restricted to releasing anything beyond the news release. He did confirm Fincher has no criminal record and he was the only person arrested.

The arrest and search warrants were the result of an eight-month investigation relating to the unlawful manufacture, possession and transfer of machine guns, Banks said.

A machine gun that can fire 550 rounds a minute and assorted 9 mm Sten submachine guns are stored in the Washington County militia's concrete and steel vault, according to information gathered from an interview conducted by The Morning News in March. Each weapon is stamped with the word "non-commercial" to prove the group holds the arms for militia purchases only and not for trade or sale.

Owners of automatic weapons must pay $200 to license each automatic weapon they own. Militia members avoided that by re-building government-destroyed automatic weapons for their own use, Paul Smith, militia commander said in March.

Fincher said in the March interview he believes Americans should proudly uphold the right to bear arms, stand up for land rights and not always accept the federal government as the supreme law of the land.

"What we've got to do today is hold our ground," Fincher said in March.

According to the militia's Web site, the headquarters is down the road from Fincher's address at 15566 E. Black Oak Road. The militia was formed July 4, 1994.

Thirteen additional federal search warrants were executed at different places in the Fort Smith-Fayetteville area, Banks said. The warrants are under seal at the direction of the U.S. Attorney for the Western Judicial District of Arkansas. All evidence seized during the execution of the warrants will be submitted to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the preparation of indictments in this investigation.

ATF, FBI, Washington County Sheriff's Department, Fayetteville Police Department, Springdale Police Department, Arkansas State Police, Arkansas State Bomb Squad and the Madison County Sheriff's Department all participated in the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0092286

The investigation was conducted under Project Safe Neighborhoods, the U.S. Department of Justice initiative that combines federal, state and local resources to combat violent gun crime. The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Arkansas will prosecute the case.

IMMIGRATION:

Va. Case Highlights Fraudulent Marriages (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, November 9, 2006

A Virginia man's guilty plea Wednesday to arranging sham marriages between U.S. citizens and Ghanaian immigrants reflects the government's increased focus on marriage fraud.

Eric Amoah, 42, a pharmacy technician from Ghana, was one of 22 people charged in the Washington, D.C., area two months ago with participating in a marriage and immigration fraud scheme. His sentence is pending.

Similar busts have occurred in the past year in California, New York and Utah. An investigation is underway in Gwinnett County, Ga., where two men are charged with bigamy for marrying at least 13 African women.

"We're definitely seeing more organizations" involved in marriage fraud, says James Spero, head of the Identity and Benefits Fraud Unit at U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). "We're stepping up our efforts."

Sham marriages for immigrants seeking citizenship have long been a problem. A marriage license can be the quickest way to gain the temporary legal status conferred by a green card, the title of a 1990 movie about two people who enter into such a marriage of convenience only to — surprise — fall in love.

Since 9/11, marriage fraud has taken on more serious implications. Half of 36 foreign-born suspected terrorists who were in the USA from the early 1990s to 2004 gained legal status by marrying Americans — 10 of them through sham marriages — according to the Center for Immigration Studies, which promotes tighter immigration controls.

Janice Kephart, former counsel to the 9/11 Commission, which produced the center's research, says the government is not doing enough to crack down on marriage fraud.

"They simply don't have the resources," Kephart says. She says U.S. officials go after ringleaders of schemes more than the immigrants who marry.

Alfred Robertson, the attorney representing Amoah, agrees that immigration laws need better enforcement. He says immigration officials lack funding to hire enough agents to investigate applications for legal status.

Spero says ICE is working with other agencies in 11 new task forces and has increased the number of identity and benefit fraud cases it is investigating, from 2,300 in fiscal 2004 to 3,434 in fiscal 2006, including about 700 involving marriage fraud.

Spero says some U.S. citizens are duped into marrying an immigrant who simply wants a green card. Others, he says, commit a felony, punishable by jail time and a $250,000 fine, by knowingly entering into a sham marriage.

He says organizations typically charge $2,500 to $6,000 to arrange a marriage. Amassing evidence that a couple has taken the next steps toward permanent residency or citizenship, such as living together, costs more. On the West Coast, he says, one full-service scheme charged $60,000.

Robertson says Amoah, who married a U.S. citizen himself, helped arranged 75 to 300 marriages, most of which were fraudulent. "He knew what he was doing was wrong," Robertson says, adding that Amoah faces possible deportation.

'No' To Immigration Hard-liners (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

ARIZONA HELD A referendum on immigration policy Tuesday. The winner was John McCain.

McCain, the state's senior senator, wasn't actually on the ballot. Rather, candidates across the state campaigned for or against an idea that McCain and a few other Arizonans in Congress have championed: a comprehensive approach to immigration reform that provides more visas for guest workers, modifies the path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country and improves border security.

Critics of this approach, including Republican candidates for governor, attorney general and two of Arizona's eight House seats, argued instead for sealing the borders and enforcing current immigration laws. They all were defeated, despite the frustration and anger expressed by many Arizonans about the torrent of border jumpers.

Those emotions were evident in the overwhelming support Tuesday for ballot initiatives to deny bail, curtail subsidies for education and childcare, limit civil damage awards for illegal immigrants and make English the state's official language. Voters backed all these proposals, reflecting a widespread belief that illegal immigrants impose a variety of burdens on taxpayers.

Nevertheless, voters in the state demanded a more nuanced and pragmatic solution than that being offered by the most virulently anti-illegal immigration candidates. The best illustrations came in the races for two House seats, one representing the sparsely populated border counties in southeastern Arizona and the other representing some upscale suburbs east of Phoenix. A six-term Republican incumbent, J.D. Hayworth, and a former Republican state representative, Randy Graf — both known for their firebrand stances on border security — lost to Democrats Harry Mitchell and Gabrielle Giffords, who had aligned themselves on immigration with McCain.

Graf was trying to win the seat occupied by retiring Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe, a longtime advocate for comprehensive reform. While McCain and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) were steering their plan through the Senate, Kolbe and colleague Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) were trying to push a similar approach through the House, with significant Democratic support. But they were rebuffed by Republican leaders who wanted to use immigration as a campaign issue — in particular, by slamming Democrats for supporting "amnesty" and being soft on border security.

Now McCain and Flake may get their way. With Democrats in control of the House next year, the prospects for a comprehensive overhaul have improved dramatically. In fact, President Bush (who also supports that approach) singled out immigration Wednesday as an issue ripe for bipartisanship. The voters of Arizona have pushed a comprehensive solution one step closer to reality.

TAX:

TAXES: Can The Middle Class Expect Some Relief ? (WP)

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Democrats have pledged "fiscal discipline," starting with pay-as-you-go rules to prohibit the House from approving new spending or tax measures unless the costs are offset by tax increases or spending cuts.

"There's not going to be, frankly, room for some grand new adventure in federal spending," said Rep. Earl Pomeroy (D-N.D.), a member of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Still, there's plenty on the Democratic wish list, starting with relief for the growing number of middle-class families hit by the alternative minimum tax, which jacks up their tax bills. Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), likely to be the next Ways and Means chairman, said yesterday that "tackling this very complex problem would be a good test of bipartisanship."

Rangel said he would not roll back tax cuts that President Bush won from the Republican Congress. But budget experts predict that Democrats will revisit at least some of them, such as lower rates for the richest Americans, lower rates on capital gains and dividends, and partial repeal of the estate tax, to pay for other priorities.

On the growing costs of programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, Rangel said he would work with the administration. But political analysts say reform of those programs is unlikely until after the 2008 presidential election.

Ways And Means To A Position Of Power (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, November 9, 2006

NEW YORK — Three days after waging a war of words with Vice President Cheney last week, Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., swept into the Manhattan offices of powerhouse law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld.

Fresh from an MSNBC interview that reprised the battle — Cheney declared Rangel “doesn't understand how the economy works,” prompting Rangel to call Cheney a “son of a bitch” — the raspy-voiced Democrat launched into a less visible, yet even more pointed response.

Rangel, hand-shaking and hugging his way through dozens of lawyers and executives, was one of the political stars of a private gathering that raised thousands of dollars for Tim Mahoney, the Florida Democrat who captured disgraced GOP Rep. Mark Foley's seat in Tuesday's midterm elections.

By raising money for Mahoney — and distributing more than $500,000 to more than 80 congressional Democrats in this year's races — Rangel helped his party regain control of the House and prepared to grasp the elusive prize that prompted Cheney's taunt: chairmanship of the powerful Ways and Means Committee.

Only six New Yorkers have held the post; the last, Daniel Reed, more than 50 years ago. Rangel gives no sign he's any more awed by becoming the House point man on all tax and finance legislation than he is of taking on Cheney — or President Bush.

He made just one concession Wednesday at a celebratory news conference, saying he should have confronted Cheney privately. But he couldn't resist a final dig.

“Mr. Cheney enjoys an office on the second floor of the House of Representatives that historically has been designated for the Ways and Means Committee chairman,” said Rangel with a smile, as supporters laughed and clapped. “I talked with (expected new House Speaker) Nancy Pelosi this morning, and I'm trying to find some way to be gentle as I restore the dignity to that office.”

Although he's known as warm and witty, even with most opponents, the 76-year-old Korean War veteran has relished political combat since first elected to the House in 1970. As Robert Greenstein, executive director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities puts it, “He has a backbone of steel for the things he believes in.”

Yet, surprisingly for some who have tangled with the pugnacious Harlem Democrat, his priority list starts with at least a promise of bipartisanship.

“I enjoy working together with Republicans,” said Rangel, seated in his congressional Cadillac en route to the Mahoney fundraiser. “I enjoy a finished legislative product that you can get on the floor in a civil way and say, ‘We worked on this together.' I think that's what the Congress is all about.”

That cooperation was lost during the Republican Party's 12-year control of the House, says Rangel, describing a political wandering-in-the-desert, when it wasn't odd for Ways and Means Democrats to learn about the committee's plans only after final decisions had been made. Rangel says his predecessor, retiring GOP Rep. William Thomas of California, never spoke to him about U.S. trade legislation apart from bills the New Yorker championed.

One of Rangel's first moves will be to reach out to the panel's GOP members in the style of former Rep. Dan Rostenkowski when the Illinois Democrat chaired Ways and Means before losing his seat in a corruption scandal.

“I'm hoping to take the full committee on retreat out of Washington, out of the District anyway, for two or three days, with (Bush) administration people and other economists and see whether we can find some basic agreement, perhaps with low-hanging fruit, so that we can learn to work together,” says Rangel.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, IRS Commissioner Mark Everson and other administration officials have signaled tentative plans to attend, Rangel said. The agenda, he said, would include non-controversial legislation backed by both parties, including extension of the research and development tax credit for businesses and the college tuition tax deduction for families.

What Rangel says he won't consider is the package of Bush tax cuts set to expire in 2010. Cheney used the looming expiration and Rangel's well-known disdain for many administration tax policies in a bid to rally Republican Party faithful in the midterm elections.

“At 76 years old, I don't buy green bananas. What the hell do I know (about what) the economy's going to look like in 2010?” Rangel asks. “Why should I make a commitment to extend these tax cuts when the expiration date was put on there by the Republicans?”

Nonetheless, he makes clear he won't pick a fight by trying to repeal the tax cuts, either. “I think it's bad tax policy and bad politics to do that.”

Bill Miller, vice president for congressional affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which has often backed the GOP White House and Congress, welcomes that view. “The rhetoric that has come from Congressman Rangel has been encouraging,” he said. “The Republican Congress has been very good to the business community. But at the end of the day, you need bipartisanship to get anything done.”

At least at first glance, Rangel wouldn't necessarily seem to be a model for political evenhandedness.

He's used his National Leadership Political Action Committee to collect millions of dollars, largely from Democratic Party donors. By virtue of holding a safe political seat — he first met his unsuccessful 2006 GOP challenger, Edward Daniels, at a candidate forum last week — Rangel has been able to distribute the funds to congressional Democratic candidates across the country.

At least one of Rangel's PAC donors appeared to benefit from giving: New York attorney Melvyn Weiss, whose law firm was renowned for filing securities class-action lawsuits. A federal indictment filed this year accused the firm of paying kickbacks to clients who served as plaintiffs in class-action cases.

Federal Election Commission records show Weiss gave $4,200 to Rangel's re-election campaign in March and $5,000 to his National Leadership PAC in September. In June, Rangel was one of four House members who issued a statement that described the indictment as part of “the Justice Department's crusade against trial lawyers.”

Separately, some GOP-oriented lobbyists this year got calls seeking donations to Rangel's PAC, a move that conservative columnist Robert Novak reported was interpreted by some “as a requirement for a ticket to enter” the office of the incoming Ways and Means chairman.

Rangel has not commented publicly on Weiss' contributions. As for the lobbyist calls, he said he has never required donations from those seeking access to him, “nor has there ever been a suggestion that my conduct has been influenced by any contributions.”

Greenstein characterized the newly re-elected 19-term Democrat as far too pragmatic to practice bare-knuckle politics as Ways and Means chairman.

"Charles Rangel hasn't waited all this time to play games. He wants to get some things done," says Greenstein, predicting that the new chairman "would probably be less sharply partisan" than his GOP predecessor.

Asked how his style would differ, Rangel said: "I don't have the option that Chairman Thomas has, that is, just to look for a majority. Democrats wouldn't allow me to do it. I wouldn't want to do it. And anything we did do wouldn't pass the Senate, and the president would veto."

After holding the committee retreat, Rangel said, he hopes to begin seeking common ground with Republicans on more contentious tax and finance issues he considers important. At the top of the list are an increase in the federal minimum wage and relief from the Alternative Minimum Tax for millions of middle-class and upper-income Americans for whom the levy means higher federal tax bills. "While it's expensive to do, I think it's one thing that we agree on that should be done," said Rangel.

He also hopes to become what he terms the "new best friend" of the traditionally GOP-backing business community by considering industry tax credits and international trade legislation, while also re-examining tax incentives that encourage some businesses to operate offshore.

Rangel said he has already talked to some manufacturing industry leaders about foreign nations that subsidize their businesses with education, training and health care assistance, "while we allow the private sector, without federal assistance, to do it" alone.

"It doesn't make economic sense," said Rangel, adding that he has encouraged business leaders to submit federal aid proposals.

Rangel acknowledges he's given some thought to a potential goal raised by Miller: major financial legislation that would enable the new chairman to put a "stamp" on Ways and Means.

He cautions it's too early for such plans, but readily allows that a federal financing plan to guarantee Social Security "would be a great coup."

"A great tax reform bill that would simplify the system would be a chairman's goal," Rangel adds. "Medicare, I don't even know where to start with that, but having discussions would be a great beginning."

With Dems In Control: Gridlock Or Change? (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats' stunning electoral gains will broaden the economic agenda beyond President Bush's focus on tax cuts to more populist debates over income inequality, globalization, budget deficits and health care coverage, among other issues.

But the big question is whether Democratic control of the House — and possibly the Senate — will result in substantive change or merely political stalemate and posturing for the next presidential election.

"The theme for the next two years is showcase '08," says Dan Mica, a former GOP congressman who heads the Credit Union National Association. "America thinks the elections were over yesterday, but we just had a … break from commercials."

The first hint of what the Democratic gains mean could come this month when Congress reconvenes, still under GOP control, for a lame-duck session to wrap up spending bills and other legislation. Given the election shock, Republicans could just do the minimum and go home, Mica says.

The Democratic push begins next year with an agenda that includes proposals to raise the minimum wage, eliminate some tax breaks for oil companies and let the government negotiate prices under the Medicare prescription-drug program. Democrats will also try to find other bipartisan measures to pass, such as extending a business research tax credit.

Because Democrats don't have a veto-proof majority in the House, or the 60 votes needed to limit Senate debate, some observers predict gridlock. Robert Van Batenburg of Louis Capital Markets notes impasse means less spending and is generally bullish for bonds.

Business groups, such as the Business Roundtable and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, urged the two parties to work together to address economic issues. Democrats promised Wednesday to reach out to Republicans, and Bush also vowed bipartisanship. That could be short-lived.

"There's a chance to get some things done, but they'd have to be done quickly," says Nigel Gault of Global Insight. "The closer we get to the elections, the less likely it is."

Even if passing laws is difficult, Democrats still have plenty of power to shape the agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0092290

Democrats can affect the economy by declining to schedule votes on pending trade deals or expiring Bush tax cuts. There are also must-pass measures to fund the government and the war in Iraq, where Bush has less flexibility. Those bills could be a vehicle for adding other Democratic priorities.

Some observers say politicians do not have the luxury of dithering, given high trade and budget deficits and a low savings rate.

"There are times when government can, indeed, get in the way. But there are also circumstances which demand leadership and decisive policy actions. This is one of those times," says Stephen Roach of Morgan Stanley.

What Business Should Expect In Next Congress Minimum-Wage Increase, Drug Prices Top The Agenda; New Hurdles For Free Trade (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell, Brody Mullins, James R. Hagerty, Anna Wilde Mathews, Laura Meckler And Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democrats' election victory Tuesday ended a six-year partnership between a business-friendly White House and Congress that enacted free-trade agreements, cut taxes on corporations and investors and -- with the significant exception of the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-reform bill -- avoided new regulations.

Now, the question is how far the Democrats, tempered by a Republican president and a closely divided Senate, can push the pendulum in the other direction.

The party has yet to spell out its entire legislative agenda, but its leaders are talking about quickly boosting the minimum wage, seeking to curb executive pay and pushing for higher taxes on business, particularly oil companies. Many stocks, especially health-care shares, took a hit early yesterday as investors weighed the new political uncertainties, but the market went on to finish higher (see related article1.)

Rep. Charles Rangel, the New York Democrat who is expected to become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, cites "ending tax shelters for companies that move American jobs overseas" as one of his main objectives. He is also expected to complicate the White House's efforts to further liberalize trade by demanding strong protections for labor in any trade deals.

California Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the probable new speaker of the House, has already called for ending "tax giveaways" to oil companies, negotiating with pharmaceutical companies for better drug prices for federal health programs and rolling back tax cuts for the wealthiest Americans.

Many political observers, however, doubt the Democrats can gain traction on more than a few of these issues, especially with business groups and their political allies keen to avoid losing any ground on trade and taxes.

Raising the minimum wage is one fight the Democrats are expected to win. That would be a victory for organized labor, which has pushed for an increase for years, but a defeat for the restaurant and retail industries and small-business owners, who argue it would hurt the economy by forcing them to hire fewer workers.

Mrs. Pelosi has promised to bring legislation to the floor within the first 24 hours of the new Congress to boost the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from the current $5.15. The idea is popular with voters: Six states overwhelmingly passed ballot initiatives Tuesday to raise the minimum wage and tie future increases to inflation. Republicans may feel hard-pressed to oppose the move.

At a news conference yesterday, President Bush cited the minimum wage as "an area where we can ... find common ground."

On the trade front, businesses face the growing threat of protectionism. Several victorious Democrats campaigned as trade skeptics, arguing that U.S. manufacturers are being battered unfairly by companies in China and other low-wage countries with weaker environmental and labor protections. Trade watchers on both sides of the issue say President Bush will have a tough time winning a free hand from Congress to negotiate trade accords. The president's "fast track" authority -- under which Congress has to vote up or down on trade agreements, forgoing amendments -- expires in July, and a Democrat-led House is less likely to grant him such sweeping powers again.

Leo Gerard, president of the United Steelworkers union, told reporters yesterday that the coming showdown over Mr. Bush's fast-track authority is "the first battle that we're going to win."

U.S. trading partners are reluctant to negotiate new trade accords if they think Congress will change the terms before ratifying them, and the current Doha round of global trade talks is already considered to be in deep trouble. European Commission President José Manuel Barroso appealed yesterday to the new U.S. Congress to help revive the stalled talks.

The trade debate is particularly heated when it comes to China, with its fast-growing export industries. Lawmakers could take steps to press China to improve its enforcement of intellectual-property rights and other trade rules. Yesterday, Mr. Rangel, the New York Democrat, said the U.S. needs to "be angry as hell and try to protect American industry....We have to protect American jobs and American manufacturers."

Robert Portman, the former U.S. Trade Representative who now heads the White House budget office, says the Democrats could create "a real nervousness among people who invest in and look at our economy closely. The trade dynamic has been very good. Export-driven growth is important, and if we're not knocking down barriers to trade that's a concern."

Democratic control of the House also will end the Republican Party's drive to lower taxes and could frustrate President Bush's hopes of extending the reduced 15% tax rates on capital gains and dividends, which expire in 2010. Republicans' decade-long push to scrap estate taxes is also likely to be halted.

Democrats are expected to support some tax sweeteners for business, such as the research and development tax credit. Mr. Rangel also said one of his priorities is to ease the burden of the so-called alternative minimum tax, which is designed to keep wealthy taxpayers from taking so many deductions and credits they escape taxes altogether. Easing the burden of the AMT, which has begun to ensnare many middle-class families, could cost the government $1 trillion over 10 years, and many policy watchers expect Democrats to rescind tax breaks for corporations and the wealthy to help offset any tax cuts or new spending.

At the same time, Democrats have vowed to force pharmaceutical companies to charge less for drugs sold to Medicare beneficiaries -- an idea strongly opposed by the drug industry. Mrs. Pelosi is expected to push a bill to allow direct price negotiations between the government and the drug industry. Though such a measure might not clear the Senate or the White House, it could give Democrats traction to advance other ways of driving down drug prices, such as widening the availability of imported drugs.

Drug prices are also likely to be a major focus for investigations, reports and hearings by the new Democratic House committee chairmen, particularly California Rep. Henry Waxman, who will head the House Government Reform Committee. A favorite drug-industry benefit -- six months of exclusive marketing of medications in return for studies on their effects in children -- is up for renewal and likely to draw scrutiny from Mr. Waxman and others. In an interview, Mr. Waxman says his priorities will include "reducing the price of prescription drugs."

Similarly, investors who own stock in student-loan providers like Sallie Mae worry about Democratic campaign promises to significantly reduce student-loan interest rates and speculation that they'll promote the William D. Ford Federal Direct Loan Program, in which students borrow directly from the federal government, rather than banks. That direct-lending program competes with the other federal student-loan program, Federal Family Education Loan Program, in which students borrow through a middleman such as Sallie Mae. In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, shares of SLM Corp. -- better known as Sallie Mae -- were down 4.8% at $47.21.

The Democrat takeover of the House is expected to put outsize executive pay back in the spotlight, with a push toward giving shareholders a vote to approve pay packages. Massachusetts Democrat Barney Frank, who is expected to head the House Financial Services Committee, says he will hold hearings on executive pay and plans to move forward on a bill he introduced last year.

However, Mr. Frank and other Democrats have been receptive to business efforts to review the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-governance law and to have regulators adjust some of the more controversial provisions. Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, has spoken recently about curbing some aspects of the law, which he says is driving business away from U.S. financial markets.

Mr. Frank also has a strong interest in affordable housing and his chairmanship could shift the odds in the three-year-old struggle to tighten regulation of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The Bush administration's efforts to persuade Congress to force the companies to slash their mortgage holdings had already sputtered before the election, and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has been looking for possible compromises. Now almost any legislative language to rein in the two companies may be politically impossible to sell.

Fannie and Freddie shares gained 2.9% and 2%, respectively, to $61.25 and $71.23 yesterday in 4 p.m. Big Board trading.

Still, Mr. Frank is expected to push hard for the legislation to require Fannie and Freddie to use more of their resources for financing loans to low-income people. That may hurt the companies' profitability. And both parties still want to create a more powerful regulatory agency to oversee Fannie and Freddie in light of their violations of accounting rules in recent years.

Another industry that could both benefit and suffer from the Democratic takeover of the House is the auto industry. Democrats are likely to push for greater use of alternative fuels, which could hurt or help Detroit depending on how legislation is structured. The industry is sharply opposed to tougher fuel economy standards supported by Democrats. But domestic auto makers are bullish on the potential for ethanol to partly replace oil as a transportation fuel and would support efforts to build the ethanol infrastructure and production capacity.

More perilous for the industry is Democratic interest in addressing climate change by limiting carbon dioxide emissions. Automobiles are among the worst offenders, and car companies could be hurt by new taxes or regulations aimed at limiting carbon emissions.

President Bush is said to be interested in climate change as well, and he has repeatedly spoken in favor of alternative fuels, making them an area where potential exists for successful legislation.

What The New Congress Will Mean For Business (WP)

By Lori Montgomery And Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Democrats wasted no time yesterday proclaiming a new era in Washington, pledging to put middle-class economic issues at the top of their agenda. They promised fresh scrutiny of drug prices, corporate profits, international trade and more.

While President Bush and Democratic leaders pledged to cooperate, the presumptive chairmen of key House committees laid out plans to challenge the president on many issues important to business interests.

For instance, an exuberant Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) rattled off a to-do list for the powerful Energy and Commerce Committee, including regulating dietary supplements, promoting electric cars and examining drug-safety procedures at the Food and Drug Administration. "We'll kill the closest snake first," he said when asked about his priorities.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) said he would act quickly as Ways and Means chairman to authorize Medicare to haggle with drug companies over prices. Asked about White House opposition, Rangel wondered whether the president "has any idea of how frustrated the voters were and how much he was responsible for that frustration."

Analysts say that Democrats may find chastened Republicans receptive to some ideas, such as raising the minimum wage, but that compromise will be tough on many issues.

"There's nothing more important on either party's mind than winning the presidency in 2008," said Mark Weinberger, a partner at Ernst & Young LLP and a former Bush Treasury official. "The window for bipartisan cooperation is very small."

Business Prepares For Heightened Scrutiny (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington And Christopher Bowe And Ben White

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Democratic victories in the US mid-term elections set the stage for heightened congressional scrutiny of pharmaceutical companies, oil and gas groups and government contractors such as Halliburton.

Shares in Merck, Schering-Plough and other big drugmakers fell on Wednesday in response to the polls, but the overall stock market rose, reflecting an emerging consensus among lobbyists that Democrats would take a selective approach in pushing for regulatory changes.

During the campaign, Democrats signalled their desire to reform Medicare, the US healthcare programme for the elderly, by pushing legislation that would give the government – as opposed to private insurers – the power to set drug prices, potentially adding pressure to the cornerstone of industry profitability.

Democrats will also strongly support alternative fuel at the expense of oil and gas companies, whose record profits and tax breaks will be scrutinised.

Government contractors such as Halliburton and Bechtel are also likely to come under fire for their work in Iraq, which has cost billions in taxpayer dollars. But the election of a significant number of moderate “pro-growth” Democrats mean that the party’s approach will be measured.

Although the incoming leaders of some of the most important committees in the House of Representatives and, potentially, the Senate – people such as John Dingell, Barney Frank, and Charles Rangel – represent the liberal wing of the Democratic party, most business lobbyists say they believe the lawmakers will espouse a “reasonable” agenda.

In part that is because left-leaning lawmakers will be reined in by moderates and because any sweeping legislative reform aimed at business could face a veto by President George W. Bush.

The lack of anxiety among some business lobbyists about the election results also reflects that, apart from a few industries that could be a target for congressional investigations, many companies, particularly on Wall Street, have strengthened their ties to Democrats in anticipation of a swing in control.

Such veteran lawmakers as Mr Frank and Mr Rangel are viewed as liberal lions, but also pragmatists who will seek out compromises to pass incremental reform. Charles Schumer, the New York senator who led his party’s campaign to recapture the Senate, and Senator Hillary Clinton, also have long-standing ties to Wall Street.

“A growth-oriented agenda is now a core Democratic party tenant,” said Blair Effron, a Democratic donor and partner at Centerview Partners, a financial advisory firm.

Mr Frank, the incoming chairman of the influential House financial services committee, appeared on Wednesday to give a nod to investment banks that are hopeful Democrats will support modest revisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, by emphasising his willingness to dilute some provisions in the corporate reform bill.

"I can promise you that this time next year, Section 404 will be much less of a burden without diminishing its central purpose of avoiding abuses," he said in a speech in Boston, referring to a controversial provision that requires companies to disclose the adequacy of their internal financial controls.

The Democratic leadership has also struck a broad-brush deal with Republicans on trade liberalisation in an effort to establish the party's bipartisan credentials.

Big Pharma Catches A Chill, Fearing Democrats' Prescriptions On Pricing (WSJ)

By Avery Johnson And Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Fears that Democrats will tackle drug pricing have investors reconsidering the pricing of drug stocks, too.

Shares of major pharmaceutical companies slipped yesterday amid concerns that Democrats will push for changes that could cut prices paid under Medicare for some medications, among other things. Still, analysts cautioned that Democratic control of the House of Representatives is unlikely to bring much immediate change for the industry. For one thing, many proposals on the Democrats' agenda could face a veto from a Bush White House, if they make it that far.

Even as the Dow Jones Industrial Average hit a record, the Dow Jones Wilshire U.S. Pharmaceuticals Index fell 1.7%, a reversal from the upward trend that has lifted the group about 17% in the past 12 months. Merck shares fell 3.4%, Schering-Plough lost 2.5% and Pfizer dropped 1.6%. (Options on drug stocks also stir. See article.1)

Also weighing on drug stocks was Merck's disclosure Tuesday that U.S. and Canadian authorities are requesting an additional $5.58 billion in taxes and interest going back to 1993. GlaxoSmithKline, the British pharmaceuticals company, agreed to settle a similar dispute with the Internal Revenue Service two months ago, which cost it roughly $3.1 billion.

Analysts stress that the major challenge to the industry isn't Washington rhetoric but issues that drug makers have struggled with for years -- few new drugs in the pipelines and threats from generic competitors. Although Big Pharma hasn't freed itself from those concerns, signs of progress have driven drug stocks' strong performance so far this year.

At least some drug companies appear to be refilling their pipelines with products that can take the place of blockbusters that will lose patent protection and taking other steps to ameliorate the situation. Merck, Schering-Plough and Pfizer are in varying stages of aggressive restructuring programs. Merck has had five new drugs approved this year alone.

The rumblings in Washington may be a short-term distraction. "We continue to view a potential recovery in the sector's pipeline as a more important long-term value driver" than the elections, Banc of America Securities analyst Chris Schott wrote in a recent note to clients. "We see many near-term positive pipeline catalysts."

Catherine Arnold, a pharmaceutical analyst at Credit Suisse, says next year's earnings look to benefit from favorable comparisons to this year, which saw profits hit by generic competition, and by increased benefits from cost-cutting programs. But she is neutral on drug stocks, noting that clouds loom with a presidential election in 2008 and potentially lower prices.

Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California, who is expected to become speaker of the House, has said Democrats will introduce legislation allowing the government to negotiate directly with drug companies to secure better prices for medications offered to senior citizens under Medicare. Democrats also have backed making generic drugs more accessible and expanding the ability to import cheaper drugs from overseas.

Democrats' new dominance in the House -- and possibly the Senate -- could bolster drug-safety efforts at the Food and Drug Administration. Democrats have a chance to put their stamp on critical legislation that must be renewed next year, including FDA user fees and the law that gives drug companies extended protection against generic competition if they study the use of their medications in children. Democrats will be able to launch and lead investigations and oversight hearings that will likely focus on drug pricing and safety.

Rep. Henry Waxman of California, who will now be chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, has introduced a bill to create a pathway for generic versions of biotech drugs. Though the complexity of the issue makes quick legislative changes unlikely, it will likely find more traction with Democrats in charge. Democrats are also eyeing other moves, including boosting funding for the FDA's generics-drug office. They may also look to discourage some tactics that the branded drug makers use to protect their turf, such as deals for so-called "authorized generics."

"There's no question that the world just changed for us, but it's not a big surprise, and no one's panicking," said Ken Johnson, senior vice president at the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the industry trade group. He vowed to redouble public-relations efforts leading up to the 2008 presidential election, which he called "even more important" than most elections for the drug industry.

Implementation of the Medicare prescription-drug benefit shored up drug-company revenues during a research and development drought, and fed healthy profits, especially toward the end of this year. Industry executives say the Medicare drug benefit has served patients well, with high satisfaction and lower costs than originally forecast. "The free market has created competition and prices are going in the right direction," said Tony Zook, president and chief executive of AstraZeneca's North American unit.

Analysts said yesterday's stock-price declines reflected a psychological defeat for the drug companies rather than anything immediate that could affect their businesses. "The stocks are reacting to the perception that Democrats are in charge, and Democrats are mean to the drug industry," said Richard Evans, a pharmaceutical analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein & Co.

Some on Wall Street are concerned about whether the election results foretell a Republican loss in 2008. "If this is an indictment of the Republicans, then it does not give the industry a warm-and-fuzzy feeling for the presidential election in 2008," said Barbara Ryan, a pharmaceutical analyst at Deutsche Bank.

In the near-term, Democrats are likely to support new powers for the FDA. A senior Democratic House staffer with experience in health care says Democratic lawmakers are likely to be "very receptive to the recommendations" in a recent report from the Institute of Medicine, an independent research organization that advises the federal government. Changes called for in the report include restrictions on direct-to-consumer advertising for the first two years a drug is on the market.

New Congress Expected To Scrutinize Government Management (column) (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

The new Congress will take a more skeptical view of the Bush administration's approach to managing the federal government, in particular efforts to contract out federal jobs and link employee pay raises more closely to job performance.

Those were the post-election predictions offered by a number of public policy experts, union leaders and Democrats yesterday.

Policy analysts said they expected that the Democratic takeover of the House and possible capture of the Senate would lead to more-rigorous oversight to root out waste, fraud and abuse in government. Federal union leaders saw the election results as an opportunity to roll back some of the administration's workforce initiatives.

Key members of Congress from both parties traditionally put aside partisan differences and work closely with one another on civil-service issues. More than likely, the same House and Senate members will continue to cooperate on issues important to federal employees, such as pay, benefits and retirement.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) is in line to take the chair of the House Government Reform Committee, replacing Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.). Before the election, Waxman said his priorities would be to tighten restrictions on lobbyists, clean up federal contracting, improve whistle-blower protections for federal employees and reduce cronyism in political appointments.

Some employee groups said yesterday that they expect to see Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) serve as a bridge between Waxman and Davis on federal employee issues. Van Hollen said he "would be happy to work with both of them," adding that he hopes to find "some long-term resolution" that ends annual legislative fights over contracting out of federal work.

Outsourcing efforts "have demoralized people throughout the federal workforce," Van Hollen said. "The amount of time, energy and anxiety spent going through this process has far outweighed any benefit."

If the Senate changes party control, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, a career Democrat who won as an independent, seems likely to take the helm of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

The committee is chaired by Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), and she and Lieberman have enjoyed a collegial relationship on a number of issues, including how to restructure the Federal Emergency Management Agency after the administration's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina.

The shift to a divided government could make it difficult for either side to launch initiatives that directly affect federal employees, analysts said.

"Federal employees should expect that things will go slow on the president's agenda, and they have gotten a two-year break in the action," said Paul C. Light , a New York University professor who studies public-service issues.

George Nesterczuk , a Republican policy adviser on civil-service issues, said the election results would not stop the White House from continuing with its management changes inside agencies. Still, he added, "Quite frankly, I don't see much happening in the next two years."

Robert M. Levi , director of government relations at the National Association of Postmasters, noted that a number of moderate Republicans lost Tuesday, raising the prospect that the next Congress may be more interested in fiscal discipline.

"When the House considers whether it wants to reduce the budget deficit, what are they going to look at, and how are federal and postal employees going to be impacted by the desire to reduce the budget deficit?" Levi asked.

But congressional aides said Washington area advocates for federal employees will resist any deficit solutions that carve into federal benefits.

Those members include Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who may be the next majority leader of the House, Reps. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), Van Hollen and Davis and Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.).

John Gage , president of the American Federation of Government Employees, and Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said they would redouble efforts to block contracting plans at agencies where they represent workers.

Gage and Ron Ault , president of the Metal Trades Department, AFL-CIO, said defense unions will lobby the next Congress to repeal the new National Security Personnel System, which overhauls pay and workplace rules for Defense Department civilians.

"We need to kill NSPS once and for all," Ault wrote to union leaders yesterday.

Light and others said they doubted Congress would abolish a personnel system only two years after authorizing its creation. But Light said the election means the NSPS will continue "at a much slower pace" and under more rigorous oversight by Congress.

Power Cleaning (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Revenge belongs to the Democrats on Capitol Hill, not that they'd ever take advantage of such a thing. They say they're going to be fair. And nice.

But on the off chance that they might desire just an itty bit of payback, things could get interesting in the House over the next two years. There are a lot of things a newly anointed majority party can do to annoy a minority party, and plenty of reasons they'd want to -- particularly if they've been under the other party's thumb for 12 long years.

Perhaps we shouldn't call this revenge. Perhaps this is just what a party in power does. Dogs chase squirrels, and the majority party in the U.S. House gets to throw its weight around a little.

Here's Dick Armey describing it. Armey, of course, was a big wheel in the Republican leadership the last time this happened, in 1994, when the Republicans won the House after 40 years of being out of power. They were primed for retribution. They had suffered the Democrats' abuse. But Armey doesn't call it abuse. He calls it "good-natured stuff."

For example, the time in the late '80s when Armey asked House Speaker Jim Wright if he could have a small vacant space that was just sitting there, next to Armey's office, and the speaker acted surprised that any such empty room existed, and promised he'd look into it, and a few days later some Democrat started moving his belongings into that space? That, says Armey, was "kind of funny."

It was in this spirit of joviality, once the Republicans took over, that Armey went to the new speaker, Newt Gingrich, and suggested that the Texas Democrats who had been gathering weekly to lunch, year after year, in the speaker's dining room should be assigned a more fitting space.

Perhaps something in the basement.

"Newt thought I was being mean," Armey says. But it wasn't meanness. "This is Tevye in 'Fiddler on the Roof.' It's tradition."Cellar Dwellers

Tradition!

"The first thing you've got to learn is that from now on, you don't get upstairs," says former Democratic congressman and former West Virginia governor Bob Wise, recalling how some of the meeting rooms for Democrats were downgraded when the Republicans took over after '94. Members' personal offices are doled out on a seniority basis, but control over many other rooms falls to the majority.

No more "charming" meeting rooms with "ornate paneling," Wise says. Hello, "sterile white walls." During the first months of the Republican takeover, Wise wrote a piece called "Diary of a Congressman" for Washington Monthly. Here's the entry for Feb. 22, 1995: "The President comes to the Hill. Republicans give us a basement room. Classy."

It's just no fun being the minority party. Not when you've gotten used to the feeling of power. Suddenly, Cabinet officials who once conferred with you are now calling someone in the other party. Now, you call a news conference and no one comes.

"Twelve years later, all of my former staffers still call it the Great Depression," says Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.). "You're in the majority, you have the gavel, the staff's much larger than the minority's, you control the agenda and then the next day . . ."

The next day, the gavel disappears in a puff of smoke. (Okay, not really. You get to hold on to it till January. Cradle it in your arms, if it helps you feel better.)

"Quite often, the minority is given much less useful work space," says Scott Lilly, who used to be the Democratic staff director on the House Appropriations Committee. Minority committee staff may find themselves in a cramped, windowless office, far from that beautiful view of Rayburn Park. Far from everything, really.

Office space may seem petty, but it counts for a lot. It is both a practical and a psychic burden when an office manager's space is so small she can't even push her chair back to stand up. After the '94 elections, a Republican congressional aide bought her colleagues tape measures in anticipation of their new, grander offices. The Republicans were tasked with figuring out just what property, exactly, they were now in charge of doling out.

"That cracked us up," Armey says. "In one case, we found a whole building we didn't know we owned."Arrogance or Gamesmanship?

Revenge is in the eye of the beholder. It may be that power is innately corrupting, or perhaps it only appears that way from the outside. It may also be -- and this is key -- that the things a party must do to pass legislation and stay in power are inherently unpleasant for the other party. In any case, it turns out that Democrats and Republicans have something in common. They both think the other guys are arrogant when they're in charge.

"They had been pretty arrogant about their use of power," former congressman Bob Walker (R-Pa.) says about the Democrats.

They had "an arrogant disregard for the House as an institution," former congressman Martin Frost (D-Tex.) says about the Republicans.

The House under a Democratic majority was at times "run like an old Southern plantation," says Thomas E. Mann, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution. He says the Democrats saw themselves as a permanent majority, and could be stingy and abusive. One Republican staffer said in '94 that the Democrats had treated his party like "scullery maids." Former Democratic speaker Tip O'Neill was suspected of deliberately mispronouncing certain Republicans' names. Republicans took to calling the institution an "imperial Congress."

As for the just-demoted Republican majority, Mann says, they abused the rules to keep the Democrats from being heard or from participating in the crafting of legislation. He and Norman J. Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute have written a book called "The Broken Branch," about the intense partisanship they say the Democratic majority started and the Republican majority continued and, in some cases, made worse. They and others list practices such as closed-door sessions that shut Democrats out of negotiations, "closed rules" that don't permit members to offer amendments to legislation, and the majority party's practice of holding votes open past the traditional 15-minute period to persuade more members to vote its way.

When the Republicans came to power after '94, they promised they would not try to get "even," promised they would be more fair and magnanimous than the Democrats had been.

Recent highlights from a most unhappy union:

2003: A session on pension legislation devolves into name-calling when Democrats say they haven't had enough time to read a substitute measure. Republican Bill Thomas, chairman of Ways and Means, refuses to delay a vote. Democrats march out to a nearby House library. Thomas calls the cops to evict them.

2005: Republican F. James Sensenbrenner, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, becomes impatient with Democrats criticizing the USA Patriot Act. He bangs his gavel, adjourns the hearing and walks out. Democrats continue to testify with their microphones shut off.

Nancy Pelosi, who is primed to become the new speaker once the Democrats take over in January, has been promising a new era of civility and bipartisanship in the House. Those good intentions will presumably be the angel on her shoulder. On her other shoulder, however, there may be temptation . . .

"It's in our mutual political interest to try to work out a bipartisan agreement on legislation," says Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.), who is slated to become the new chairman of Ways and Means. "It's up to me and the Democratic leadership to convince those new Democrats who don't know what it's like to legislate that if they want to get even they can never get anything done."

"I think there are going to be two strains of thought in the caucus," says former representative Vic Fazio (D-Calif.). "One will be 'Let's get the bastards.' And the other will be . . . 'Why don't we try to get this place more livable, more workable?' "

Fazio says he thinks Pelosi is sincere when she says she wants to make things better. On the other hand, "should the Republicans go into a kamikaze mode trying to exploit every opportunity . . . who knows how long the Democratic patience will last?"

Who knows? Maybe, just maybe, they'll find some way to get along. Maybe Pelosi won't send Republicans down to basement meeting rooms.

That incident in 1995 when Armey managed to get the Texas Democrats banished from the speaker's dining room? It turns out Gingrich relented in the end, according to Texas Democrat Gene Green, who says several Democrats appealed to the new speaker. Green himself made an appeal. Back then, he was a relative newbie, a "low person on the totem pole," but one day circumstances conspired to allow him to talk to Gingrich.

"He and I were in the men's restroom on the second floor," Green says. "And I said, 'Mr. Speaker, what's the problem with the Texas Democrats having the speaker's dining room?' And he said, 'I have no idea.' "

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

The New House Majority Offers Bipartisanship -- And An Ambitious Agenda (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Congressional Democrats savoring their return to power pledged yesterday to work closely with President Bush on a legislative agenda but demanded a change in course on Iraq and new directions on policies such as the minimum wage and stem cell research.

Democrats were on the verge of capturing the Senate last night to go along with the House majority they won on Tuesday. In Virginia, former Navy secretary James Webb appeared to have defeated incumbent George Allen (R) in the last remaining Senate race, although Allen had yet to say whether he would ask for a recount.

In the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who is poised to succeed J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) as speaker, promised swift action early next year on a Democratic package that includes an increase of $2.10 an hour in the minimum wage, full implementation of the recommendations of the bipartisan Sept. 11, 2001, commission, and making some college tuition payments tax-deductible.

Pelosi said she will not heed the calls of some activists on the left to explore impeaching the president. But with subpoena power and committee chairmanships, Democrats will ensure that Bush's anti-terrorism and war policies receive tough scrutiny in the last two years of his presidency. "Democrats are not about getting even; Democrats are about getting results," Pelosi said at a news conference. "I have said before and I say again, impeachment is off the table."

Voters on Tuesday handed Democrats control of the House for the first time since 1994, giving the party a gain of 28 to 30 seats. In January, Pelosi will become the first female House speaker. Hastert, the longest-serving Republican speaker, announced he will step aside and let a new generation of party leaders emerge after this week's losses.

Montana Democrat Jon Tester was declared the winner yesterday in his race with Conrad Burns, the fifth incumbent Republican to fall in the Senate. Democrats need to pick up six seats to gain the majority. As for the Virginia race, with Webb leading by 6,697 votes, even Senate Republican aides were quietly saying their majority was over.

In morning phone calls, Bush congratulated Pelosi, the House minority leader, and Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), and invited them to a White House lunch today. Bush and Pelosi pledged to put behind them a bitter campaign, in which the president had asserted that a Democratic victory would be a victory for terrorists and Pelosi repeatedly questioned his competence.

"I've been around politics a long time," Bush told reporters. "I understand when campaigns end and when the governing begins."

But policy clashes are inevitable. Control of both houses of Congress would ramp up pressure on Democrats to turn their calls for change into quick legislative accomplishments.

Beyond the Democrats' planned 100-hour blitz to pass most of their legislative agenda, Pelosi reiterated her pledge to restore fiscal discipline to Congress. That could pit her promises of federal largesse against Democratic desires not to roll back the president's tax cuts before their scheduled 2011 expiration dates. She also vowed to enact far-reaching controls on lobbying and ethics that Republican leaders promised this year but did not deliver.

The Democrats' victories also spell trouble for Senate confirmation of interim U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton and greatly complicate Bush's efforts to appoint conservatives to the federal bench. The administration is virtually certain to face greater congressional scrutiny -- and possibly new legislative restrictions -- on warrantless wiretaps, trade pacts, interrogation techniques for detainees and other controversial policies.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said in an interview on Washington Post Radio (WTWP-FM) that Bush will be "reacting to subpoenas flying, investigations."

"If we tended to underinvestigate, I think you'll see Democrats tend to overinvestigate," Davis said.

Tuesday's election results could be a boon for backers of wide-ranging changes to U.S. immigration laws, one of the few areas in which Bush differed with House Republicans and sided with a bipartisan Senate approach. The GOP-controlled House had insisted on dealing only with measures calling for tougher border and workplace enforcement, rejecting calls by Bush and the Senate for an expanded guest-worker program and possible pathways to legal status for millions of illegal immigrants. A Pelosi-led House is far more likely to embrace some or all of the Bush-Senate approach, lawmakers said.

"A great deal will depend on whether the president is committed to getting this done," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), a champion of the broader immigration rewrite, said in an interview. He said Republicans have overestimated the appeal of a punitive approach to immigration problems, noting the defeat of Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.) -- a chief proponent of deportations and border crackdowns.

Yesterday, Bush said of comprehensive changes to immigration laws: "I think we have a good chance. . . . It's an important issue, and I hope we can get something done on it."

Among the many possible clashes between Bush and the new Congress is the question of whether to permit federal funding for research involving new lines of embryonic stem cells. Bush used his only veto this year to block such legislation, which passed both houses comfortably but not by the two-thirds majority needed to override a veto. The new Democratic-controlled House would appear to remain short of a two-thirds majority favoring more embryonic stem cell research, but the revised political dynamics might force the administration to reconsider its position.

And there will be investigations and hearings, especially into the conduct of the war in Iraq and waste in contracting. Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) said yesterday the first move he will make as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee will be the reestablishment of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations, abandoned by Republicans when they took the majority.

More than anything else, public unhappiness over the Iraq war powered the Democrats' success Tuesday, according to exit polls, but it was unclear yesterday how much the new Congress will or can do about the conflict. Reid called on Bush to "convene a summit of congressional leaders" to discuss the war. "We've got to work together to change direction in Iraq," he said.

But before such tasks can be tackled, both parties will have to decide who will lead them in a transformed Congress. Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the House minority whip, launched his battle for the post of majority leader yesterday against Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who became a hero to many liberal Democrats with his early calls for a withdrawal from Iraq.

Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said he would announce today whether he will challenge House Democratic Caucus Chairman James E. Clyburn (S.C.) for the post of House majority whip. If he does, that race would pit the person who can claim a large share of the credit for Tuesday's electoral victories against the only African American in Democratic leadership.

Meanwhile, Hastert, who has been criticized by some for not intervening in the Mark Foley page scandal, announced he will not seek the position of House minority leader next year.

In his wake, a scramble began immediately. Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) will square off with conservative Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), who took a shot at the current leadership in a letter to colleagues saying that "we did not just lose our Majority -- We lost our way. We are in the wilderness because we walked away from the limited government principles that minted the Republican Congress." Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.), chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, said he may also run.

In Montana, Tester, the state Senate president, held a lead of 2,847 votes -- or 0.7 percent -- over Burns, a three-term senator. Tester declared victory yesterday morning. Burns did not concede, saying, "There is no need to rush to a conclusion when the voters are this close."

"Senator Burns's campaign will do what they think is right when they think it is right," Tester told reporters in Great Falls, Mont. "And I am okay with that. We won this thing."

A spokesman for Secretary of State Brad Johnson, a Republican, said all votes had been counted, except for about 1,000 provisional ballots and an unknown number of military ballots from overseas that could still arrive. The spokesman, Bowen Greenwood, said it is unlikely but not impossible those uncounted votes could bring Burns within a 0.5 percent margin -- approximately 2,000 votes -- and thus allow him to ask for a recount.

Democrats Looking Ahead To January (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP, November 9, 2006

Restored to power, congressional Democrats pledged Wednesday to press for a new course in Iraq and move promptly to raise the minimum wage. "We will not disappoint" the American people, said Rep. Nancy Pelosi, speaker-in-waiting.

At a news conference in the Capitol, Pelosi pledged that Democrats will make the next Congress "the most honest, ethical and open" one in history.

She made her comments with the extent of the Democrats' triumph in Tuesday's midterm elections still unclear.

DOJ_NMG_0092299

Several House races remained too close to call, and the size of the new Democratic majority seemed likely to grow by a few seats. The battle for Senate control hinged on the outcome of a tight Virginia election. There, Democrat Jim Webb led Republican Sen. George Allen by more than 7,000 votes as state election officials canvassed the returns.

Pelosi and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada both said they would work with President Bush in a bipartisan manner, and made the same commitment with respect to congressional Republicans.

"If Democrats go in and seek retribution, we lose," agreed Sen.-elect Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, who defeated two-term Sen. Mike DeWine.

At the same time, Democrats made clear they intend to use their power.

Several Democrats suggested during the day that Bush meet with leaders to conduct a high-level review of the war in Iraq, a conflict that is unpopular with the public and that polls said had contributed to the Republicans' electoral defeats.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., in line to take back the chairmanship of one powerful committee, told reporters he wants the Federal Communications Commission to hold off on its vote on AT&T Inc.'s proposed acquisition of BellSouth Corp.

Dingell said the acquisition raises a "significant antitrust question," and sent a letter to the FCC asking that it hold off on the vote until after the new Congress convenes in January.

"I think it would be in their interest, I think it would be in the interest of the committee and I think it would be in the interest of the public," he said.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., in line to head the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, declined to discuss possible tax increases or changes in Medicare in an interview with reporters.

He said his top priority was to close the tax gap — referring to money that taxpayers owe the government but do not pay. "My only fear is that Republicans might call this an increase in taxes," he said.

He also criticized an IRS program that makes use of private tax collectors rather than government employees to seek taxes owed. "I think it is terrible for taxpayers to believe they are going to be hounded by the same kind of debt collectors," he added.

The minimum wage increase is one of a handful of measures Pelosi had promised to bring to the floor of the House in the first 100 hours it is in session under Democratic control next January.

Republican congressional leaders have maneuvered successfully to block passage of a minimum wage increase in recent years, but voters in six states approved ballot measures on Tuesday mandating raises. "When Washington doesn't act, then America does," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., who would become chairman of the committee with jurisdiction over the issue if his party wins the Senate.

The current federal minimum wage is $5.15 an hour. Legislation backed by Democrats in the House and Senate would increase it to $7.25 in three steps, although Pelosi has not yet said precisely what bill she intends to bring to a vote.

Pelosi, following up on a campaign promise, said Democrats would seek passage of several bills in the first days of the new session.

In addition to the minimum wage hike, Democrats will push to implement the recommendations of the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 and a reduction in the interest rate on student loans. Other items include legislation to promote energy independence, allow expanded stem cell research with federal funds and a call for lower drug prices under the Medicare prescription drug program.

Apart from a legislative agenda, Democrats awoke to a leadership election. While Pelosi's selection as speaker is unlikely to be contested, two senior Democrats maneuvered for election as majority leader.

Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland is the second-ranking member of the leadership, and said as the election returns were counted on Tuesday night that he would run for leader. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a prominent critic of the war, said he, too, will run.

Murtha is close to Pelosi, while Hoyer and she have clashed in the past. Pelosi sidestepped a question during the day when asked whether she would intervene in the race.

If Democrats were dividing up the spoils of victory, Republicans were sorting out their own future.

Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., announced he will not run for party leader when the new Congress convenes under Democratic control. That leaves Ohio Rep. John Boehner, the current majority leader, and Indiana Rep. Mike Pence, a prominent conservative, as rivals for the post. Rep. Joe Barton of Texas is another potential contender.

Hastert said he intends to remain in Congress, but other Republicans suggested that may not last long, adding that Bush may want to make the Illinois Republican an ambassador.

Pelosi Promises To Be A Bipartisan House Speaker (MERCN)

By Margaret Talev And William Douglas

The San Jose Mercury News, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092300

WASHINGTON - Nancy Pelosi, who's expected to be the next speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, signaled Wednesday that she intends to steer a centrist course and work across party lines with President Bush to shape policy on Iraq, energy, Social Security and immigration.

Pelosi acknowledged that her party's return to the House majority after a dozen years in exile occurred largely because at least nine fairly conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats won Republican seats. The liberal-tilting House Democratic caucus must accommodate them - and the centrist voters they represent - she conceded.

"Impeachment is off the table," she declared, spiking one dream that many liberal activists cherished. "Democrats are not about getting even . . . This election is about the future, not about the Republicans."

Pelosi's great challenge is to keep her party's liberal and more conservative wings united behind achievements that win the respect of voters in the presidential election year 2008, especially the great centrist bloc that abandoned Republicans across the country Tuesday. If Democrats pursue an excessively partisan agenda over the next two years, President Bush can block them with his veto, and centrist swing voters could be repelled by Democratic partisanship just as they apparently were by Republicans this year.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., who's likely to become Senate majority leader, echoed Pelosi's conciliatory tone. "We are not going to treat the Republicans like they've treated us," he said. Reid will become majority leader if Democrat James Webb's 7,000-vote lead over Republican Sen. George Allen in Virginia survives an expected recount.

Al From, the founder of the Democratic Leadership Council, the centrist wing of the Democratic Party, said that between now and 2008, "if Democrats act as problem solvers, not polarizers, that future will be very bright."

Pelosi, a 66-year-old San Francisco liberal who'll be the first female House speaker in history, used her first post-election news conference to quell speculation about how she intends to govern her fractious caucus.

Even as she pledged bipartisanship however, she challenged Bush to "signal an openness to new, fresh ideas," especially on Iraq, by dumping Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, a move that, as it turned out, the president announced an hour later.

Pelosi also reiterated the Democrats' consensus agenda for the 110th Congress, which convenes in January:

_Raising the minimum wage.

_Repealing oil company subsidies.

_Expanding stem cell research.

_Allowing the federal government to negotiate lower prices from pharmaceutical companies for Medicare and Medicaid beneficiaries.

_Reducing college loan rates.

_Tightening lobbying restrictions.

_Adopting the 9-11 commission's anti-terrorism recommendations.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., the chairman of the Republican National Congressional Committee, who narrowly survived a stiff re-election challenge, said that while he was willing to work with Democrats in theory, "I never saw many opportunities to count Democratic votes that wanted to come in partnership with us." He predicted that Democrats would try to raise taxes and Republicans would fight such efforts and quickly regain a majority.

"We're going to take a two-year hiatus," Reynolds said.

"She has to figure out how to tear down a wall that exists between the Republican and Democratic parties," said Rep. Allen Boyd, D-Fla. "That's the failure of the Republican Party in the last 12 years . . . They've really tried to govern and had their speaker try to be a speaker of the Republican Party and not the whole House and not for all Americans. And you see what's happening."

Scott Lilly, a veteran House Democratic staffer who's now at the Center for American Progress, a liberal research center, said House Democrats must resist the impulse to pursue big ambitions such as a comprehensive health-care plan or an education overhaul.

"There's an appetite for major health-care reform, in doing something substantial in elementary and secondary education," he said. "That's not going to happen. The president would veto a number of those things."

Pat Toomey, the president for the Club for Growth, a pro-business conservative group, predicts that Pelosi "is going to find it hard to hold that caucus together. It is an ideologically very diverse caucus and the extremes are very, very far apart. I think she's gonna find she's got a tough job ahead."

Pelosi, who's now the House Democratic leader, and Reid, who's now Senate minority leader, are expected to win the top leadership posts in caucus elections next week.

New Democrats Pose Challenge (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0092301

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — Carol Shea-Porter is a New Hampshire social worker who campaigned on the cheap and ran hard against the war in Iraq. Heath Shuler is a North Carolina football star who is pro-gun and anti-abortion. Jerry McNerney is a California alternative-energy entrepreneur with a doctorate in mathematics.

Together they are part of the new mosaic of the Democratic Party in the House of Representatives — incoming lawmakers who will make a diverse group of political officeholders even more eclectic. While much of the focus in the campaign was on the more moderate tendencies of Democratic contenders, the scope of Tuesday's Democratic surge makes for a more complex picture and a broader mix of ideologies.

"Every type of Democrat won last night, Northeastern, Midwestern, Southern, Texan, Western, liberal, moderate, conservative and many whose ideology defies easy description and should be best described just as a Democrat," said Simon Rosenberg, head of the New Democrat Network, an advocacy group.

The results of some close races remained in question Wednesday but Democratic officials said they thought they would be seating at least 28 new members, bringing the party's totals to at least 230 in the 435-member House. They are still trying to get a handle on exactly who some of these people are, but it is clear they present a different tableau from the liberal lions who will be taking and retaking the chairmanships of some important House committees.

The diverse viewpoints and backgrounds they are bringing to Washington could pose problems for Representative Nancy Pelosi of California and Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the newly empowered Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, as they quickly move to line up lawmakers behind the party's stances on national security, economic and social issues. The rank and file was eager to be unified when it meant a chance to overturn Republican rule; now Democrats must set the agenda and deliver.

"How are Senator Reid and Speaker Pelosi going to forge consensus on Iraq and on a budget?" Mr. Rosenberg asked. "Where are we going to end up on these two vital things, given the extraordinary diversity of this new Democratic majority?"

Mr. McNerney is a giant killer who, with help from the party and environmental groups, knocked off Representative Richard Pombo, chairman of the Natural Resources Committee. Mr. Shuler, one of the most conservative incoming Democrats, defeated Representative Charles H. Taylor, an eight-term Republican who had served on the Appropriations Committee since 1993. Ms. Shea-Porter, with no help from the party, pulled off one of the upsets of the night in defeating Jeb Bradley.

Keith Ellison of Minnesota, a state lawmaker and the first Muslim elected to the House, sees himself as a champion of economic justice. John Hall of New York, a rock musician and writer of pop hits like "Still the One," is a longtime critic of the nation's energy policy. Harry Mitchell, the former mayor of Tucson, is a veteran politician with a keen interest in immigration policy who is already the subject of a statue in his hometown.

"We are the most diversified caucus in the world and we think that is the great strength of the Democratic Party," said Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, chairman of the Democratic caucus.

As they strode triumphantly through the Capitol on Wednesday, celebrating Democrats said that they were not worried about the party — which benefited from the support of independent voters who want to see legislative gains instead of gridlock — finding common ground.

"We have to get things done for the American people," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who oversaw the Democratic campaign effort for the Senate. "The greatness of this country is being stalled as we are unable to move forward on education and on energy and on Iraq and so many other issues."

The stands some new Democratic senators take could pose difficulties for their own party. Bob Casey of Pennsylvania, who beat Senator Rick Santorum, is an ardent opponent of abortion; Jon Tester, the Montana farmer with a trademark flattop who claimed victory over Senator Conrad Burns, could also emerge as a maverick.

Mr. Reid played down possible divisions, saying that Senate Democrats have shown they can overcome ideological differences. "We have widely varying political philosophies within this team," he said. "And what we've done is we've used these team members with their strengths, and we're going to continue to do that."

In the House, Democratic unity could also be tested in relations between the new committee chairmen — many of whom are liberal veterans who wielded power years ago, when the party last controlled the House — and new lawmakers who have no recollection of the days when chairmen ran the show and the rank and file followed along.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that while there were ideological distinctions among the new Democrats entering Congress, most could fit in the centrist part of the spectrum. And all, he said, have an overriding political bond.

"They are reformers in spirit and temperament," Mr. Emanuel said.

DOJ_NMG_0092302

About half the incoming Democratic freshmen are already planning on joining the New Democrat Coalition — a generally centrist group that emphasizes economic competitiveness and national security issues. They include Ed Perlmutter of Colorado, a former state senator who had a legislative reputation for working with Republicans; Michael A. Arcuri of upstate New York, a seasoned district attorney; and Tim Mahoney, the Florida businessman who won the seat that the Republican representative Mark Foley resigned because of the Congressional page scandal.

Other Democrats in the group intend to enlist with the Blue Dog Coalition, a more conservative group viewed as having a more rural outlook and a focus on balancing the budget.

But both groups emphasize trying to find legislative consensus.

“The message from the American people is clear,” said Representative Ellen Tauscher, a moderate from California who is chairwoman of the New Democrat Coalition. “They want leaders who will fight for pragmatic policies that improve their lives, whether the issue is Iraq, health care or anything in between.”

Ms. Shea-Porter, relishing her victory Wednesday, said she shared that view and was coming to the House eager to try to fix problems despite differences in outlook she might have with her colleagues or the opposition.

“People are so tired of the factions of party and they have been begging us to get together and work things out,” she said. “I have the soul of a Democrat, but I also come from a Republican family, and I know we have to reach out.”

The 'Thumping' Of The GOP (WP)

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH responded swiftly to Tuesday's electoral "thumping," as he put it at yesterday's news conference. The president's decision to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is late but welcome, especially insofar as it reflects a willingness to bring a "fresh perspective" to the increasingly troubled situation in Iraq. Mr. Bush's choice of former CIA director Robert M. Gates to take over at the Defense Department increases the likelihood that this shift is more than a political bone thrown to an unhappy electorate. Mr. Gates is a member of the Iraq Study Group, chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana Democratic House member Lee Hamilton; he is also a seasoned national security professional who could press the president to embrace options he has resisted, such as reaching out to Iraq's neighbors.

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made" in Iraq, Mr. Bush said. It's good that he heard their message; he ought to consult congressional Democrats about a course correction. But Mr. Bush was right yesterday in signaling the limits of such cooperation: "If the goal is success, then we can work together. If the goal is get out now regardless, then that's going to be hard to work together."

If the president said many of the right things yesterday, so, too, did the incoming House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), and Nevada Sen. Harry M. Reid, who is on the cusp of becoming majority leader. In a procession of news conferences, it seemed at times that the politicians were vying to see who could mention bipartisanship most often and pledge civility most passionately. Given that Mr. Bush came to Washington promising to "change the tone" and instead presided over six years of almost unrelenting partisanship -- not to mention his out-of-bounds campaign rhetoric equating a Democratic victory with a win for terrorists -- it's a bit hard to take all this post-election happy talk too seriously. The same goes for Democrats, given their similarly over-the-top venom toward Mr. Bush. But both sides clearly heard voters' disgust with Washington politics-as-roller-derby, and they may share an interest in avoiding a replay of such brawling.

Indeed, the greatest opportunities for real bipartisan cooperation may involve not Iraq but domestic issues. Yesterday Mr. Bush mentioned raising the minimum wage, at the top of Democrats' immediate agenda; reauthorizing the No Child Left Behind law, one of the president's early, and rare, moments of bipartisan cooperation with Democrats; and immigration reform, a subject on which the president has been more in sync with congressional Democrats than with his own party. The contours of a comprehensive immigration compromise were well defined last year; Mr. Bush and the new congressional majority should act swiftly to make that law. Much harder, but even more important, will be finding bipartisan will to tackle the growth of entitlement programs such as Social Security and Medicare, a subject that Mr. Bush raised yesterday. If Democrats aren't responsible enough to stop using those issues as political footballs and start considering the future fiscal health of the country, they won't deserve to remain in the majority.

Pelosi To Be First Woman To Lead Congress (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nancy Pelosi wasted no time making clear who's in charge now.

“Democrats are ready to lead,” the San Francisco congresswoman declared at a news conference Wednesday, hours after her party reclaimed control of the House of Representatives to end 12 years of Republican rule.

DOJ_NMG_0092303

And prepared to lead the Democrats is an Armani-clad daughter of an old-fashioned Baltimore politician about to become the first female speaker of the House — two heartbeats from the presidency.

Voters "spoke out for a new direction," said Pelosi, who promised to be "the speaker of the House, not the speaker of the Democrats." She reached out to Republicans, saying she seeks bipartisanship: "Democrats are not about getting even."

President Bush responded in kind. He pledged to work with Democrats and leave behind the harsh campaign attacks exchanged by both sides. "If you hold grudges in this line of work, you'll never get anything done," he said.

How the two will get along is anyone's guess, given their diverse personal and political backgrounds. What is clear is that Pelosi has been preparing for this day.

During a campaign stop in Albuquerque on Oct. 28, a man asked what a female speaker is called. "They say 'Madame,' " she replied, "but you can call me Nancy."

Next week, the new Democratic majority elected on Tuesday plans to choose Pelosi to wield the speaker's gavel. She would officially take it from Republican Rep. Dennis Hastert of Illinois in January.

That would put her in the constitutional line of presidential succession behind Vice President Cheney and make Pelosi, 66, the highest-ranking woman in U.S. history.

"My first excitement is that there will be a Democratic speaker," Pelosi said in a pre-election interview.

She learned politics in the front room of her family's corner row house in Baltimore's working-class Little Italy. Like her five older brothers, "Little Nancy," as they called her, took turns keeping a "favor file" for her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., a Democratic congressman and mayor.

Now, Pelosi is about to reach the top rung of a ladder that Montana's Jeannette Rankin began climbing 90 years ago when she became the first woman elected to Congress.

"It's tough. You talk about the glass ceiling. This is the marble ceiling," Pelosi said. Her ascendance, she said, tells women "they can handle power at any level, that we can breathe air at this altitude," and it "bodes well" for a woman to be elected president.

As polls in the campaign's final days pointed to a Democratic victory, Republican TV ads and e-mails demonized the House minority leader as a San Francisco liberal.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich, who led the GOP revolution that ended 40 years of Democratic rule in 1994, circulated an e-mail to news organizations and Republican activists that said her "left-wing values are rejected by most Americans."

The message apparently didn't resonate. Nearly half of those surveyed in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll last month never heard of Pelosi or had no opinion about her.

Pelosi's San Francisco district is one of the most liberal in the country — 14% voted for Bush in 2004 — and she makes no apologies for her constituents' values.

She says conservative critics are "afraid of the fact that every child in San Francisco has health insurance, that our minimum wage is over $8 an hour." As one of her first acts, she has vowed to push for a hike in the federal minimum wage, now $5.15 an hour.

Vin Weber, a GOP strategist and former Minnesota congressman, warns, "If Republicans believe this caricature of Nancy Pelosi as a wacked-out San Francisco liberal, they're going to find out it's not true and (will) underestimate her. … She comes out of a family famous for having extraordinary practical political skills."

Thomas D'Alesandro III, Pelosi's brother and also a former Baltimore mayor, says, "She knows how to read people. She got that from my father. She's not confrontational. She tries to seek a consensus."

That doesn't mean the mother of five (who awaits the birth of her sixth grandchild this week) is a pushover, according to those who've worked with her.

Former Texas congressman Martin Frost says he learned that firsthand when he opposed the then-No. 2 minority leader for the top Democratic post in 2002. Pelosi easily defeated the moderate lawmaker. He compares her to Margaret Thatcher, Britain's first female prime minister, who he says was "very steely."

Pelosi moved into the leader's office promising a four-year plan to move back into the majority. She made good on her vow in part by raising more than $50 million this election cycle, the most of any Democrat other than former president Bill Clinton and his wife, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

She let Democrats know that their chances to chair plum committees "would be determined by how loyal they were and how active in fundraising," Frost says. She made it clear there would "be consequences" if they weren't, he says.

It was a change from Pelosi's predecessor, Missouri congressman Dick Gephardt. Frost said Gephardt would "try to get (Democrats) to do the right thing with the carrot rather than the stick. She's more into the stick."

Gephardt, whom Pelosi criticized for supporting the resolution in 2002 that authorized military force in Iraq, said in an interview that when he stepped down from his post to run for president, “the caucus was ready for a little more disciplined approach, and she brought that.”

House Democrats under Pelosi's prodding voted together 88% last year, according to Congressional Quarterly, the most unified stance in the past half-century.

Michael Franc of the conservative Heritage Foundation says Pelosi “found ways to inject an animal spirit that melded together the moderates with the most traditional liberals in ways I have not seen before. It was the shared mission that if we all stick together, our odds of recapturing the House go up immeasurably.”

It wasn't easy. Pelosi and other Democrats clashed over:

·Social Security. When the White House pushed for Social Security individual accounts last year, some Democrats such as Florida's Robert Wexler wanted to present their own plans to fix the retirement program. Pelosi brushed them aside to focus on defeating Bush's plan. She succeeded: It was shelved without coming to a vote.

·Iraq. The war has divided Democrats, but Pelosi put the best public face she could find — that of a highly decorated former Marine, John Murtha of Pennsylvania — out front. Murtha, a strong supporter of the military, called last year for a swift withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. He said the war was wearing out the military.

Murtha had the behind-the-scenes blessing of Pelosi, who he says kept liberals “quiet” so the Vietnam War veteran could neutralize GOP charges that Democrats were weak on defense. “She's tougher than hell,” Murtha says. “I heard her tell one guy, ‘If you're not with us, we're not with you.' ”

·Ethics. Pelosi angered the Congressional Black Caucus when she pushed to remove caucus member William Jefferson of Louisiana from a powerful committee. She acted after the FBI said it found $90,000 in a freezer during a search of his home for a bribery investigation. She said she wanted to contrast her action with GOP leaders. They did not punish any members tied to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

·Payback. When John Conyers of Michigan, in line to chair the Judiciary Committee, suggested Bush be impeached, she squelched the idea. “There's not going to be any impeachment. That would make the Republicans' day,” she says. “What we are about is the future.”

Pelosi says she won't emulate Republicans who froze out her party from shaping legislation. “We're talking about opening Congress. It may have worked for them to consolidate their power, but it isn't right and it isn't what the American people expected.”

Dick Armey, a former Republican House majority leader who worked with Pelosi, says of her and the Democrats, “She will try to be more inclusive. One of their complaints is they've been left out of the process, cut off, ignored. They are going to try to demonstrate we are bigger than that.”

Some moderate Democrats hope they won't be left out, either. “There (have) been instances where she hasn't been as inclusive as she should have,” says Rep. Adam Smith of Washington. “It would be a mistake, but I'm optimistic that won't happen.”

Pelosi says she has big plans for the first 100 hours of a Democratic majority. Among them: “Sever unethical ties between lawmakers and lobbyists,” enact the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and negotiate lower prices for Medicare prescription drugs.

Political scholar Stephen Hess of the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, says Pelosi “is no Newt Gingrich. She really isn't intellectually interesting. Gingrich came up with ideas. … With her, I don't know whether that's true or not. We have to see if she is really ready for prime time.”

Weber says Pelosi “is capable of being an effective speaker but faces significant constraints” from “the very energized, very angry” liberal base of her party, some of whom are in no mood to work with Republicans. “There's a good chance almost nothing will get done in the next couple of years,” he says.

A divided Senate, even a narrowly Democratic one, and the need to attract independent voters for the party to win the White House in two years will require Pelosi to reach out to Republicans. “The way she governs will be absolutely critical for the Democratic Party in '08,” says Bruce Cain, a political scientist at the University of California, Berkeley. “She's got to find the right balance.”

That means working with a still-Republican White House. Pelosi appealed to Bush “to work together to find a solution to the war in Iraq.”

Days before the election, she said three letters she and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sent Bush offering to do that went unanswered. “I feel a little bit like Paul to the Corinthians. Paul wrote to the Corinthians all the time, but it's a mystery to all of us whether the Corinthians ever wrote back,” said Pelosi, who attended Catholic school. “I hope (Bush) would respect the office of speaker” and write back next time.

Wednesday, Bush picked up the phone and invited Pelosi to lunch today at the White House.

America's First Madam Speaker (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

Vilified in Republican campaigns across the nation as a "San Francisco liberal," Nancy Pelosi - the speaker presumptive of the 110th Congress - actually lives politics closer to her roots in the precincts and wards of Baltimore's Democratic Party machine.

That's not to say she's a backslapping, cigar-champing pol. The totems in Representative Pelosi's office are white Casablanca lilies and San Francisco's Ghirardelli chocolates. Like many Democrats of her generation, she keeps a photograph of herself - then, a credible stand-in for Audrey Hepburn - with President Kennedy on a table in her office.

But what helped Pelosi become the first female speaker - and second in line to the presidency - is old-school pragmatism: a practical sense of how to build power and no qualms about using it.

"The campaign is over. Democrats are ready to lead," she told cheering supporters in Washington on Tuesday.

A prodigious fundraiser with a family fortune, Pelosi openly split with the House's former Democratic leader, Richard Gephardt of Missouri, over the 2002 vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq, which she opposed. When Mr. Gephardt stepped down after Democratic setbacks in that year's midterm election, Pelosi quickly consolidated support to replace him.

She insists that she would not hesitate to defend the nation, if needed. A woman in power is like "a lioness in the jungle," she said at a Monitor breakfast in March. "You know you're dead if you go near the cubs.... If you pose a real threat to the people of our country, you can count on hearing from us very soon," she added.

As minority leader in the House, Pelosi united a diverse and fractious Democratic caucus on more key votes than any leader in the past half century, according to a survey by Congressional Quarterly. She did it by setting clear lines and holding party members to them on the argument that a united caucus had a better shot at winning back the House than did a divided one.

But behind the unity is fear - mostly that she will strip projects or plum assignments from Democrats seen as working too conspicuously with Republican lawmakers.

Critics also charge that Pelosi has let partisanship interfere with legitimate oversight activities of Congress. Last September, when a House committee held a hearing on the government response to hurricane Katrina, she dubbed it a "a partisan whitewash" and urged Democrats not to attend. Two Gulf region Democrats went anyway, and the hearing turned out to be a grilling of Bush administration officials.

Former Speaker Newt Gingrich minced no words in stating his view of a Pelosi-led House. It would be, he said in August, a "disaster" for the country. A bigger tent to manage

As speaker, Pelosi will preside over a very diverse majority - broadened by the influx of red-state Democrats, many of them fiscal conservatives, that gave House Democrats their victory. Most newcomers are expected to line up with the moderate, "blue dog" wing of the caucus. With an expected margin about 30 votes, she will need all her pragmatic smarts to hold the new Democratic majority together.

"Pelosi has been able to maintain unity among Democrats, keep legislators on the same page and on message, count votes effectively, and cause problems for House Republicans. She clearly inherited her father's political skills," says Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University, referring to former Baltimore mayor and US Rep. Thomas D'Alesandro. "Now, she will have no choice but to focus on keeping the Democratic machine intact, pushing her party to focus on politically effective issues and finding policies that will attract some Republican support."

In her first 100 legislative hours at the helm, Pelosi says, she aims to "drain the swamp" by passing a new rules package, including pay-as-you-go budgeting; raise the minimum wage; pass all the independent 9/11 commission recommendations; cut the interest rate on student loans by half; negotiate for lower drug prices in the Medicare prescription-drug program; end subsidies for Big Oil; and allow federal support of embryonic stem-cell research. All these items have at least some support across the aisle but involve bypassing the usual committee-hearing process to gain quick votes on the floor. It's an agenda that will test Pelosi's ability to hold her own majority while winning enough GOP support to get bills to the president's desk. Diversity counts

While current Speaker Dennis Hastert characterizes his role as that of a coach, Pelosi often describes herself as presiding over a room in her "mother-of-five voice." (In fact, she is a mother of five and awaits the arrival of her sixth grandchild.) And there's no word more important in the Pelosi lexicon than "diversity."

Bypassing more senior colleagues, Pelosi appointed Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D) of Ohio to be the first African-American woman to serve on the Ways and Means Committee, Rep. Hilda Solis (D) of California to be the first Latina on the Energy and Commerce Committee, and Rep. Linda Sanchez (D) of California to be the first Latina to serve on the Judiciary Committee.

"She understands the importance of diversity ... of having all groups represented in the decisionmaking process," says Rep. G.K. Butterfield of North Carolina, who serves on the steering committee for the Democratic caucus.

In the next Congress, that committee will consider new rules for committee assignments within the caucus, including whether to downgrade the importance of seniority. "While seniority is important, other factors are as important in a committee assignment or chairmanship, such as geography, race, and political philosophy," he adds.

In a move that has already generated controversy, Pelosi has signaled that she is unlikely to name Rep. Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, to the chairmanship, in favor of Rep. Alcee Hastings of Florida, next in line and a member of the Congressional Black Caucus. Respected in the intelligence community, Representative Harman often worked with the committee's GOP chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan, even as Pelosi urged Democrats to hold ranks.

Caucus moderates are urging Pelosi to embrace the new freshman moderates.

Her "challenge is to wrap her arms around all aspects of the different philosophies that exist in this big Democratic tent, which is much larger as a result of this election," says Rep. Allen Boyd of Florida, a moderate Democrat. "I've tried to encourage ... Pelosi to put them in the room with her when she makes ... decisions."

Meanwhile, feminist activists hailed the historic moment of the first woman speaker ever. "This is the highest political leadership post ever held by a woman and puts Pelosi in the driver's seat as we begin to fulfill the will of the electorate and reshape the national agenda," says Ellen Malcolm, president of Emily's List, a group that supports abortion-rights candidates.

"Seeing this smart, tough, effective woman leading the Congress will help pave the way for the future of all women in politics," she added in a statement. Pelosi basics

· Career: House Democratic leader, 2002-present; Democratic whip, 2001-2002; House of Representatives, 1987-present; Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, 1984-1986; chairwoman, California Democratic Party, 1983-1984.

· Birthplace: Baltimore, Md.

· Current Hometown: San Francisco.

· Education: Bachelor of arts, Trinity College, 1962.

· Family: Husband, Paul; five children; five grandchildren.

· Self-description: "An Italian Catholic mother of five, grandmother of five, going on six."

· Miscellaneous: Pelosi stuffs cotton in her ears when she takes her grandkids to rock concerts. And she's so petite, a policeman once lifted her out of her shoes during an evacuation of the Capitol.

· What to expect with Pelosi as Speaker: Democrats could be expected to let most of President Bush's tax cuts expire and to block any new effort to privatize parts of Social Security.

· Quote: "I think targeting me [during the election] - most people don't even know who I am - is an act of desperation on the part of the Republicans. We're going to keep the focus in a very optimistic way on our new direction."

Pelosi Says Democrats Are Ready To Lead (AP-Y)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 9, 2006

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi — soon to be Madam Speaker — says she had something other than politics on her mind when her phone rang early Wednesday morning.

"I thought it might have been Alexandra calling with some news," Pelosi said, talking about her daughter and the impending arrival of a sixth grandchild. "I picked up the phone and said, 'Do we have a baby coming?'"

"Leader Pelosi?" the voice on the other end inquired.

It wasn't her daughter with news of an overdue baby but rather a White House staffer trying to connect her with President Bush. The president wanted to congratulate her after Democrats upended his party's 12-year reign in the House and put her in charge next year as the first female speaker in the nation's history.

"The call was so very, very early in the morning," an ebullient Pelosi recalled, saying that Bush referred to her as "Madam speaker-elect, and I referred to him as president."

DOJ_NMG_0092307

Rep. George Miller, a California Democratic colleague, said Pelosi had been telling him for three weeks that "everything stops when the baby's coming."

Would a man in her position of power make the same choice? "The record's probably not very good on that," Miller quipped. Alas, the baby didn't come Wednesday.

Such was Pelosi's morning the day after voters gave Democrats at least a 25-seat majority in the House, and put her, a 10-term lawmaker, in the No. 2 spot in the line of succession to the presidency, behind only Vice President Dick Cheney.

She was greeted outside the Capitol by cameras and seventh-graders from Flushing, N.Y., who happened to be there for a tour and ended up getting a hands-on civics lesson from the California Democrat.

"On the day of Jan. 3rd, I'll receive the gavel on behalf of all of the young people in America," Pelosi told the kids. "We're responsible to you."

At more buttoned-down media events throughout the day, Pelosi made it a point to promise repeatedly to work with the Republicans who her party had just drummed.

"Democrats are ready to lead, prepared to govern, and looking forward to working in a bipartisan way with the Republicans in Congress and with the president of the United States," Pelosi said. She planned to have lunch Thursday at the White House with Bush.

Any effort to impeach the president "is off the table," she assured the nation before TV cameras, but she also said American voters "spoke for change and they spoke for a new direction for all Americans."

In an appearance with Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, Pelosi welcomed Bush's announcement he was replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense. "It will give a fresh start to finding a solution to Iraq, rather than staying the course," she said.

She said Democrats would return to power without rancor, but with a forward-looking vision, outlining an agenda that includes enacting recommendations of a commission impaneled after the Sept. 11 attacks to look at terrorist threats, raising the minimum wage, reducing college costs, pushing for more stem-cell research and working for lower medicine prices.

Pelosi will be formally re-elected as her party's leader, and its nominee to be speaker, when the Democratic caucus meets on Nov. 16. The actual speaker's election will occur in January.

While Pelosi is unopposed, other leadership posts are being hotly contested. Current minority whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland and leading Iraq war critic John Murtha of Pennsylvania are vying for the position of majority leader.

Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, a former chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, is in line to become majority whip, but might be challenged by Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who as party campaign committee chairman directed the Democrats' successful election effort.

Pelosi, 66, made history four years ago when she became the first woman to lead a party caucus in either house of Congress.

Her next history-making move is a huge step for women in America, Miller said.

"I think it's just an incredible role model. When I came to Congress (in 1974), there were very few women ... and now a woman is the speaker of the United States House of Representatives. It's really quite something," Miller said.

Pelosi is a liberal who represents one of the most left-leaning districts of San Francisco. Republicans had tried to use that against her. In races around the country, GOP partisans said the possibility of a "Speaker Pelosi" was reason enough to keep the House in Republican hands.

It's not clear which Republican will serve as minority leader. House Speaker Dennis Hastert announced Wednesday he will not run for Republican leader when Democrats take control in January.

The daughter and sister of Baltimore mayors, Pelosi grew up immersed in politics and moved west in her 20s when her investment banker husband wanted to return to his roots. She managed to work herself into California's Democratic political structure while raising five children who were born over six years.

She didn't run for Congress until she was 46, when her youngest daughter reached high school.

Nancy Pelosi Is Ready To Be Voice Of The Majority (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 8 — As Representative Nancy Pelosi faced the cameras Wednesday morning, after the Democrats had taken a majority in the House and put her on the brink of becoming the first female speaker, she spoke so softly at first that some reporters insisted they could not hear her.

“I’m not in charge of the technical arrangements,” Ms. Pelosi said quietly, fiddling with the microphone.

Then suddenly, she was commanding: “But I could use my mother-of-five voice!”

DOJ_NMG_0092308

It is a line Ms. Pelosi uses often, and a voice she may have to rely on frequently as she tries to ensure that the new Democratic majority lasts more than two years.

As speaker, she would be second in line to the presidency — the closest a woman in elective office has come to the White House. And while she has been a leader in Congress for years, and the target of Republican attacks, many Americans still do not know who she is. Her new job places her on a more visible stage, with much greater stakes.

Ms. Pelosi, 66, who has been a San Francisco congresswoman for 20 years, became minority leader and then guided her caucus to victory by enforcing remarkable party discipline. She curbed the demands of those who share her often-caricatured liberal values, while making a place for the party's conservatives, for whom San Francisco is sometimes as distant as the moon.

She finds herself now with a more diverse caucus than before, some of its liberal members elected on a pledge to pull out of Iraq immediately, some members so conservative they often sounded like Republicans during their campaigns. She also has to work with Republican House members and a president she blasted — and took a blasting from — during a bitter two-year campaign.

Her friends say her background — as the daughter of a Baltimore mayor and congressman, the youngest and only girl in a family of six children, and the mother of five — has prepared her perfectly.

"I'll say to her, 'Nancy, I'd blow up if I had to deal what you deal with,' and she says, 'I had five children in six years,' " said Representative Anna G. Eshoo, Democrat of California, an old friend of Ms. Pelosi. "If there wasn't discipline in her house, there would have been chaos. She knows how important that is."

Ms. Pelosi's colleagues and friends describe her as a person of singular focus. That was evident as the House worked its final night before breaking to campaign for the midterm elections, significantly distracted by the resignation of Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, after he was revealed to have sent sexually explicit electronic messages to Congressional pages.

Toward midnight, Ms. Pelosi took the floor. "As a mother and grandmother and the leader of the House Democrats," she began, demanding an investigation into what House leaders knew about the Foley messages. Republicans booed, a rarity even in the raucous House chamber. She pressed on, however, smiling her unbudging smile.

"Mr. Speaker, once again, as a mother and a grandmother," she continued, demanding that the votes be recorded.

Representative George Miller, Democrat of California, said, one of the things that motivated her to run for leadership "was that people didn't want to win."

"They were all going through the motions, but they weren't kicking it into gear." he said. "She looked around and said, 'What is this? I didn't come here to hang out.' "

After the Democrats lost in 2004, Ms. Pelosi talked to consultants about how the party could win, rather than resigning itself to minority status. Their suggestion, her advisers said, was to "take down" the president; it was not enough to simply kick him in the shins. Then, the consultants advised, she had to differentiate between the two parties, and finally, articulate the positive things that the Democrats would do.

She fought the president first on Social Security, sending Democratic lawmakers to tell the elderly in town-hall-style meetings that the president's plan for change would reward Wall Street at their expense.

While she had long opposed the war, she also realized that a liberal congresswoman from California would have little impact in speaking out against it. And she pushed back against liberal members of her party who wanted to protest by denying financing for the war. Instead, she worked quietly with Representative John P. Murtha, a conservative Democrat from Pennsylvania and a veteran who had supported the war, to get him to express his growing doubts about it.

Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, said: "The most credible person in the Democratic Party would be the face of the party on this issue. She knew that because he had supported it, he had the greatest credibility to critique it."

Mr. Markey called Ms. Pelosi a liberal pragmatist: "San Francisco on the inside, Baltimore on the outside."

When Ms. Pelosi and Senate Democratic leaders were drafting their "Six for '06" platform going into the campaign, she pushed back on including traditionally liberal ideas like universal health care.

"She realizes that you cannot make everyone happy," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

Ms. Pelosi has used a style that one Democratic aide characterized as "chocolate and the gavel" to bring party members along. As she rose through the ranks, she would often deliver chocolate cakes to supporters or helpful staff members, and now her meetings are characterized by bowls of Ghirardelli chocolate. Representative Gene Taylor, a conservative Democrat from Mississippi, was heartened when Ms. Pelosi called to encourage his efforts after Republicans had refused to extend health benefits to reservists in a military appropriations bill. Mr. Taylor had voted against her in the leadership elections, but the gesture was the start of a positive relationship.

“She puts a very big premium on people who have ideas, but not if you think your idea is to the exclusion of everyone else’s input,” Mr. Taylor said.

Where the history is not so clear is whether Ms. Pelosi can find common ground with Republicans, if they let her. Her advisers say she wants to work in a bipartisan manner, but that does not mean agreeing to everything.

The biggest question is how Ms. Pelosi will define her relationship with President Bush. Her staff says the two already have some rapport because of the documentary film that her youngest child, Alexandra, made about the president’s 2000 campaign. But that is different from a working political relationship.

She will have her first chance on Thursday, when she has lunch with Mr. Bush.

In a rare unscripted moment Wednesday, Ms. Pelosi noted that Mr. Bush had telephoned her that morning. “He called to congratulate me, referred to me as Madam Speaker-elect,” she said, smiling. She paused, then — still smiling — added, “I referred to him as Mr. President.”

Democrats To Usher In Change In Judicial Nominations, Investigations (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 9, 2006

Democrats, as widely expected, wrested control of the House of Representatives from the Republicans, after 12 years of Republican rule, in elections across the country Tuesday, setting the stage for a series of intensive investigations of the Bush administration by several different House committees.

But it appears Democrats also carried the Senate -- radically changing the politics of federal judge-picking as well -- and that victory was something of a surprise, even to them. As of Wednesday afternoon, Democrat James Webb had claimed victory in the Virginia Senate race over incumbent Sen. George Allen, but a recount that could take several weeks appeared likely. If Webb is indeed the winner, Democrats will have a 51-49 edge.

"There just wasn't a firm sense this would happen," says a senior Democratic staffer. "It could have been as few as two pickups," the staffer adds, referring to previously Republican seats won by Democrats. "But six was at the high end."

The Democratic Senate victory, assuming it holds, could also have profound implications for the next Supreme Court pick, if 86-year-old Justice John Paul Stevens dies or resigns, or another justice resigns or falls ill, during the last two years of the Bush administration.

"The biggest thing [about the Democratic takeover] is judges," notes David Hoppe, former chief of staff to Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. "Everything else has a way of working itself out," adds Hoppe, now a lobbyist at Quinn Gillespie & Associates.

By midday Wednesday, Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats had already plunged into discussions over the agenda they planned to carry out in their expected majority status.

If they are indeed the majority, then when the 110th Congress begins in January, the Senate Judiciary Committee will be led by Vermont's Patrick Leahy, a 32-year veteran who had previously chaired the committee for 18 months, from mid-2001 until just after the 2002 elections, after the departure of Vermont's James Jeffords from the Republican Party.

Legislatively, the changes between a Leahy-controlled committee and the current committee, under Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., shouldn't be that extreme; the men are relatively close ideologically.

The major difference will be the politically contentious issue of federal judges, especially federal circuit judges, as well as a possible Supreme Court replacement.

At the very least, a Democratically controlled Senate Judiciary Committee would make it unlikely that President George W. Bush's most conservative choices will even get out of the committee. That would leave Bush with two choices: He could pick more moderate conservatives that would pass Democratic muster, or he could pick highly conservative judges who would not get a majority committee vote, a choice that would give the Republicans' ultraconservative base an energizing issue.

That strategy may be difficult, however, in the event there is a Supreme Court replacement, notes Hoppe.

"If there is a vacancy on the Supreme Court, it will be harder to say, 'Gee, golly, I won’t fill it,'" he says.

In both the Senate and House, Democratic majorities will almost certainly translate into one major change: more oversight.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will revisit the lack of habeas corpus rights for Guantanamo Bay detainees, the administration's warrantless surveillance program, and patent reform, according to lobbyists who follow the committee.

In the House Judiciary Committee, the gavel will move to Michigan Rep. John Conyers, a mercurial veteran who on Tuesday was elected to his 21st House term.

Conyers' staff were in meetings all day Wednesday, so a future agenda for the upcoming majority staff was difficult to determine.

DOJ_NMG_0092310

But Conyers will certainly share certain oversight duties with Henry Waxman, the California Democrat who will chair the House Committee on Government Reform. That committee, which was expanded during the years of the Clinton impeachment, has maintained a large staff. And Waxman has a reputation as an aggressive investigator.

While in the minority, Waxman has continued to produce investigative reports; one of the most recent, documenting the links between ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the Bush White House, resulted in the resignation of Susan Ralston, then a White House aide to Karl Rove.

Hoyer, Murtha Battle (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin And John Bresnahan

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

As Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) pledged Wednesday to rule the House fairly in the 110th Congress as the first-ever female Speaker, a handful of senior Democrats moved aggressively to secure other leadership posts in their nascent majority.

One day after Democrats decisively seized control of the chamber from the GOP, one of the architects of that victory — Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) — remained mum about his plans despite speculation that he could run for Majority Whip.

Current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) was not similarly hesitant, formally announcing his bid for the Majority Leader's office early Wednesday morning and confidently predicting that he will secure the post when Democrats vote in leadership election on Nov. 16.

"I think I'm going to win," Hoyer said in an interview Wednesday. The Maryland lawmaker, who has served as Minority Whip since 2003, said "over a majority" of House incumbents as well as newly-elected lawmakers "have indicated that they would be supportive of me."

But Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) — who stunned fellow lawmakers when he announced in June that he would campaign for the Majority Leader post against Hoyer — re-affirmed his own interest in the office Wednesday.

"I'm working diligently now trying to convince people that I'd make a good balance" to the leadership team, Murtha said in an interview with National Public Radio.

The Pennsylvania lawmaker declined to be interviewed for this article.

Murtha, who is the ranking member of the House Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, also defended his decision to seek the leadership post, asserting that not only is the office an "open seat" in the new Congress, but arguing that he outranks Hoyer in the Caucus hierarchy.

"There's Nancy Pelosi, [Appropriations Committee ranking member Rep.] Dave Obey (D-Wis.) and myself, and then Hoyer is listed after me in the power plays," Murtha said on NPR.

That assertion bewildered at least one Democratic House lawmaker, who spoke on the condition of anonymity: "In my mind that shows a lack of understanding. I like Mr. Murtha but that's not just the way it is."

"There is real genuine concern that we don't want to see a divisive leadership fight, just at the time that we're seeing tremendous success and tremendous unity and harmony and good feelings in the Caucus," the lawmaker added.

Although some Democratic lawmakers have acknowledged their support for one of the would-be Majority Leaders, neither Hoyer nor Murtha have released lists of backers.

Hoyer asserted Wednesday that doing so could create unnecessary divisions in the Caucus heading into the new session.

"My object is to keep our Caucus unified ... so I'm not going to put out any lists," added Hoyer, who is expected to receive the support of the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Coalition, as well as the New Democratic Coalition.

A group of senior lawmakers representing a broad cross-section of the Caucus — including Reps. Barney Frank (Mass.), John Dingell (Mich.), Henry Waxman (Calif.), Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), Ike Skelton (Mo.), John Lewis (Ga.), Lucille Roybal-Allard (Calif.) and James Oberstar (Minn.) — issued their own letter Wednesday urging fellow Democrats to back Hoyer's bid.

"Steny ... has been an instrumental part of our leadership team, reaching out to all elements of our diverse Caucus and helping to bring Democrats together," the letter stated. "Our continued unity is imperative, and we believe that the leadership team that brought us to this point should continue to lead us in the new Majority."

In addition, the significant time Hoyer has spent over the past two years building a base of support among junior Democrats, including challengers and open-seat candidates, by raising money and making campaign visits to 80 districts, appears ready to pay dividends, as several Members-elect confirmed Wednesday that they will cast ballots for the Maryland lawmaker next week.

"I watched Steny Hoyer for the last few months," said Rep.-elect Albio Sires (D-N.J.), one of several incoming House Democrats who now support Hoyer's bid. "He has worked very hard to keep the Caucus unified and worked on electing new Members. ... I think he has real authentic qualities that earn him a lot of support."

Rep.-elect Brad Ellsworth (D-Ind.) said Murtha called him on Tuesday night, but he was still backing Hoyer, whom he first met in early 2005.

"It's like in anything — when you establish a relationship of trust, it makes the decision easier," Ellsworth said. "Congressman Hoyer was one of the first people in April '05 that I met with when I went to [Washington, D.C.] to decide if I was going to run. Since that time, I have been in contact with him a dozen times or more. ... It just feels more natural due to the relationship that we have that I would support him."

Ellsworth said Murtha called him on Tuesday night to congratulate him on his victory over Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.), but has had no other contact with the Pennsylvania Democrat. "It was on Election Night, a short conversation to congratulate me," Ellsworth said.

Hoyer gave nearly $14,000 to Ellsworth's campaign, while Murtha donated $4,000.

While House lawmakers backing Murtha acknowledge that he does not have one particular base of support, they claim that Murtha will instead draw endorsements from across the Caucus.

"It's not a factionalized race," Rep. Mike Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha backer, said Wednesday.

The Massachusetts lawmaker also added that he has advised Members-elect not to offer endorsements in the race prior to arriving in Washington next week for an organizational meeting of the Caucus

"My hope is that not a single new Member would spend a single second thinking about these leadership races before Tuesday," Capuano said.

In addition to the Majority Leader competition, Democrats could see a contest for control of the third-ranking post of Majority Whip.

Although House Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn (D-S.C.) remained the only active candidate for the post Wednesday evening it is possible that Emanuel, who has said he will not serve a second term as DCCC chairman, will make a bid for the office.

Appearing at a press briefing Wednesday, Emanuel declined to discuss his plans, asserting that he wanted to confer with fellow lawmakers before issuing a decision. "Give me 24 hours more to decide," he said.

But even if Emanuel decides against challenging Clyburn for the post, the South Carolina lawmaker could still face competition. Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.), the current Chief Deputy Minority Whip, has not spoken publicly about her interest in the post, but is nonetheless expected to enter the race if Emanuel does not.

Clyburn officially announced his bid Wednesday in a letter to fellow lawmakers — although he began actively seeking endorsements in mid-October — touting his previous leadership experience, including chairing the Congressional Black Caucus as well as serving three years as the Democratic Caucus vice chairman.

"You run for the next office by serving well in the office you hold," Clyburn said during the DCCC's election watch party Tuesday night.

In the meantime, Pelosi, who is expected to ascend to the Speaker's office in January when Democrats take control of the House, has demurred on whether she will offer her own endorsement in the leadership races, asserting at a Wednesday press conference that Democrats first needed to finalize the outcome of several races.

"Democrats pledge civility and bipartisanship," Pelosi said at a midday press conference, her first in the wake of the Tuesday victory. "Democrats are not about getting even," she later added. "Democrats are about helping America get ahead."

Some Democratic strategists have suggested Pelosi should intervene in the Hoyer-Murtha contest in order to avoid a divisive inter-party squabble so soon after a major electoral victory, but the California Democrat has not done so yet.

"I think that this has to play out on its own," said a top House Democratic staffer, speaking on the condition of anonymity. Another senior House aide said Pelosi "was staying on the sidelines" and has not indicated any willingness to take sides.

Murtha has won kudos from many in the party for his opposition to President Bush on the Iraq War, despite intense criticism from House and Senate GOP leaders, as well as conservative commentators. Hoyer, while not close to Pelosi personally, has raised millions of dollars for Democratic candidates and incumbents, and spent extensive time on the road this election cycle, all of which earned him support within the Democratic Caucus.

In the interim, Democrats will hold an organizational meeting Tuesday, one of the first steps as the Caucus prepare to take over the majority party role it last held in 1994.

According to Capuano, who has overseen a review of the internal Caucus rules in recent months, Democrats will vote Tuesday on a new package of guidelines, covering everything from the selection of committee chairmen to more mundane regulations.

"There's no real shake-up in these rules, the real shake-up will come in the House rules," Capuano said.

Senior House Democratic aides said Pelosi and other Democratic leaders have otherwise done almost no preparatory work on taking over physical control of the House.

DOJ_NMG_0092312

Pelosi has not appointed a trusted Democrat to oversee the transition to Democratic rule, a tactic former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) employed when the GOP won control of the House in the 1994 midterm elections.

Pelosi was very sensitive to accusations by President Bush and other Republican leaders that Democrats "were measuring the drapes" at the Capitol for a takeover, they purposely delayed any transition planning.

"[Pelosi] put the nix on anyone doing the transition," said a high-ranking Democratic aide.

Bush did telephone both Pelosi and Hoyer early Wednesday morning — he joked at a press conference that he had given Pelosi "the name of some Republican interior decorators who can help her pick out the drapes in her new office" — and the Democratic leaders are scheduled to have lunch at the White House today.

"I had a very cordial conversation," Hoyer said of his conversation with Bush. "Over the next two years, he wants to work together. If that's the posture he takes, we want to do the same."

Blue Regime Augurs A Shift In Chairs (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A day after winning control of the House, Democrats appear on the verge of taking over the Senate as well, giving them the ability to steer the agenda across Capitol Hill.

Though the Virginia outcome isn't official yet, it appeared last night that Democrat Jim Webb was about to prevail in the final Senate race Democrats needed to take effective, though exceedingly, narrow control. The Associated Press, after a statewide check of local election officials, declared Mr. Webb the winner after determining his razor-thin lead would hold up after a canvassing of the statewide vote.

The Republican, Sen. George Allen, isn't yet conceding. The Senator "wants to be sure all the votes are counted," said Dan Allen, a spokesman, last night. Republican officials said Sen. Allen is likely to want to wait until an initial canvassing of the results reported by the state's voting districts is completed before considering a concession. That canvassing might be completed today, they said.

If the canvassing doesn't show any anomalies, Sen. Allen might not seek the full, statewide recount he could request under state law, officials said. The new AP count showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236.

Earlier yesterday, Democrats also prevailed in the other Senate race that was too close to call on Tuesday night after the polls closed, the contest in Montana. Democrat Jon Tester was declared the narrow winner there when all votes were in.

The victories in Montana and Virginia would give Democrats an effective 51-49 majority. It would elevate Nevada's Harry Reid to the post of Senate Majority Leader, and he would then oversee Congress with Nancy Pelosi of California, who is poised to become Speaker of the House. Democrats would control both the House and Senate for the first time since 1994, when Republicans won a landslide election.

Technically, the Senate would be divided 49-49 between Republicans and Democrats. But the chamber also will include two Senators -- Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont, both of whom say they will align with Democrats.

Despite that, Democrats face a challenge translating the gains at the polls into wins on Capitol Hill. With the threat of a filibuster always possible, most legislation needs 60 votes to pass the Senate. President Bush also holds veto power.

Still, the Democrats' victory will have broad impact on how Congress conducts business. Democrats will take over dozens of congressional committees and will have the power to set the agenda for those panels. Some in line to become chairmen have suggested that, even if they can't pass legislation that Mr. Bush would sign into law, they would use the power of the gavel to conduct oversight hearings and investigations into the administration and some of its corporate allies.

In the Senate, Pat Leahy of Vermont would take over the Judiciary Committee; Hawaii's Dan Inouye would take the reins of the Commerce Committee; Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts would inherit the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee; and Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico would run the Energy and Natural Resources panel.

A former lawyer, Mr. Leahy has talked about removing the antitrust exemption for some insurance companies. Mr. Kennedy has plans to lead the charge on raising the minimum wage and expanding health care to the poor and needy.

At the Commerce Committee, Mr. Inouye champions many of the maritime and telecommunications policies of current chairman Republican Sen. Ted Stevens of Alaska. A major rewrite of the telecommunications law isn't likely to be affected by the changeover.

Likewise, Mr. Bingaman likely wouldn't bring major changes to energy legislation. The current chairman, Pete Domenici, joins him in representing New Mexico in the Senate. One difference is that Mr. Bingaman is a stronger supporter of renewable fuel and alternative energy sources.

The same goes for the Senate Banking Committee, where Connecticut's Chris Dodd is in line to be chairman. Few industry watchers expect a significant shakeup in the tone coming from the committee, which oversees the Securities and Exchange Commission and Federal Reserve, among others. The impact may be felt around the margins, with credit-card companies and big business potentially losing ground to insurers and retail investors.

In the House, the incoming chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, John Dingell (D., Mich.), has told the Federal Communications Commission to hold off on approving the merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp. until he formally takes control of the panel next year. Mr. Dingell may ask for conditions on the merger that his predecessor, Texas Republican Joe Barton, didn't.

Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.), expected to take over the Financial Services Committee, will focus attention on affordable housing and predatory lending. But Mr. Frank also hopes to enact new regulations on government-sponsored enterprises, such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, that were endorsed by the current chairman, Mike Oxley (R., Ohio).

Rep. Charles Rangel, (D., N.Y.), who inherits the Ways and Means Committee, said he is inclined not to try to repeal Republican-passed tax cuts which are set to expire in 2010. In a conference call with reporters yesterday afternoon, Mr. Rangel said he wants to close the so-called tax gap between the amount of money the Internal Revenue Service is owed and how much it collects.

The IRS relies on private-sector companies to help it collect revenues that it is owed. Mr. Rangel said using private debt collectors is "terrible." Mr. Rangel said he would like to approve legislation as early as next week to exempt million of taxpayers from paying higher taxes under the alternative minimum tax.

Rep. Henry Waxman, (D., Calif.), who will run the Government Reform Committee plans to probe oil-company prices, government contracting in Iraq and massive growth in homeland-security expenditures.

Others assuming committee chairmanships in the House include Michigan's John Conyers at the Judiciary Committee; California's George Miller at the Education and Workforce Committee; and Wisconsin's David Obey at the Appropriations Committee. They are among the longest-serving lawmakers on Capitol Hill. Mr. Conyers, 77, began his career in Congress as an intern to Mr. Dingell, 80, about a half-century ago.

Democrats Promise Radical Reform (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, November 9, 2006

Democrats in the House of Representatives on Wednesday declared themselves ready to press forward with an ambitious agenda and promised to enact the kind of change that they said voters demanded on Tuesday.

But they also tried to deflect attention from the liberal records of those set to ascend to top jobs in Congress, vowing to work with Republicans.

“We extend a hand of co-operation to the president, our colleagues across the aisle,” said Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago Democrat who led the party’s campaign committee. “We’ll work with you when we agree, we will challenge you when we don’t. But our goal will always be the best interests of our country.”

Uncertainty over which party would control the Senate – and the possibility that President George W. Bush could use his veto – necessitated such an approach. But so too did the growing strength of moderate Democrats, who expect to hold considerable sway in the new House.

“We will be the group that gave the Democrats the majority,” said John Tanner, a Tennessee congressman who is among the leaders of the Blue Dog coalition, a group of moderate Democrats who stress fiscal responsibility and often come from socially conservative districts.

Public expectations are also likely to shape the Democrats’ agenda. “This Democratic majority has heard the voices of the American people,” Nancy Pelosi, who will become the first female speaker of the House, said on Wednesday, with Iraq the place where the demand for change is most clear. Despite pleas from some on the left of their party, Democrats have ruled out impeachment proceedings against Mr Bush for his conduct of the war. They have also vowed not to cut off funding for US troops in Iraq.

A CBS News/New York Times poll this week found that 41 per cent of voters – and 50 per cent of Democrats – said that the war in Iraq would be the Democrats’ top priority if they controlled Congress. While Democrats portrayed the election as a referendum on Mr Bush and the war in Iraq, the difficult situation on the ground and divided views about what to do there, as well as the need to avoid appearing weak on national security and the White House’s power in this area will make quick, tangible progress difficult to achieve.

Mrs Pelosi has focused immediate attention on an aggressive package of measures that she said Democrats would enact in their first 100 hours in the majority.

Prompted by a series of recent ethics scandals, the top item in that "Six in '06" platform is a set of rules changes, which Mrs Pelosi said would "make this the most honest and open Congress in history". After Democrat complaints that Republican leaders frequently excluded them from debate and other House functions, she also pledged to restore civility and give the minority party a broader role.

The early agenda also includes increasing the federal minimum wage, enacting the homeland security recommendations of the bipartisan 9/11 commission, promoting stem-cell research and reducing university costs, by making tuition tax deductible and halving interest rates on student loans. Other priorities include giving the government the power to negotiate with drugs companies to lower prices in the Medicare prescription drug programme, eliminating what they say are Republican-backed incentives to shift jobs overseas and rolling back subsidies for big oil companies, using those funds to promote alternative energy sources instead.

"Jobs, healthcare, education, energy independence, a safer America, a dignified retirement – that's what the Democrats are all about and we're going to do that in the first 100 hours," Mrs Pelosi said on the campaign trail.

Democrats also pledged to adopt so-called "pay-go" rules, which re-quire any new spending or tax cuts to be offset by changes elsewhere in the budget.

Such a move would be popular with the Blue Dogs, who take their name from the Southern description of a party loyalist – one who would vote for a yellow dog if it were on the ballot, as long as it was running as a Democrat. The Blue Dogs were moderate and conservative Democrats who claim to have been "choked blue" by their party in the late 1980s and early 1990s, when liberals were in control.

"It helps force choices," said Mr Tanner.

Tuesday's vote saw the number of Blue Dogs in the House increase from 37 to 44, including several in the Ohio River Valley. Their new ranks include some lawmakers who are likely to become quick celebrities in the capital, such as Heath Shuler, a former Washington Redskins professional football quarterback. Mr Shuler, elected in North Carolina, opposes abortion and gun control.

Mr Tanner said Blue Dogs would also push for a financial audit of all government agencies and for including the costs of the war in Iraq within the federal budget, rather than treating it as a supplemental cost that is not included with other budget calculations.

Mrs Pelosi has earned a reputation as a San Francisco liberal and several Democrats poised to take over as chairmen of key committees have long records on the left of their party.

But James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University in Washington, said a Democratic majority would not be able to base its work on strictly liberal policies. "Elections have mandates, and the number of moderates elected means they'll have to go to the middle."

Finance's New Chair Has Equality On Agenda (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Expect keen wit, tough oversight and a sharply different emphasis when Massachusetts Democratic Rep. Barney Frank, 66, becomes chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, overseeing banking, housing and corporate governance.

One of the few openly gay House members, the Harvard-educated Frank is a liberal on social issues. He advocates tougher regulation in areas than current Chairman Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, but insists he's not anti-business. Frank's goal is to ensure that economic benefits are better distributed.

"We're getting economic growth, but it's coming at very great increases in inequality," Frank said in a recent interview. "How do you do a better job promoting growth without exacerbating" the widening gap between the rich and less well-off?

Among Frank's priorities: expanding affordable housing, enhancing consumer privacy rights and going after predatory mortgage lending. He has introduced legislation to force public companies to get shareholder approval for lavish CEO pay packages and to provide the Securities and Exchange Commission greater authority over hedge funds. Frank has opposed efforts by Wal-Mart and other firms to delve into financial services by acquiring a type of bank.

"He is a liberal who understands markets," says Floyd Stoner, chief lobbyist for the American Bankers Association. "When you work with Mr. Frank you have to be knowledgeable, organized and succinct."

Frank said Wednesday he will wait to announce an agenda for next year. In the short term, one big unknown is whether there will be a push to impose new oversight of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac when Congress reconvenes this month, still under

GOP control. The House has passed a bill letting a new regulator cap the mortgage giants' $1.4 trillion portfolios. The Senate Banking Committee has a tougher stance.

Democratic gains could take some wind out of a business-backed drive to relax provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in reaction to the Enron accounting scandal. Businesses say the act, particularly tighter accounting provisions, is onerous. A Frank spokesman said he is not interested in changing Sarbanes-Oxley but would rather let the SEC use discretion in enforcing its costlier provisions.

Stoner and Sheila Crowley, president of the National Low Income Housing Coalition, note that there has long been bipartisan support on the committee for many issues that Frank champions, such as regulatory relief and housing. With Democrats in control, some of these bills — stymied under the GOP leadership — could have a full House vote.

“He'll hit the ground running, and we'll be there to help that happen,” says Crowley, adding that along with Frank's efforts to build low-income housing, she hopes the committee will provide more oversight of rebuilding on the hurricane-battered Gulf Coast.

Gay rights advocates say Frank's chairmanship has symbolic, as well as substantive, meaning.

“Having him in a chairman's role is important, because I think one of the most important things we should be looking for is that Congress looks a lot more like America,” says Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, a gay rights group.

The first member of Congress to announce he was gay, Frank has sponsored legislation to provide benefits to domestic partners of federal employees.

Frank was reprimanded by the House in 1990 after revelations that a male prostitute he hired as a household employee had run a prostitution business from Frank's home. He survived politically by coming clean to the Ethics Committee.

One of the House's fastest-talking, and fastest-thinking, lawmakers, Frank looks impatient even when sitting still. He is widely viewed as one of the premier speakers in Congress.

“He's one of the best I've ever seen,” says Dan Mica, a former GOP congressman and now head of the Credit Union National Association. “I would never want to debate him on the other side.”

Frank's prickly demeanor can put people off. He told his hometown paper, The Boston Globe, that he would try to tone down his comments if Democrats won the majority, to ensure he doesn't say anything to upset the markets.

Easily re-elected from a district that includes liberal strongholds as well as aging industrial and coastal areas, Frank has secured funds for defense contractors, the fishing industry and tech firms.

A native of Bayonne, N.J., Frank stayed in Boston after graduating from Harvard. He was first elected to Congress in 1980, succeeding Democratic Rep. Robert Drinan, a Catholic priest, who gave up his seat in the face of a Vatican ban on clergy in public office.

Dingell Cautions Fellow Democrats Not To Seek Revenge On Republicans By JOHN J. FIALKA (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Rep. John Dingell, who has long had a reputation as a partisan investigative bulldog, is in the unusual position of cautioning younger Democrats to resist the impulse to seek revenge on their Republican colleagues.

"Revenge makes you feel good," says Mr. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who, at 80 years old, is the most seasoned member of the committee chairmen taking control in the House. "It ain't the right way to go, but it's going to cause me some problems."

In taking back the reins of the Energy and Commerce Committee, for which he was chairman from 1981-94, Rep. Dingell says he plans to run his panel "from the center" and work out a formula for comity that allows Republicans to participate in the panel's decisions and investigations.

But he and other Democrats who want to reach out to Republicans to avoid gridlock may encounter some resistance from younger Democrats, half of whom have never served in a House controlled by Democrats. Many are smarting from being shut out of debates by Republican leaders and see the coming Democratic takeover as payback time.

Mr. Dingell has set an ambitious agenda for his committee, which has jurisdiction over a vast array of issues from climate-change regulations to prescription-drug prices for the elderly to foreign-currency manipulations that, he says, hurts the auto industry and other U.S. manufacturers.

A senior Republican House aide, who recalls the way Mr. Dingell ran the energy panel before, says Republicans see Mr. Dingell as "a very hard driver for his position," but also someone who "generally believes he works with both sides of the aisle."

DOJ_NMG_0092316

Michael Kitzmiller, one of Mr. Dingell's former committee staff directors, cautions that Mr. Dingell's approach was far from free of partisan rancor. "We had these conflicts [with Republicans] that were just horrendous, but he had a way of not letting it explode to destroy the basic comity of the committee," he said.

Mr. Dingell also brought Republicans in on his investigations. In 1994, when Democrats lost control, some Dingell aides wrote down the formula he used to coach his investigative staff: "We learned the etiquette of dealing with our enemies: to be gentle, to treat them with the greatest care, to ask them a few nice questions, and then give them exactly what they deserve." Mr. Dingell has it hanging on the wall of his office.

Mr. Dingell governed with a sense of humor. Peter Stockton, one of his chief investigators, remembers his pouncing on a subpoenaed invoice that showed a defense-industry official once billed the Pentagon for kennel charges for a dog named Furston. "Who is Furston?" Mr. Dingell asked the hapless witness, who said he didn't know. "Well, let me read you a voucher here. Is Furston a dog?"

He also used patience. Mr. Kitzmiller recalls becoming so outraged at Mr. Dingell's penchant for protecting the auto industry and resisting gun-control measures that he resigned several times. "He would always call me back later and say 'Well, you don't have to deal with that anymore.' " When one younger member of the committee proved troublesome and always complained about assignments, Mr. Dingell tolerated him. "I said why do you put up with that?" recalls Mr. Kitzmiller. He said "because he reminds me of me."

Some younger Democrats are excited about the man some of them call "Big John" climbing back into the saddle. "He's legendary, well-known for using the committee to really get to the bottom of significant changes facing our nation," says Rep. Tammy Baldwin, (D., Wis.), who joined the panel in 1998 to work on health-care issues.

To some of the younger Democrats, the name Rayburn simply denotes the office building where the committee's office is located. To Mr. Dingell, it means Sam Rayburn, the former speaker of the House who was one of his first mentors when he arrived in Congress in 1955 at the age of 29. Mr. Rayburn's motto was "those who go along, get along."

Mr. Dingell's memories of the ways of Congress go back well before that. According to his aides, he breaks out in archaic language to brand enemies as "blackguards" "know-nothings" "pantywaists" and "lickspittles." This puzzled some of them until one came across a speech given by Mr. Dingell's father, who was also named John Dingell. He came to Congress in 1933 and his son inherited his seat. "The boss sometimes quotes from his father's old speeches," said an aide, who asked not to be identified.

Republicans Blame Their Party Leadership For Tuesday's Losses (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republicans turned on one another Wednesday after losing control of power in Congress - blaming an out-of-touch, self-promoting party leadership for abandoning ethics and conservative principles and turning off the country.

The first political casualty was House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., who announced he'd step down from the party's leadership.

More casualties were possible. At least one conservative movement leader demanded that Republicans in the House of Representatives delay electing leaders for the next Congress beyond the scheduled date of next Wednesday, presumably to allow time to reconsider the current slate.

Discontent could spread to the Senate, where Republicans lost a fifth seat Wednesday in Montana. There, Democrat Jon Tester defeated Republican Sen. Conrad Burns, who was tarred by his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

That put Democrats into at least a 50-50 tie with Republicans for Senate control.

That left Virginia, where Democrat James Webb led Republican Sen. George Allen by about 7,000 votes out of 2.3 million cast. Allen refused to concede, saying he'd wait to see final official results on Nov. 27 before deciding whether to seek a recount.

If Webb's lead holds, Democrats will control the Senate. If Allen wins a recount, then Vice President Dick Cheney would break the tie to let Republicans control the Senate, though their grip on power would be much diminished compared with the past five years.

Regardless of the final outcome in the Senate, Republicans knew they lost power Tuesday, and their leading voices found plenty to blame in their party.

Veteran conservative strategist Richard A. Viguerie was especially caustic.

"Every single member of the Republican leadership in the House should be replaced. They have failed the conservatives who put them in office, and they have failed the people of this country," Viguerie said.

"This election was also a referendum on the so-called `neoconservatives' - the big-government Republicans who took us into a nation-building war while they busted the budget and enriched big business and its K Street lobbyists."

DOJ_NMG_0092317

"I feel liberated," said conservative radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh, one of the party's biggest cheerleaders. "I no longer am going to have to carry water for people who I don't think deserve having their water carried."

In one of the most stinging indictments, David Keene, the longtime president of the American Conservative Union - the nation's oldest grass-roots conservative lobby, founded in 1964 - ripped Republicans for spending more taxpayer money than Democrats had and for weak ethics.

"We have watched Republicans elected by promising the highest standards in terms of integrity come to Washington to do good and stay to do well for themselves, their families and their friends, and demean the offices to which they were elected in the process," Keene said.

"We have witnessed the hypocrisy of Republican leaders who came to Washington swearing an allegiance to upholding traditional values work to protect those among their number who have flaunted those values, morals and standards.

"We have stood by as Republicans have flaunted, twisted and ignored rules to achieve their own partisan, rather than principled, ends; leaders who have used earmarks to seduce reluctant members to vote for legislation they knew was wrong and kept votes open for hours while they and their White House allies bludgeoned their colleagues into line in support of such legislation," Keene said.

Keene joined Rep. Eric Cantor, R-Va., in urging House Republicans to postpone their leadership elections until January. Cantor is a member of the existing House Republican leadership as chief deputy whip. Among the many Republicans mentioned as a possible challenger was Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., leader of a large bloc of both social and economic conservatives.

Others argued that voters were turned off by the climate in Congress, particularly by its partisanship and a sense that Republican leaders looked the other way at scandals, from Abramoff's lobbying corruption to former Florida Rep. Mark Foley's sexual harassment of teenage male aides.

Hastert presided over a partisan, one-party rule that shut Democrats out of negotiations. He wouldn't even allow the House to vote on an issue unless it could pass solely with Republican votes.

Voters "believed that we came to Washington to change government and government changed us," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

Voters also rebelled at the sense that the Republican Congress didn't get anything done.

"There was a feeling of a do-nothing Congress," Republican pollster Ed Goeas said.

He said voters wanted "bipartisan solutions rather than the partisan bickering we've seen" and that Republicans want the party "to make sure our leaders have public service as their highest calling, not personal enrichment."

Conservative Talkers, Feeling Just A Little Blue (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Conservative commentators were bloodied but unbowed yesterday.

After a day in which Republicans lost their grip on the House and appeared on the verge of forfeiting control in the Senate, some of the right's most prominent voices found little cause for discouragement.

"Democrats, in my mind, don't have a mandate because they stood for nothing," radio host Laura Ingraham told her listeners yesterday.

"Republicans lost last night, but conservatism did not," Rush Limbaugh said on the 600 stations that carry his program. "The Democrats beat something last night with nothing. They advanced no agenda, other than their usual antiwar position."

Two distinct camps quickly emerged among the columnists, talkers and bloggers who spent much of the last six years defending the administration. One carried an air of defiance, the other a mood of resignation that what President Bush yesterday called an electoral "thumping" was perhaps deserved.

"People are obviously depressed, but there's also been a sense among conservatives for a long time that Republicans deserved to be taken to the woodshed, and perhaps this will be cathartic," said Rich Lowry, editor of National Review. The Democrats "had the virtue of not being the Republicans and benefiting from an unpopular war and not having high-profile corruption issues hung around their necks, but they also made themselves acceptable to voters."

Moments after the interview, as the president announced that he was replacing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Lowry wrote on his magazine's Web site that "a lot of Republicans are probably yelling right now, 'Why didn't you do it BEFORE the election?' Of course, he couldn't have done it right before the election, but a few months ago it might have been a step toward giving the public the fresh look/approach it wanted with regard to Iraq."

Ingraham said after her show that she is "very confused. Wasn't it just last week that the president said Rumsfeld was doing an 'excellent' job? And hasn't the president consistently said that his war policy is driven by what is happening on the ground in Iraq -- not politics or polls?

"Six months ago the White House could have replaced Rumsfeld, tying the decision to lack of adequate progress in the war -- but doing it the day after the election looks weak and defensive, and a move aimed at placating Speaker-to-be [Nancy] Pelosi."

Beyond the Pentagon and politics, there was simply the trauma, known to every high school athlete, of losing the big game. Commentator Sean Hannity sounded like a therapist as he addressed his followers yesterday: "I know a lot of you are sad. I know a lot of you are bummed. I know a lot of you are depressed. . . . I'll give you 24 hours and then I'm going to tell you to get over it. Don't let yourself wallow in what has happened here."

Brian Maloney struck an equally upbeat note on his Radio Equalizer blog: "Unlike Democrats after their 2004 election debacle, it doesn't seem likely that many conservatives will threaten to move to Canada, spend months in therapy, or engage in angry, unhinged public meltdowns. Welcome to the No-Sulk Zone!"

Some pontificators weren't in mourning for their formerly favorite political party.

"The voters gave the Republicans a well-earned kick in the gut," Atlanta radio host Neal Boortz wrote on his blog, adding that the GOP "bore little resemblance to the Republican majority that rode to power 12 years ago. In 1994 we were promised less government. Over the next 12 years the Republicans more than doubled the size of the government. . . . We were promised fiscal responsibility. We got a bridge to nowhere in Alaska."

Liberals are accustomed to dealing with big political defeats, having gotten plenty of practice in 2000, 2002 and 2004 as Democrats were relegated to minority status. Left-wing blogs have flourished, and liberal radio programs have gotten a foothold. Now conservative pundits, who have been riding high for so long, will be getting some practice.

After months of arguing that a Democratic victory would hand over the House to such scary figures as John Conyers, Barney Frank and Charlie Rangel, some conservatives now say that the winners are not just a collection of loony libs.

Attorney Scott Johnson, who writes for the popular Power Line blog, said from Minneapolis that he is "disappointed" in the voting but takes solace in the fact that "a number of conservative Democrats were elected in the House and Senate. I don't know how that plays with the antiwar, McGovernite thrust of the critique of administration foreign policy."

In certain conservative quarters, there was little effort to dispel the aura of gloom. Blogger Dean Barnett acknowledged online: "We made a case to the American people. They didn't buy it because they thought it was a weak case. And you know what? They were right. In the closing weeks of the campaign season, I felt like I was a lawyer who had a bad client while writing this blog."

But Limbaugh said he felt liberated at no longer having to "carry the water" of Republicans who don't deserve it.

For some, though, there may be a financial silver lining. Lowry noted that National Review's circulation tends to jump when the other side is in power, surging to 280,000 during the Clinton administration, only to decline to 150,000 during the Bush reign. He now expects another bump as conservatives get agitated about the Democrats' new clout in Congress.

"That doesn't mean I was rooting for Nancy Pelosi to be speaker," Lowry insists.

GOP Starts To Play The 'blame Game' Over Its Big Losses (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, November 9, 2006

When a political party suffers a major defeat, soul-searching and ideological bickering follow.

Republicans continued that tradition Wednesday, launching a period of self-reflection by trading barbs and pointing fingers.

Commentator Rush Limbaugh accused the Republican Party of straying from its conservative ideology, saying, "This non-partisan Republican identity, that's what went down in flames." Former House majority leader Tom DeLay referred to his party's losses as a "Texas whooping" on MSNBC. He said Republicans had failed to fight for their core beliefs on such issues as tax reform and immigration.

Dick Armey, former House majority leader and an architect of the Republicans' 1994 takeover of Congress, told National Public Radio's Diane Rehm that the GOP had become the big government party. "They actually grew the government," he said.

President Bush took a jocular swipe at his top political adviser, Karl Rove, who is credited with Bush's victories in 2000 and 2004 and GOP gains in the 2002 congressional elections. "I obviously was working harder in the campaign than he was," Bush said.

Post-election finger-pointing is normal, Republican strategist Scott Reed said. "This is a big party made up of economic conservatives and social conservatives, and there will be an attempt to play the blame game," he said.

The party's self-analysis began about a month ago, when polls predicted Democratic wins, Reed said. "These efforts usually make the party go back to its fundamentals, make it more focused," he said.

Democrats went through a similar period in the late 1980s, when the presidency seemed out of reach, said Will Marshall, president of the Progressive Policy Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0092319

“Parties that don't engage in honest self-scrutiny rarely reform themselves,” he said.

The Republican Majority for Choice, a lobbying group for Republicans who support abortion rights and embryonic stem cell research, blamed the losses Tuesday on Iraq and “social extremism,” Co-chairwoman Jennifer Stockman said. “Moderates have been alienated for years. This was the last straw.”

Today, the group planned to unveil a campaign and website, modeled after the liberal MoveOn.org site, called RealRepublicanMajority.org. It will begin running TV ads in Pennsylvania on Sunday, contrasting images of Republican icons like Ronald Reagan with social conservatives such as Sen. Rick Santorum, who lost his seat Tuesday.

The campaign will continue through the 2008 presidential election, Stockman said. She said, “It's all focused on making sure the Republican Party returns to the center if there's any chance of keeping the presidency and getting some of these seats back.”

End Of The Revolution (WSJ)

By Dick Armey

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

If there was still any doubt, the Republican Revolution of 1994 officially ended Tuesday night with the loss of at least 28 seats and majority control of the House of Representatives. As I write this, the race in Virginia that will determine if the Republicans also lose control of the Senate is too close to call, but leaning Democrat.

It was a rout.

How did we get here? The war in Iraq and historical voting patterns that favor the opposition party in off-year elections are factors suggested by many post-election pundits. Certainly, the mounting problems in Iraq were on voters' minds, but responsibility for the conduct of the war lies with the executive branch, and President Bush was not on the ballot.

That said, this was a national election, driven by national issues. One big issue in exit polls suggests widespread voter backlash against the "culture of corruption." There is something to this, I think. Over time, too many Republicans in the governing majority forgot or abandoned their national vision, letting parochial interests dominate the decision-making process.

All enterprises have a life-cycle. The Republican takeover in 1994 was the culmination of years of agitation by a relatively small group of political entrepreneurs in the House. Before we could beat the Democrats and their "culture of corruption," we had to beat the old bulls of our own party. They too were driven by a parochial vision, and had grown complacent with the crumbs offered them by the majority. It is often said that Newt Gingrich and I "nationalized" the election in 1994, but what the Contract with America really did was establish a national (as opposed to a parochial) vision for the Republican Party. When we took control, that positive Reagan vision of limited government and individual responsibility provided a great deal of discipline and allowed us to govern accordingly. Our primary question in those early years was: How do we reform government and return money and power back to the American people?

Eventually, the policy innovators and the "Spirit of '94" were largely replaced by political bureaucrats driven by a narrow vision. Their question became: How do we hold onto political power? The aberrant behavior and scandals that ended up defining the Republican majority in 2006 were a direct consequence of this shift in choice criteria from policy to political power.

Nowhere was this turn more evident than in the complete collapse of fiscal discipline in the budgeting process. For most Republican candidates, fiscal responsibility is our political bread and butter. No matter how voters view other, more divisive issues from abortion to stem-cell research, Republicans have traditionally enjoyed a clear advantage with a majority of Americans on basic pocketbook issues. "We will spend your money carefully and we will keep your taxes low." That was our commitment. This year, no incumbent Republican (even those who fought for restraint) could credibly make that claim. The national vision -- less government and lower taxes -- was replaced with what Jack Abramoff infamously called his "favor factory." One Republican leader actually defended a questionable appropriation of taxpayer dollars, saying it was a reasonable price to pay for holding a Republican seat. What was most remarkable was not even the admission itself, but that it was acknowledged so openly. Wasn't that the attitude we were fighting against in 1994?

I've always wondered why Republicans insist on acting like Democrats in hopes of retaining political power, while Democrats act like us in order to win.

I've also wondered why Republicans let their fears and insecurities get in the way of important reforms. They missed the opportunity of a lifetime by failing to embrace retirement security based on personal ownership. Instead, from both parties we heard about "saving Social Security" -- to the extent we heard anything at all. Republicans should be for reforms that free individuals and their families from failed government programs. We should not be for "saving" failed government programs. When we took on welfare reform in 1995, we knew we were taking on a Goliath. Once we threw the first rock, we knew we had to finish the job. Otherwise, the worst claims of our opponents would have stuck with us in future elections. With legislative success, the horrible accusations of our opponents were replaced with reduced welfare roles, and the individual dignity and self-sufficiency that naturally followed.

In 2006, instead of heavy lifting on substantial reforms, House and Senate leaders attempted to rally their political base on wedge issues like illegal immigration and gay marriage. Instead of dealing with spending bills or retirement security, the Senate dedicated two full legislative days to a constitutional ban on gay marriage that no one expected to pass. No substantive legislation was passed dealing seriously with border security and legitimate guest workers (funding for a 700 mile fence was finally authorized, but no funds were appropriated). In both instances, it was pure politics, designed to appeal to angry factions of the GOP base. While Republicans managed to hold conservative Christians, they alienated independents, who represent 26% of the voting population. For the first time in 10 years, independents sided with Democrats by a wide margin. Candidates that bet on the high demagogy coefficient associated with illegal immigration, notably in Arizona, lost.

You can't build a winning constituency based on anger. The American people expect more. That is a lesson Democrats will soon learn if they wrongly interpret the election results as a mandate to "get even."

Moving forward, my advice to Republicans is simple: Don't go back and check on a dead skunk. The question Republicans now need to answer is: How do we once again convince the public that we are in fact the party many Democrats successfully pretended to be in this election? To do so, Republicans will need to shed their dominant insecurities that the public just won't understand a positive, national vision that is defined by economic opportunity, limited government and individual responsibility.

We need to remember Ronald Reagan's legacy and again stand for positive, big ideas that get power and money out of politics and government bureaucracy and back into the hands of individuals. We also need again to demonstrate an ability to be good stewards of the taxpayers' hard-earned money. If Republicans do these things, they will also restore the public's faith in our standards of personal conduct. Personal responsibility in public life follows naturally if your goal is good public policy.

Besides the obvious impact on the House and Senate, Tuesday's elections will no doubt redefine the Republican field going into early presidential primary states like Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. It will be up to grassroots activists in those battlegrounds to establish a constituency of expectations that anyone aspiring to be the next president of the United States must satisfy. To voters I say: Demand substance and you will get it. To Republican candidates for office I say: Offer good policy and you will create a winning constituency for lower taxes, less government and more freedom.

After Losses, GOP Asks: Now What? (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

Even before the votes were counted, the 2006 election set off a sweeping critique of what went wrong both within the Republican Party and among groups that once backed it.

On Capitol Hill, the power struggle to lead the new Republican minority is already under way. On Wednesday, Speaker Dennis Hastert announced he will not to seek the minority leader post in the next Congress.

Those with close ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff - or who knew about disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley's e-mails to pages and failed to act - need not apply. Lawmakers are awaiting the results of a bipartisan ethics investigation on a possible coverup in the page scandal, which could produce more openings in GOP leadership.

But GOP self-critics say that the bad environment - scandals, war, the economy, or the president - doesn't account for this historic GOP defeat. The need, they say, is to get back to the principles that won them their majority in 1994.

Call it a bridge to the insurgent past. While the Republican Class of '94 campaigned to balance federal budgets, the GOP in power has racked up massive deficits. The party that campaigned to limit the size of government instead vastly expanded it. And the party that railed against entitlements created the biggest expansion of one, the 2003 Medicare prescription drug program, in a generation.

"We did not just lost our majority, we lost our way," said Rep. Mike Pence (R) of Indiana, one of 25 Republicans who voted against the prescription drug plan. He also chairs the conservative Republican Study Group, the largest group in the caucus.

"While the scandals of the 109th Congress harmed our cause, the greatest scandal in Washington, D.C., is runaway federal spending," he added in a statement within hours of the historic defeat. Mr. Pence sat out the fight in January to replace Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas as majority leader, but he is now widely seen as a top contender. On Wednesday he announced his candidacy for the top GOP post. "Only by making a dramatic turn in the direction of the Republican Revolution can we hope to attain majority status," he wrote in a letter to his GOP colleagues.

DOJ_NMG_0092321

In a separate statement, Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R) of Texas, who has drawn fire from fellow Republicans for his outspoken opposition to members' pork projects, called for a "return to Republican principles by renewing our commitment to limited government, individual empowerment, a strong national defense and traditional American values."

Along the same lines, the current GOP majority leader, Rep. John Boehner (R) of Ohio, called on the GOP to "recommit ourselves to the principles that brought us to the majority and renew our drive for smaller, more accountable government."

At stake in the next leadership fight is whether the GOP continues as a party of big conservative government or returns to its ideological roots in the Goldwater and Reagan eras, say libertarian critics.

"This is all a debate leading up to 2008, which is when we really get to make our decisions: Are we going to continue to follow the George W. Bush path of big government conservatism or the path of Reagan, Goldwater, and - to some extent - Newt Gingrich," says Ryan Sager, author of the recent book, "The Elephant in the Room: Evangelicals, Libertarians, and the Battle to Control the Republican Party."

Libertarians say the GOP's commitment to a social agenda that bans gay marriage and limits government funding for embryonic stem-cell research also contributed to its defeat this week. If there are new leadership elections, the party's conservative base is "going to be looking to clean house," and wipe away remnants of a leadership machine that "presided over the explosion of earmarks and petty corruption and worse," says Mr. Sager.

Meanwhile, business groups that work with the current GOP leadership are prospecting new ties with the incoming Democratic majority. One thing that Republicans and their critics are missing in the postelection analysis is that "this Congress, though well-intentioned, did not achieve a lot of legislative progress," says Jay Timmons, of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Of the many agenda items left incomplete at the end of the 109th Congress, those that most concern the business community include a permanent extension of the estate tax, renewal of research-and-development tax credits, and plans to bring down the high cost of oil and natural gas by increasing the domestic supply.

"They still have time to do this in the lame duck session," he adds.

Conservatism Is Alive And Well (USAT)

By Jonah Goldberg

USA Today, November 9, 2006

The great irony of the post-election spin fest is that Republicans and Democrats are switching their talking points.

For a year, the Republicans tried to frame the elections as a “choice” between the parties and their respective philosophies. The Democrats insisted that the elections were really just a “referendum” on President Bush, GOP corruption and the war. For most of the campaign season, Democratic leaders Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California and Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada hid in their respective spider holes. Later, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean refused to debate Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman — all for fear of reminding voters that the Democrats are Democrats. This just wasn't part of their playbook and was one reason Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's “botched” joke seemed so deadly: It threatened to remind people that a vote against the Republicans was a vote for the Democrats.

Now that the midterm elections are over, and the GOP has lost the House and possibly the Senate, the Republicans like the referendum spin after all. This was just a year to throw the bums out, they say, and a few scandal-plagued bad apples cost the barrel a whole bunch. Meanwhile, the Democrats insist that voters made a bold “choice for change,” whereas before, change merely meant “not Bush.”

Now change means whatever Pelosi, Reid, New York's Sen. Charles Schumer and Co. want. This is a major bait and switch. If I tell my waiter, “I don't want to eat this hamburger,” I've made a choice for change. That doesn't mean I've automatically embraced whatever he brings me in its place. A moldering pottage of road-killed badger is no less change than a steak. But it's not necessarily what most diners have in mind.

Republicans will have a tougher time winning the spin war, not because they have the worse argument, but because they have a worse environment to make it in. America has been moving to the right since at least 1980 with the election of Ronald Reagan. Since then, the GOP has seen its power and popularity grow as a result, albeit not in perfect tandem. Bill Clinton beat the first George Bush largely because he ran as a centrist Democrat. When he wavered in his centrism, the increasingly conservative electorate punished him with the 1994 Republican takeover of both the House and the Senate, which lasted until this week (not counting the 2002 switch in the Senate caused by the defection of Vermont's Sen. Jim Jeffords). And, of course, in 2000 and 2004, George W. Bush won back to back elections. In other words, the GOP was due for a shellacking, and any shellacking would seem like a sea change. But in a historical sense, this week's shellacking was a bit lacking.

Since the direct election of senators (i.e. the past nine relevant midterm elections), the average losses in a president's sixth year have been 34 House seats and seven Senate seats. By that standard, the Democrats came up just shy of average.

Republican losses in the Senate in 1986 were worse, but few now remember those elections as a national repudiation of conservatism. Yet that's how we're supposed to interpret this week's news. That's hard to do if you look at the candidates who put the Democrats over the top.

Sen. Joe Lieberman's win in Connecticut was hardly a victory for the progressive base.

If Sen. George Allen of Virginia loses, it will be partly because he contracted a terrible case of Dukakisitis — a debilitating disease that causes the victim to run cartoonishly awful campaigns — and because Democrats threw in former Republican Jim Webb, a gun-toting, big-military, anti-affirmative action, right-leaning populist type who quit the Reagan administration as secretary of the Navy because it wasn't hawkish enough.

In Pennsylvania, Democrat Bob Casey unseated Sen. Rick Santorum because he's a nominally pro-life Democrat. Indeed, according to data collected by the leftwing Media Matters for America, 16% of the Democratic candidates in the most competitive races described themselves as "pro-life."

There are other telling indicators. A Fox News election day poll suggests that perhaps a third of supporters of the gay-marriage ban on Virginia's ballot voted for Webb, while similar bans passed in several other states as did a ban on racial preferences in Michigan. Shortly before the elections, one in five self-described independents were "very enthusiastically" voting Democratic.

These are hardly indications of a sudden lurch to the left in American politics. The GOP got thrown out of office because it got fat and lazy and because Democrats — with the help of a transmission-belt media — convinced a lot of voters that they could simply change the channel on the war by voting for "change."

The great irony is that the best thing in the world for the Republicans — though perhaps not the country — would be if the Democrats actually believed their spin and tried to act on a mandate that isn't there. Given the underlying historical trends in conservatism's favor, that would ensure another victory in 2008 for the GOP — as the party of change.

A Loss's Silver Lining (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, November 8, 2006

At least Republicans now know where the "Bridge to Nowhere" leads: to the political wilderness. But there are three reasons for conservatives to temper their despondency.

First, they were punished not for pursuing but for forgetting conservatism. Second, they admire market rationality, and the political market has worked. Third, on various important fronts, conservatism continued its advance Tuesday.

And Now, Back to the War

» Sebastian Mallaby The news has been dominated by elections and Iraq. After tomorrow, there will be only Iraq -- and an agonizing choice between soldiering on, scaling back or pulling out.

Of course the election-turning issue was not that $223 million bridge in Alaska or even the vice of which it is emblematic -- incontinent spending by a Republican-controlled Congress trying to purchase permanent power. Crass spending (the farm and highway bills, the nearly eightfold increase in the number of earmarks since 1994) and other pandering (e.g., the Terri Schiavo intervention) have intensified as Republicans' memories of why they originally sought power have faded.

But Republicans sank beneath the weight of Iraq, the lesson of which is patent: Wars of choice should be won swiftly rather than lost protractedly. On election eve the president, perhaps thinking one should not tinker with success, promised that his secretary of defense would remain. That promise perished yesterday as a result of Tuesday's repudiation of Republican stewardship, which, although emphatic, was not inordinate, considering the offense that provoked it -- war leadership even worse than during the War of 1812.

Tuesday's House result -- the end of 12 years of Republican control -- was normal; the reason for it was unprecedented. The Democrats' 40 years of control of the House before 1994 was aberrant: In the 140 years since 1866, the first post-Civil War election, party control of the House has now changed 15 times -- an average of once every 9.3 years. But never before has a midterm election so severely repudiated a president for a single policy.

The Iraq war, like the Alaska bridge, pungently proclaims how Republicans earned their rebuke. They are guilty of apostasy from conservative principles at home (frugality, limited government) and embrace of anti-conservative principles abroad (nation-building grandiosity pursued incompetently).

About $2.6 billion was spent on the 468 House and Senate races. (Scandalized? Don't be. Americans spend that much on chocolate every two months .) Although Republicans had more money, its effectiveness was blunted because Democrats at last practiced what they incessantly preach to others -- diversity. Diversity of thought, no less: Some of their winners even respect the Second Amendment.

Free markets, including political markets, equilibrate, producing supplies to meet demands. The Democratic Party, a slow learner but educable, has dropped the subject of gun control and welcomed candidates opposed to parts or even all of the abortion rights agenda. This vindicates the candidate recruitment by Rep. Rahm Emanuel and Sen. Chuck Schumer, chairmen of the Democratic House and Senate campaign committees, respectively. Karl Rove fancies himself a second iteration of Mark Hanna, architect of the Republican ascendancy secured by William McKinley's 1896 election. In Emanuel, Democrats may have found another Jim Farley, the political mechanic who kept FDR's potentially discordant coalition running smoothly through the 1930s.

Making the Democratic House majority run smoothly will require delicacy. The six elections beginning with 1994 produced Republican majorities averaging just 10 seats. The six elections before 1994 produced Democratic majorities averaging 44. Nancy Pelosi's majority will be less than half that. The most left-wing speaker in U.S. history will return to being minority leader in 2009 unless she eschews an agenda that cannot be enacted without requiring the many Democrats elected from Republican-leaning districts to jeopardize their seats.

This year Democrats tacitly accepted much of the country's rightward movement over the past quarter-century. They did not call for restoring the 70 percent marginal tax rates that Ronald Reagan repealed. And although Pelosi and 15 of the 21 likely chairmen of committees in the coming Congress voted against the 1996 welfare reform, which has helped reduce welfare rolls by roughly 60 percent, Democrats this year did not talk about repealing it.

The property rights movement gained ground Tuesday as voters in nine states passed measures to restrict governments from exercising eminent domain in order to enlarge their tax revenue. In Michigan, opponents of racial preferences in public hiring, education and contracting easily passed their referendum, 58 to 42 percent, in spite of being outspent more than three to one. In Minnesota -- the only state Democrats have carried in each of the past eight presidential elections, but one that is becoming a swing state -- Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty was reelected. And, come January, the number of Republicans in the House (at least 200) will still be larger than the largest number during the Reagan years (192 in 1981-83).

The country remains receptive to conservatism. That doctrine -- were it to become constraining on, rather than merely avowed by, congressional Republicans -- can be their bridge back from the wilderness.

AP: Hastert Won't Seek House Leader Post (AP-Y)

By David Espo, Ap Special Correspondent

AP, November 9, 2006

Triggering a post-election shake-up, Dennis Hastert announced Wednesday he will not run for leader of House Republicans when Democrats take control in January.

"Obviously I wish my party had won," the House Speaker said in a statement that added he intends to return to the "full-time task" of representing his Illinois constituents.

His decision to step down from the leadership cleared the way for a likely succession battle among lawmakers who face the sudden loss of power after a dozen years in the majority.

Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, currently the majority leader, is expected to run for leader, and Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana announced during the day he also will seek the post. Joe Barton of Texas has signaled he may join the field.

Hastert first conveyed word of his plans in a conference call with fellow GOP leaders one day after Republicans lost control of the House in midterm elections.

There is no recent precedent for Hastert's situation. The last time control of the House changed hands, in 1994, the speaker at the time, Democratic Rep. Tom Foley of Washington, lost his House seat.

Hastert, 64, became speaker nearly eight years ago, stepping up after Newt Gingrich resigned and the next-in-line lawmaker, Bob Livingston, quit after saying he had had an extramarital affair.

A former high school wrestling coach, Hastert was the perfect tonic for Republicans at the time, studiously avoiding the controversy that Gingrich often seemed to court.

He worked closely with President Bush, and originally had indicated he would retire rather than seek re-election this fall. The president prevailed on him to run again though, and Hastert agreed.

In the final weeks of the campaign, fellow Republicans questioned whether he or his aides had failed to act more quickly to force Rep. Mark Foley to resign. The Florida Republican quit Congress on Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit computer messages he had sent to teenage Capitol pages.

Hastert's tenacious — but plodding — approach to his tenure received mixed reviews. He largely shunned the talk-show circuit. He pushed much of Bush's legislative agenda to passage, although critics said he occasionally failed to line up GOP support for key legislation, including a 1999 resolution supporting U.S. intervention in Kosovo and gun-control measures.

Although conservative, Hastert became known more as a legislative tactician with a pragmatic, consensus-building style than as an ideological purist.

In an effort to keep his fragile, fractured Republican majority — and himself — in charge of the House, Hastert maintained a dizzying fundraising pace as speaker that rivaled the legendary cash-collecting abilities of his predecessor, Gingrich.

He took steps to decentralize the House, allowing policy to bubble up through the committees rather than being dictated down from the top.

Hastert won 10 terms by concentrating on issues important to his north central Illinois district, a mix of far-out Chicago suburbs, farmland and high-tech industry.

On Tuesday, Hastert was easily re-elected to his congressional seat over a relatively unknown challenger, but Democratic wins nationwide gave them control of the House and put California Democrat Nancy Pelosi in line to be the next speaker.

"It's been kind of tough out there," Hastert said during a brief appearance at his election headquarters.

Several officials said Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri would seek a new term as whip, the second-ranking leadership position. Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona circulated a letter to fellow Republicans announcing he would run for the post.

Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, issued a statement saying she would not seek to remain in leadership. She is locked in a tough re-election race in her district around Columbus.

Players Begin Jockeying For Leadership Posts (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republicans' loss of power in Congress set off a leadership shuffle Wednesday as the new minority party faced remaking itself after its election losses and Democrats scrambled to divide the spoils of victory.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert announced that he will step down as leader of the House Republicans at the end of the year after an election night that saw his party lose at least 28 seats and control of the chamber. As of Wednesday evening, no Democratic incumbent had lost.

Nine races remained too close to call. Rep. Deborah Pryce, an Ohio Republican, was in one of them. Pryce, the only female member of the House GOP leadership team, told colleagues in a letter that she would also give up her leadership post even if she wins re-election.

“I believe it is in the best interest of the party … that I keep my focus on my district for the next two years and ensure this seat remains safely in Republican hands,” Pryce wrote.

House members in both parties celebrated the end of the congressional campaign by cranking up new campaigns for party leadership positions. Elections will be next week, when members of the current Congress return for a lame-duck session to complete work on spending bills and next year's freshmen arrive for orientation.

In the Senate, Virginia Democrat Jim Webb was declared the winner Wednesday night by the Associated Press over incumbent George Allen. That would elevate Harry Reid of Nevada to majority leader. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky has no opposition to succeed retiring Sen. Bill Frist as the new Senate Republican leader.

Former Senate GOP leader Trent Lott of Mississippi, forced from his post in 2002 after a controversy over a remark he made at Sen. Strom Thurmond's 100th birthday party, has said he may try for a comeback as McConnell's deputy.

The outlook is less certain in the House. Although even President Bush acknowledged Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi's role (she said at a news conference that he called her “speaker-elect” during a phone call), competition for the remaining slots on her team is intense.

After 12 years when Democrats were out of power, “there's a lot of pent-up ambition,” says Democratic Rep. Zoe Lofgren of California.

A fight is underway for the job of Democratic majority leader. Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, a longtime Pelosi ally and critic of the Iraq war, has announced plans to challenge Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland. Hoyer, currently the No. 2 Democratic House leader, is a onetime Pelosi rival who has the support of many party centrists.

Another confrontation is looming over the third-ranking Democratic post. Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who engineered the party's House takeover as head of the congressional campaign committee, says he has not ruled out a challenge to Rep. James Clyburn of South Carolina, a senior member of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Congressional analyst Norman Ornstein says that would pose a “tricky” challenge for Pelosi. Emanuel has “a strong and legitimate claim to a reward,” he says, but blocking an African-American from the first rung on the leadership ladder could anger a key constituency.

House Republican leadership contests are shaping up as a wide-open, intensely ideological fight over what direction the party should take in the aftermath of its losses. Reps. Joe Barton of Texas and Mike Pence of Indiana are challenging Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the current majority leader, for the post of minority leader. Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, a conservative closely allied with Pence, said he will oppose Roy Blunt of Missouri for House minority whip, the second-ranking GOP leadership post.

All of the candidates for top Republican posts are advocating a turn to the right. “We must seize this opportunity to reaffirm our conservative principles,” Blunt said in a letter to colleagues. Party moderates read the returns differently. “The majority of the American people are centrists, and our party lost many seats because the party was not in touch with what the American people care about,” said Rep. Mike Castle of Delaware.

Former New Jersey governor Christine Todd Whitman said Republicans lost ground because of a “hard-edged” image and emphasis on divisive issues such as abortion and gay marriage. She urged GOP leaders to recruit another woman to replace Pryce on the leadership team. “It's important for Republicans to have a woman there, because the gender gap is still an issue and women are more than 50% of the American people,” she said.

The infighting got underway as election returns were still being counted. Among the late-decided races, Rep. Richard Pombo, a seven-term California Republican and a leading critic of environmental regulations, lost to Democrat Jerry McNerney, the chief executive of a wind-power company. Still-undecided races in Connecticut, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Texas, Washington and Wyoming would determine the fates of eight Republican incumbents. One Democrat, Rep. John Barrow of Georgia, remained locked in a close race with Republican Max Burns.

By Rose French

AP, November 9, 2006

Tennessean

U.S. Sen. Lamar Alexander said today he's confident his Republican colleagues will select him to be GOP whip, the party's No. 2 leadership position in the Senate.

Alexander said he's close to a majority and "working on a consensus" to win the post now that his closest rival, Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, lost his re-election bid.

"I'm encouraged by the response I'm receiving from my fellow senators," Alexander said in a conference call with reporters. He also said he was disappointed by Santorum's loss and had looked forward to a "spirited contest."

Alexander for months has been meeting with Senate Republicans in hopes they will select him to be the GOP whip. The current whip, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, is expected to succeed Sen. Bill Frist as GOP leader. Frist, a Republican from Nashville, is leaving at the end of the year to consider a 2008 presidential campaign.

The whip counts votes and tries to maintain party unity. McConnell also has used the leadership job to prioritize projects back home in Kentucky, something Alexander has said he would try to do, too.

The closed-door House and Senate leadership elections are scheduled for Nov. 15.

Even though Tennessee Republicans avoided the fate of their GOP colleagues in several states when Bob Corker beat Democrat Harold Ford Jr. to capture Frist's seat on Tuesday, Alexander said Republicans need to listen to American voters.

"We'd be tone deaf if we didn't hear the message Americans were sending to Congress," Alexander said. "We've (Republicans) drifted from our core values. We haven't gotten control on entitlement spending. We've forgotten that we're opposed to the idea of Washington knows best."

Suggesting that President Bush should work more closely with Congress, Alexander said, "I think we need to remind ourselves and the country that Pennsylvania Avenue is a two-way street."

Democratic Majority May Grow (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Democrats claimed a comfortable House majority in Tuesday’s midterm elections and appear poised to also capture control of the Senate pending a final vote tally in Virginia, as voters across the country voiced widespread frustration with President Bush and the Republican Party’s leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0092326

In the House, Democrats picked up a minimum of 28 seats, with the potential for at least one more gain pending final vote confirmation or recounts. In the Senate, Democratic challengers defeated Sens. Rick Santorum (Pa.), Mike DeWine (Ohio), Jim Talent (Mo.) and Lincoln Chafee (R.I.).

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) narrowly trailed state Senate President Jon Tester (D) into the wee hours Wednesday morning and the race was called for Tester by mid-day, although Burns has yet to concede.

That leaves Virginia as the contest to decide whether Democrats will have 51 Senate seats next Congress.

Surrogates for Sen. George Allen (R) said Wednesday they were unwilling to concede defeat before all the votes were counted and the tally becomes official next week. Unofficial results late Wednesday afternoon showed Allen trailing former Reagan Navy Secretary Jim Webb (D) by 7,217 votes.

But even as the official Senate outcome and several House races remained up in the air and recount teams were being deployed Wednesday morning, strategists in both parties already were shifting their focus to the 2008 landscape and assessing how sustainable the new Democratic majorities might be.

At a briefing Wednesday to discuss the election results, National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) conceded that the seats held by GOP Reps. Anne Northup (Ky.) and Jim Leach (Iowa) — two of the biggest upsets Tuesday — would be all but impossible to return to the GOP fold. Leach had held his seat for 15 terms.

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) carried both districts in the 2004 presidential contest, and he also won the districts held by defeated Reps. Clay Shaw (Fla.), Curt Weldon (Pa.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Charles Bass (N.H.).

All six seats would appear to be difficult for the GOP to regain before the next round of reapportionment and redistricting after the 2010 Census.

Northup has faced tough challenges ever since winning the Democratic-leaning Louisville-based seat in 1996 and, in more favorable climates, has always held on.

"It's a tough seat," Reynolds said. "She's the only person I know that can hold it [for Republicans]. We watched it and it just was a year where she ran a good race and the Democratic numbers of the city were able to prevail."

But Reynolds also sounded confident that his party would be able to recapture some of the GOP-friendly territory lost in 2006.

He held out the seats of Reps. John Sweeney (N.Y.) and Jim Ryun (Kan.), both of whom were defeated on Tuesday, as prime pickup opportunities in 2008.

Sweeney's upstate New York seat has a Republican registration advantage of almost 100,000, Reynolds said, and he described Kansas' 2nd district as a "pretty darn good seat." President Bush won 59 percent of the vote in Ryun's district in 2004.

Democrats, however, likened their strong performance in the Democratic-friendly Northeast to the political realignment that occurred in the GOP tidal wave of 1994, when Democrats lost a disproportionate number of seats in the South — most of which they have not since reclaimed.

The Democrats picked up a minimum of 10 seats with victories in Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York and Pennsylvania on Tuesday. In Connecticut's 2nd district, Rep. Rob Simmons (R) trailed former state Rep. Joe Courtney (D) by less than 200 votes as of late Wednesday and the race had yet to be called.

"Blue states got really blue," Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said in meeting with reporters Wednesday. "We were halfway [to the majority] before we even left the Northeast. [Early in the cycle] we talked about building a strategy in the Northeast that would be for us what the South was for Republicans in 1994."

Several races still were too close to call on Wednesday, but at minimum 20 House Republicans were tossed from office Tuesday — including Resources Chairman Richard Pombo (Calif.) — and Democrats picked up eight GOP-held open seats.

Retaking many of those seats in GOP-leaning territory next cycle may prove to be a more daunting task for Republicans than it might appear, even with the pull of the presidential ticket at the top of 2008 ballots.

For instance, Democrats picked up three seats in Indiana, all of which are districts that voted strongly for Bush in 2004. But Vanderburgh County Sheriff Brad Ellsworth's (D) more than 20-point blowout of Rep. John Hostettler (R-Ind.) would appear to make him a less-than-appealing target for any would-be opponents, despite the lackluster campaign that Hostettler ran.

In addition, Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) has spent the past year preparing for a White House bid in 2008. If he is on the national ticket next cycle, it would only further boost the re-election prospects of Ellsworth, Hill and attorney Joe Donnelly (D), who defeated Rep. Chris Chocola (R-Ind.) on Tuesday.

Even winning back a conservative-leaning district such as North Carolina's 11th district, where former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler (D) defeated eight-term Rep. Charles Taylor (R), is far from a sure thing for the GOP.

DCCC spokesman Bill Burton argued that new Members like Shuler, a conservative on social issues, are a genuine reflection of their constituencies and will vote their districts.

If that proves to be the case, Democrats also would have a good shot of holding onto GOP-leaning seats they picked up Tuesday such as Arizona's 5th district, Minnesota's 1st district and New York's 24th district.

Other Republican targets are more obvious. Just as Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) began the 2006 cycle as the No. 1 target for the GOP, that distinction for 2008 goes to former Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas). Lampson won the seat vacated by former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) after the Republican nominee was forced to mount a write-in campaign. The district voted 64 percent for Bush in 2004, and Lampson faces an uphill battle in holding the seat two years from now.

Bean, however, won re-election Tuesday by a comfortable 51 percent to 44 percent margin in a district where Bush won 56 percent two years ago.

Another challenge for Republican leaders heading into next cycle will be to motivate their House Members to stick around, given their new minority status. Both parties have done a good job of holding retirements to a minimum for the past two cycles.

Democratic strategist Steve Elmendorf, a one-time top aide to ex-House Democratic Leader Richard Gephardt (Mo.), recalled the shock within the party ranks when Democrats lost control of the House in 1994.

"I think there's a whole bunch of their people who have never really contemplated the idea that they were going to lose," Elmendorf said. "They're going to be depressed. They're not going to like being in the minority, and they're not going to like being taken off their exclusive committees, and they're going to think twice about whether they should stay here or not."

Meanwhile, if Democrats do claim a one-seat majority in the Senate, the 2008 landscape already is tilted in their favor because of the sheer number of seats the GOP is defending.

Twenty-one Republican-held seats and only 12 Democratic-held Senate seats are up for re-election next cycle, and the playing field does not overlap with any of the biggest presidential battlegrounds: Florida, Ohio, Missouri and Pennsylvania.

Retirement worries also appear to be a more prominent problem for the GOP. Topping the party's potential retirement list are Sens. Pete Domenici (N.M.), John Warner (Va.), Ted Stevens (Alaska), Thad Cochran (Miss.) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.). Sen. Wayne Allard (Colo.) must decide whether to adhere to a term-limits pledge.

Competitive contests are all but assured in Colorado, Minnesota, Louisiana and South Dakota, and open-seat races in New Mexico and Virginia also would draw much attention.

Republicans' best pickup opportunities appear to rest on their ability to generate competitive races against Sens. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) and Max Baucus (D-Mont.).

Sen. John Ensign (Nev.) is set to take the helm of the National Republican Senatorial Committee next cycle. Democrats have not decided who will chair the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in 2008, although current Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) is heavily favored to do a return engagement.

Democrats Recast U.S. Political Landscape (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The rolling realignment of U.S. politics accelerated Tuesday, as Democrats strengthened their hold over the Northeast and opened new beachheads in the Midwest and Mountain West that could prove critical to their hopes of winning the White House two years from now.

These and other political changes, illuminated by the 2006 election like a late-night flash of lightning, could signal a new stage in the competition between the two major parties.

For Democrats, the watchword Tuesday was growth: the party expanded its reach with key groups of swing voters as it made notable advancements on previously GOP-leaning terrain.

The results sent Republicans a message of retrenchment: the Democratic surge reversed President Bush's gains in the 2004 vote among women and Hispanic voters and saw the GOP virtually obliterated across the Northeast and mid-Atlantic.

In all, the election dealt a powerful blow to Republican hopes that Bush's re-election in 2004 had established a narrow but lasting political majority for the party. Instead, the U.S. appears to have reverted back toward a 50-50 political nation, with Democrats, if anything, claiming the momentum.

"Heading into the 2008 election, neither party holds a significant advantage," argued political strategist Simon Rosenberg, head of centrist Democratic group known as NDN, in a memo Wednesday. "It is a 'jump ball' for control in 2008 . . . "

The most emphatic Democratic gains came in the 11 Eastern states stretching from Maryland to Maine. Many of these states were once a foundation of the GOP, but they have drifted toward the Democrats over the last 50 years as Republicans have become more closely identified with a Southern-flavored social conservatism and small-government ideology.

That trend, mixed with antipathy toward President Bush and the war in Iraq, produced explosive gains for Democrats in the East on Tuesday.

Pending final results in two tight contests, Democrats gained as many as 12 House seats in the region, ousted GOP senators in Pennsylvania and Rhode Island and seized Republican-held governorships in Massachusetts, New York and Maryland.

When the next Congress convenes, Democrats could hold 68 of the region's 92 House seats. They also will control 17 of the region's 22 Senate seats (Bernie Sanders of Vermont and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who were elected as independents, plan to caucus with the party.)

Two other Democratic breakthroughs turned heads. One was their success in smaller, economically struggling Midwestern communities where Bush ran well in 2000 and 2004. Democrats beat three GOP House members from Indiana in districts with those characteristics, and Democrat Sherrod Brown showed strength in such places in routing Republican Sen. Mike DeWine in Ohio.

The other important Democratic breakthrough came in the Mountain West. Democrats captured one GOP-held House seat in Colorado and two in Arizona. In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester apparently defeated Republican Sen. Conrad Burns, pending a final vote count. Democratic governors won landslide re-elections in New Mexico, Arizona and Wyoming. Democrat Bill Ritter scored a landslide victory in the race for Colorado's governor's office, which a Republican had held.

After Tuesday's results, Republicans "should be terrified" about holding Colorado in the 2008 presidential race, said Walt Klein, a veteran GOP consultant in the state.

Still, Democrats excited by their gains may be overlooking signs of continued resistance in the region. They came close, but failed to defeat, targeted GOP House incumbents in Nevada and Colorado, lost the Nevada governor's race, failed in a bid against Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., and saw Colorado voters reject a ballot initiative to authorize civil unions for homosexuals while approving a state constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage.

One reason Democrats generally ran well across the Southwest was the GOP's poor showing among Hispanics.

In 2004, exit polls showed Bush carrying about 40 percent of Hispanic voters. But with many Republicans pushing a hard-line message on immigration, National Election Pool exit polls showed GOP congressional candidates winning just 29 percent of the Hispanic vote.

Republican support also suffered among independent voters, after running about even with them in 2002 and 2004. Democrats won independents, often by commanding margins, in each of the 11 most competitive Senate races except in Rhode Island and New Jersey, where the GOP nominated moderate candidates.

Women voters, who moved toward Bush in 2004, turned away from the GOP. Women preferred the Democratic candidates in the 11 top Senate races, often by huge margins.

One big reason for that success: exit polls found women considerably less supportive of the Iraq war than men. Similarly, the exit polls found that independents were nearly as unhappy about the war as Democrats.

Those findings suggest that without progress in stabilizing Iraq, Republicans may find it difficult to regain the support they lost Tuesday. The White House understands that after the election, the clock is ticking more loudly.

"The president believes in this war and everything that is at stake in this war, and so it's very difficult, even impossible, to envision that he would just give up on it," said a senior GOP strategist who requested anonymity when discussing administration policy. "On the other hand, the White House and Republicans are aware this is an unpopular war, and there is certainly pressure to turn things around. It's no secret that public patience is being taxed."

Half-Dozen House Races Could Move To Recounts (RC)

By Matthew Murray And David M. Drucker

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Election Day may stretch well in to mid-November or beyond, as a bumper crop of midterm nail-biters mean that state elections officials may re-tally the vote in perhaps a half dozen or more House races.

Several of the candidates involved in potential recounts have consulted lawyers to make sure they know their options, though none went so far as to predict that a recount was likely to change the outcome of a race.

As of Wednesday afternoon, Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said the GOP was keeping a watchful eye on races involving incumbents Reps. Rob Simmons (Conn.), Robin Hayes (N.C.), Barbara Cubin (Wyo,), Heather Wilson (N.M.) and J.D. Hayworth (Ariz.) — and GOP House campaign leadership hinted that the list may not be fixed.

“We will assist in any recount that we are asked to assist in,” said NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.).

By late Wednesday, Democrat Joe Courtney's narrow lead over Simmons appeared to trip a Connecticut state law requiring recounts.

With 100 percent of precincts reporting, the total vote in Connecticut's 2nd district had Courtney besting the three-term incumbent by less than 200 votes. Although Simmons' campaign declined requests to indicate whether he would waive a recount, Simmons readied himself Wednesday for a recount, as he said on a GOP conference call, according to a source familiar with the call.

Courtney declared himself the winner on Wednesday. "Right now there is no reason to believe this will get narrower," said Courtney campaign spokesman Brian Farber.

In addition to those races flagged by the GOP, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokesman Bill Burton said Democrats were keeping tabs on Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy's (D) attempt to oust the House GOP's fourth-ranking Member, Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio). Burton also said Democrats were concerned about alleged voting irregularities in Florida's 13th district, where automobile dealer Vern Buchanan (R) narrowly defeated banker Christine Jennings (D) in the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris (R).

David Kochman, a Buchanan campaign spokesman, said Wednesday afternoon that Jennings was trailing Buchanan by 367 votes.

However, Jennings sounded more optimistic that a turnaround could be afoot, saying in a statement that the Supervisor of Elections has reported 18,382 undervotes, and that that number indicated something had gone awry in the vote counting. An undervote is when a ballot registers votes for other offices but not the office in question — in this case these ballots did not include a vote for Congress.

Jennings also talked of complaints coming into her campaign office from concerned voters, and by Wednesday Democrats already were asking for donations to pay for a recount.

In many states, margins of less than 1 percent can trigger an automatic recount, negating the need for a campaign to lawyer up and demand one from the courts. Such is the case in the 12th district of Georgia, where former Rep. Max Burns (R) believes that is the next step in his challenge to Rep. John Barrow (D).

"We think right now the election could go either way," Burns campaign spokesman John Stone said, saying his candidate received a big boost Wednesday when the votes from Republican-leaning Effingham County came in, dropping Barrow's lead from 2,387 on Tuesday night to around 1,000.

"Whoever wins this race will win it with a few hundred votes," Stone said, explaining that military and provisional ballots, as well as regular ballots that had yet to be counted, could help put Burns over the top.

In another seat where Republicans were hoping for a pickup — Georgia's 8th district — the margin also remains too close to call, with Rep. Jim Marshall (D) leading former Rep. Mac Collins by 1,700 votes. Collins spokesman Ed Prill said the process in his race to determine the winner could be long and drawn out.

Prill said that exploring every option was much more than an exercise for its own sake.

"We're not in the business of wasting our time," he said.

Bush To Meet With Big 3 Automakers (AP-Y)

AP, November 9, 2006

President Bush's long-promised meeting with the heads of Detroit's Big Three automakers will be held Tuesday at the White House.

The auto executives tentatively were scheduled to meet with Bush in May, but in September, the meeting was pushed back until after the election.

That prompted criticism from Michigan's Gov. Jennifer Granholm and other Democrats who said the administration had neglected the problems of the Big Three automakers and its workers.

The White House said the president talks to the automakers all the time, and promised that Bush will hold his meeting with the heads of General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co., and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group in mid-November. White House spokesman Tony Fratto said Bush would meet with the automakers before leaving on a trip to Asia.

Bush declined an opportunity to have the meeting in Detroit when he was there in early September to attend a fundraiser for a GOP Senate candidate about 40 miles northwest of Detroit. The Big Three automakers all have headquarters in or near Detroit.

Bush To Study Bill That Would Give D.C. Full Voting Rights (WP)

By Yolanda Woodlee

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092330

President Bush said yesterday that he will review a bill to give District residents full voting rights in the House, marking the first time he has spoken about a measure that local lawmakers are trying to win approval for over the next few weeks.

The bill, introduced six months ago, also would add a congressional seat for Utah. Proponents of D.C. voting rights have waged a major push to get the bill passed this year.

"It's the first I've heard of it," Bush responded to a question during a news conference at the White House. "I didn't know that's going to come up from the lame duck."

The president was referring to the last few days of the current Congress, which returns to session next week and will adjourn before Thanksgiving. He did not say whether he would support the bill.

"Well, it may or may not come up. . . . But I'll take a look at it," he said.

Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman, said Bush was aware of the bill but wants to study it.

U.S. Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who introduced the measure with Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) in the spring, said he has talked about the issue with the president.

"The congressman said that he had a conversation with the president months ago and followed up with a lengthy memo on it to the White House office that deals with policy matters," said Brian McNicoll, a Davis spokesman. "This is a legacy issue. We're working hard on it. We're not done, and I do not see the president vetoing this."

Bush's comments come a week after prominent D.C. politicians and business leaders met to determine how they can get the bill passed this year.

Voting rights advocates want Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to move the bill to the floor for a vote. But before that, Utah lawmakers would have to approve a redistricting map that would create a fourth congressional seat for the state.

The bill would expand the House from 435 to 437 members. In hopes of winning broad bipartisan support, Davis and Norton proposed that one seat go to Utah, which is predominantly Republican, and the other to the District, which is overwhelmingly Democratic.

Chris Bleak, chief of staff to Utah House Speaker Greg J. Curtis (R), said the legislation creating the congressional seat for his state could be moved in a day.

"If we get the signal that this bill is going to move forward, we will move quickly to pass that bill," Bleak said. "We just need to get the thumbs-up from Representative Sensenbrenner or our congressional delegation telling us to move forward."

Norton predicted that Bush would sign the bill if it cleared Congress because it benefits both parties. "The president will take his cue from what the Congress does," Norton said.

Bush Pledges To Seek Common Ground, Work With Democrats (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush began rebooting his agenda on Wednesday, ticking off a revised list of priorities that include education, an immigration overhaul and maybe even an increase in the minimum wage.

After his party lost control of the House of Representatives and was in danger of losing the Senate, too — which appeared to prove true Wednesday evening when the Associated Press declared Virginia Democrat Jim Webb the victor over incumbent Sen. George Allen — Bush pledged to “work through our differences” with incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi and other Democratic leaders. He said that includes the conduct of the Iraq war.

“The challenges and opportunities are plain for all to see,” Bush said at a news conference.

To jump-start the final two years of his presidency, Bush said he would draw on his experience as governor of Texas, where he developed a reputation for working well with Democrats who controlled the Legislature on such issues as raising education standards and toughening penalties for juvenile crimes.

Bush said there may be some “common ground” on a Democratic proposal to increase the minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 as long as there is “compensation” for small business owners. He and other Republicans say small businesses are hurt the most by such increases because they employ hourly workers. “There's a significant difference between common ground and abandoning principle,” he said.

Bush also expressed hope for a more “comprehensive” immigration bill that includes expanded employment opportunities for temporary “guest workers.” In December 2005, 164 House Democrats voted against a GOP-sponsored bill that was tough on border protection but did not include provisions for guest workers and a path to citizenship for some illegal immigrants as Bush supports.

Among other agenda items Bush cited: an extension of his signature No Child Left Behind education law, promoting alternatives to oil and dealing with unfunded liabilities in entitlement programs, including Social Security. Bush failed last year in an attempt to restructure Social Security to provide for private accounts.

Democrat Jim Turner, a former member of both the Texas Legislature and the U.S. House, said both parties could profit from working together. He cautioned that it would not be easy for Bush.

For one thing, he said, Bush lacks the partner he had in Texas with Lt. Gov. Bob Bullock, who liked Bush and exercised major influence with the Democratic legislators. Another Texan noted the partisanship in Washington is much worse than it was in the Austin of the 1990s, notably because of the Iraq war.

The war "will hover over everything," said former congressman Martin Frost, a Democrat who represented the Dallas area. "That will color the relationship."

Frost said Democrats won the election because of dissatisfaction with the war, and their supporters will expect them to deliver a plan to get U.S. troops out of Iraq. Bush said he remains committed to victory in Iraq and will listen to Democratic ideas.

"If the goal is success, then we can work together," Bush said. "If the goal is 'get out now regardless,' then that's going to be hard to work together."'

The president acknowledged his administration's handling of the Iraq war was a factor in the election, as voters registered "their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there." He also cited a desire for "congressmen to be honest and ethical."

Still, Bush was optimistic about the new political environment, even joking about Tuesday's setbacks.

"Actually, I thought we were going to do fine," Bush said. "Shows what I know."

Power Shift In Washington (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann And Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON

The tectonic plates of Washington power have shifted, presenting both President Bush and the new Democratic majority in Congress with an opportunity to work together and leave behind the politics of confrontation.

The day after the historic midterm elections of 2006 - in which the Democrats won considerably more than the 15-seat net gain needed to take over the House of Representatives and were heading toward a possible majority in the Senate - leaders from both parties pledged to work together and avoid the intense partisanship of recent years.

"The message yesterday was clear: The American people want their leaders in Washington to set aside partisan differences, conduct ourselves in an ethical manner, and work together to address the challenges facing our nation," Mr. Bush said Wednesday in a press conference.

The reality, analysts say, is that the next two years are likely to offer a blend of confrontation and common ground. The Democrats, after 12 years in congressional opposition, don't want their hard-fought majority to vanish in the next election. The incentive for Bush, entering the final two years of his presidency, is to leave his party in a position to compete effectively in 2008. He can take a page from his earlier days as governor of Texas, when he gained a reputation for working well with Democrats.

"Early indications are that he's doing what he's done before and can do again, if he can get over his hurt and his pique, which it sounds like he already has, or at least he's working on it," says Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas, Austin. "That is, this is not the time to get confrontational and dig in his heels."

Yesterday morning, Bush was on the phone, congratulating the Democratic leadership of Congress, and inviting the presumptive next speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, over for lunch.

From the Democrats' end, Ms. Pelosi already has appeared to clamp down on talk of impeaching the president by some of the more vocal liberals in the House. Still, life under the Democrats is expected to include hearings and inquiries into aspects of the Iraq war and the larger war on terror. The challenge will be for the Democrats not to appear on a witch hunt.

By Wednesday morning, the contours of the new House and Senate were becoming clear, but not definitive. At press time, the Democrats had made a net gain of 27 House seats and five Senate seats. One Senate race remained too close to call - but the Republican incumbent, George Allen of Virginia, was slightly behind. If the challenger wins, Democrats will control a majority in the Senate.

In Tuesday's wave, some longtime Republican members were defeated, including Reps. Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Clay Shaw of Florida, and Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania. In the Senate, incumbent Republicans Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, and Mike DeWine all lost.

DOJ_NMG_0092332

For the foot soldiers of both parties, who worked overtime to turn out their voters, such loyalty breeds demands on leaders - and it is among those base constituencies that common ground could be most elusive. For Bush, extending the tax cuts that he says have boosted the US economy will be an important goal. Democrats have pledged to raise the minimum wage as one of their first acts in the majority, presenting Bush with the choice of going along with or vetoing legislation that the public supports.

Some elements of Bush's agenda, such as his plan to partially privatize Social Security, now appear dead while others, such as his plan for comprehensive immigration reform - enhanced enforcement twinned with a guest-worker program - may gain new life.

Generally, voters were in a sour mood. Six in 10 said the nation was on the wrong track, according to exit polls conducted by the Associated Press and other news organizations. Scandals played a role. More than half of voters said they were dissatisfied with the way the GOP House leadership handled the matter of Rep. Mark Foley (R) of Florida, who has been accused of improper behavior toward teenage House pages.

But if one issue was the most important in the vote, it was Iraq. Six in 10 voters said they disapproved of the war. In the end, "the election became a referendum on the war," says Michael McDonald, a visiting fellow at the Brookings Institution in Washington and assistant professor of government and politics at George Mason University.

Whether Bush will read the election results as a mandate to change course in Iraq remains to be seen. If he chooses, he could take cover under the forthcoming recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, a government-sponsored commission.

Considering both the Iraq war and the halting federal response to hurricane Katrina, voters have become skeptical of the ability of the White House to run important matters of US policy, says George C. Edwards III, a scholar of the presidency at Texas A&M University. "They're not confident in the competence of Republicans to govern. That may, or may not, be fair," he says.

Many newly elected Democratic representatives come from swing districts, and are likely to be more moderate than liberals from safe Democratic seats. Congressional Republicans, for their part, may be dissatisfied with their current leaders, such as Speaker Dennis Hastert (R) of Illinois, and may tack away from a president they increasingly see as a lame duck.

Meanwhile, House Democrats will find it hard to push their own legislative agenda over Republican Senate filibusters and a potential White House veto.

Democrats may have won big Tuesday. "But we still have separation of powers," notes Dr. Edwards.

A New Bush? Yes And No (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, November 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — As President Bush launched the final two-year stretch of his presidency Wednesday, his effort to secure his legacy was encumbered by two inflexible factors: the loss of a once-supportive congressional majority, and the weight of an unpopular war that he has so far found no way to win.

Fielding questions from reporters in the White House's East Room, the president reeled off a list of domestic issues on which he thought he could find common ground with Democrats, just as he had as governor of Texas six years ago and during his brief honeymoon with Congress in the first year of his presidency — the economy, education, energy, immigration, Social Security and Medicare.

But on Iraq, Bush warned that he was in no mood for a major change of course. "Looking at this election, the enemy is going to say, 'Well, it must mean America is going to leave.' And the answer is, no, it doesn't," he said. The goal, Bush repeated several times, remained the same: "Victory."

He said he'd work with Congress, but not on a timetable for withdrawing troops.

What lies ahead, Bush's remarks suggested, may be a two-sided presidency, one open to compromise on domestic legislation but committed to its basic strategy in Iraq and the war on terrorism — one-half Austin, Texas, one-half Sept. 11.

"On foreign policy, the new Bush is the old Bush, and he doesn't seem likely to change much," said Stanley A. Renshon, a political scientist at the City University of New York who has written a largely admiring biography of Bush.

"On domestic affairs, he's never entirely been a 'movement' conservative; he's always been willing to go the extra mile…. But he's always been tough on defense and foreign policy, even before 9/11."

Aware that Tuesday's balloting signaled voters' desire for new approaches to the war, aides insisted Bush was willing to look at policy alternatives.

They pointed to his nomination of former CIA director Robert M. Gates to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and his promise to consider the recommendations of an independent commission on the war.

DOJ_NMG_0092333

"Of course the president is going to remain principled about [opposing] a massive withdrawal, just like he will about tax increases," said one aide, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for the White House. "But there is a lot of room in between."

At Bush's news conference, however, when a reporter asked whether Rumsfeld's resignation would lead to "a new direction in Iraq," the president rejected the phrase.

"New direction," he mused. "Well, there's certainly going to be new leadership at the Pentagon…. Bob Gates will bring a fresh perspective."

But the president added that when he talked with the Defense Department nominee last weekend, "I found him to be of like mind. He understands that we're in a global war with these terrorists. He understands that defeat is not an option in Iraq."

When another reporter asked whether the president believed he could work with the Democrats on Iraq, he said: "Well, I think we're going to have to work with them" — then described the job principally as persuading Democrats that his policies are right.

"We're not going to leave [Iraq] before the job is done," he said.

"And obviously we've got a lot of work to do with some members of Congress…. If the goal is success, then we can work together. If the goal is 'get out now, regardless,' then that's going to be hard to work together."

That was a polite way for Bush to step around the most important conflict between his approach to Iraq and that of many House Democrats.

The new Democratic majority may have problems of its own on Iraq, which could give the president some room to maneuver.

Officially, the Democrats campaigned for "the responsible redeployment of U.S. forces" — a phrase Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the incoming speaker of the House, repeated on Wednesday. But they never agreed on when or where that redeployment would occur.

Some want the phrase to mean an immediate removal of most U.S. troops from Iraq, but others say they don't support a fixed timetable for withdrawal.

Administration officials say they plan to press the Democrats, now that they hold the majority, to specify what their proposals for pacifying Iraq would be. "If there are any good new options out there, we'll take them," said one aide, who asked for anonymity because he was speaking unofficially. "But most of them don't have any good new options."

Similarly, Bush challenged Democrats to come forward with proposals to bolster the finances of Social Security and Medicare — problems whose solutions are unlikely to be politically popular because they usually require tax increases or reductions in benefits.

"This is bipartisanship of a special kind: 'We have this problem, and what do you propose to do about it?' " Renshon said of the administration's position.

A former aide to Rumsfeld, Torie Clarke, agreed that it would be easier for Bush to work with Democrats on domestic issues than on national security.

"He does share some common ground with a lot of Democrats on some issues, especially domestic issues," she said.

"But there's a canyon between him and some others on Iraq and the principles of the war on terror."

As for the prospects of bipartisan cooperation becoming the rule in Washington, instead of the exception, Clarke said she was skeptical.

"With very few exceptions, policymakers and politicians operate in their own self-interest," she said. "If bipartisanship is in their interest, they will be bipartisan. If it's not, they won't. It will happen on a case-by-case basis."

Presidents often have faced the problem of Congress falling into opposition hands, and they invariably say — with as much enthusiasm as they can muster — that they welcome the opportunity for bipartisanship.

Ronald Reagan scrapped furiously with a Democratic Congress over legislation but invited its leaders to the White House for drinks. George H.W. Bush compromised with Democrats on a tax increase and, in his son's view, lost his job as a result. Bill Clinton promised to work with the conservative Republican majority that swept into power in 1994 and joined with it to pass a landmark welfare reform bill, but battled it on most other issues.

President Bush's problems may be greater than theirs.

For one, he and his staff have had little experience in trying to govern with Democrats since they arrived from Texas in 2001; for most of that time, they have known nothing but solid GOP majorities.

For another, Bush and his chief political advisor, Karl Rove, have long pursued a strategy aimed mainly at maximizing their support among conservative Republicans, not at reaching out to moderate Democrats and independents; declaring that the president has decided to be a centrist looks impractical at this late date.

DOJ_NMG_0092334

"Politicians develop a style of leadership over many years, and it becomes consolidated," Renshon said. "It's very hard to turn on a dime."

Republican Blindness (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

With one Republican bastion after another falling as returns poured in for Democrats Tuesday night, the GOP's carefully constructed defenses crumbled. The party's barriers failed to prevent the election from being a referendum on Iraq, George W. Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress. It was a failure of concept as well as execution.

That failed concept relied on friendly, familiar Republican incumbents, who had delivered government pork for their districts, negating intense voter hostility by using the party's time-tested machinery to get out its vote. These tactics proved useless in the face of a wave that was not so much pro-Democrat as anti-Republican. Only gerrymandered House districts prevented a landslide that would have given the Democrats a House majority of historic proportions, approaching 50 seats.

The apparent Democratic takeover of both houses of Congress left Republicans stunned and divided, unable to comprehend that the nation's political realignment creating a GOP majority had crested and reversed. The confidence that relied on generously funded Election Day organization now looks like mindless arrogance. The party's cocksure political mechanics simply could not believe the outcome as the results poured in.

Even up to the last minute, the Republicans never really saw overall defeat coming. Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina used a golfer's language in telling me in July that his colleagues failed to appreciate how close the Republicans were to losing control of the Senate: "It's like we think we'll get by with pars on the last two holes when we really need birdies," he said then. On Wednesday Graham told me: "Actually, we bogeyed the 17th hole and picked up on the 18th."

Republican leaders are still in denial in the wake of their crushing defeat. They blame individual losing candidates for failing to prepare themselves for the election. In contrast, the private reaction by the candidates was anger at President Bush and his political team. That includes a rising GOP undercurrent against Iraq policy. The unpleasant truth is that Republicans lost almost everywhere the president campaigned during the past week. An exception was Florida, where state Attorney General Charlie Crist kept out of Bush's way and won the election for governor.

The bellwether of defeats to come was the Louisville district where the respected Rep. Anne Northup, who won 60 percent of the vote two years ago, was defeated for a sixth term. There was nothing she had done wrong or that her opponent had done right to cause her defeat. The same was true of other highly regarded Republican congressional veterans who were defeated Tuesday, headed by Nancy Johnson of Connecticut, Clay Shaw of Florida and Jim Leach of Iowa.

Exit polls confirmed what had been clear to anyone who spent time on the campaign circuit this year. Opposition to the war and the president had produced a virulent anti-Republican mood. About two weeks before the election, political technicians running the campaign of Rep. Charles Bass in New Hampshire suddenly realized that the popular six-termer was in deep trouble. His moderate voting and record of pork delivery (including a federal prison for his district) meant nothing. He was swept under by the anti-Iraq voting tide.

Bass at least had some warning. New Hampshire's other House member, Rep. Jeb Bradley, won with 63 percent of the vote in 2004 and never felt threatened this year until the results came in. This was a nationalized election about Iraq in which individual characteristics did not count.

Rep. J.D. Hayworth of Arizona, a stalwart of the famous Republican Class of '94, did not seem seriously endangered until word came back to Washington election morning that he looked like a loser. Representing a district that is not as Republican as it used to be, Hayworth had become an enforcement-only immigration hard-liner. It did not help him at the polls.

Sen. John McCain, the putative front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, reacted to defeat with the typically blunt comment that his party had lost its way with earmarked pork-barrel spending. If party leaders in Congress at long last heed McCain's counsel, it would mark the beginning of wisdom.

Facing Up To Reality (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Never was a political wipeout better advertised in advance than the one that hit the Republican Party on Tuesday and cost Don Rumsfeld his job. From the first of my political soundings in the Midwest in early spring, it was clear that the public's frustration with the war in Iraq, the inept performance of the Bush administration after Hurricane Katrina, and the stunning partisanship and tawdriness of the Republican Congress was reaching explosive levels.

DOJ_NMG_0092335

When Congress quit work without addressing immigration, energy prices or health-care inflation in any serious way, the majority Republicans were clearly asking for trouble. And the scandals that kept erupting just added to the public disgust.

A few days before the election, Bernadette Budde, political director of BIPAC, the Republican-friendly Business Industry Political Action Committee, was quoted here as warning of the imminence of what she correctly predicted would be "an earthquake."

The only people who seemed oblivious to the warning signs were President Bush and his political adviser, Karl Rove. Against all evidence, including the warnings of other Republicans, they kept insisting that Republicans would hold the House and Senate. Bush said at his news conference yesterday, "I knew we were going to lose seats," but he acknowledged he was shocked that the twin themes he kept pushing -- taxes and security -- didn't save the GOP from "a thumping."

The Republican Party paid a heavy price for Bush and Rove's obduracy -- and for the miserable performance of the GOP congressional leadership. The vaunted Republican "base," on which the White House has relied to support the president's agenda, splintered on Election Day. In exit polls, one-fifth of self-described Republicans and three out of 10 white evangelicals or "born-again" Christians said they voted Democratic for Congress.

Meanwhile, independents and moderates went Democratic by margins of 18 and 23 points, respectively. Democrats broadened their coalition, winning the cities and splitting even in suburbs and rural areas, while capturing majorities in all age groups and every income level up to $100,000 a year. That same range is reflected in the expanded Democratic caucuses in the House and Senate, with notable victories from New Hampshire to Arizona.

So Bush was simply acknowledging reality when he reversed himself and bade farewell to his controversial Pentagon chief. He said he had made the decision in the final hours before Election Day, when he still believed he'd have a Republican Congress. In reality it was announced less than half an hour after speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi had said at her own news conference that firing Rumsfeld would be the clearest way for Bush to signal that the election constituted a call for a new policy in Iraq.

Pelosi's performance at her debut as leader of a congressional majority was pitch-perfect, calm, confident and blessedly free of the screeching tone of some of her stump speeches. She is leading a formidable political force in this revived Democratic Party. Bush has every reason to treat her with respect -- and a degree of deference. He is right in thinking that they could well find common ground on immigration, education and perhaps even entitlements if they tried. But the acid test will be his willingness to open a genuine dialogue on Iraq.

Pelosi, who spent October out campaigning, showed a clearer grasp of the public mood than did Bush. He was still halfway between avowing a new open-minded readiness to listen and learn and his more familiar insistence on living in a world of moral absolutes. Thus the conflict between his welcoming fresh ideas on Iraq and insisting single-mindedly that "victory" is the only acceptable outcome for the military intervention that most of the voting public now judges a mistake.

The Democrats will offer Bush alternatives for Iraq and so, presumably, will the Baker-Hamilton commission when it meets with him next week and issues its report in December. James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton and their colleagues are perfectly positioned to help break the deadlock on that policy -- if Bush is looking for an out.

The question is whether a president who couldn't recognize the reality of an approaching political landslide is any more discerning about spotting a policy and political disaster in the making in a far-off land.

As Predicted, A Wave Washes Republicans Out To Sea (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Well, don't say we didn't warn you.

Tuesday's balloting was about what we expected. A relatively large political wave swept almost 30 House Republicans out of office and appears to have delivered the Senate to Democrats. Of course, we won't know the status of control of the Senate for a while, but whatever happens in Virginia and Montana, Democrats had a big night in that chamber, as well.

Actually, Republicans got lucky on Election Day. Many of the close House contests went to the GOP. Had squeakers in districts such as New Mexico's 1st, Virginia's 2nd, New York's 25th and 29th, North Carolina's 8th, Nevada's 3rd, Ohio's 1st, New Jersey's 7th, Connecticut's 4th and Wyoming's at-large seat gone Democratic, we could be talking about a 38- to 40-seat swing.

There were a lot of noteworthy things about Tuesday's voting, so let me touch on a few of them.

First, what the South was to Democrats in 1994, the Northeast was to Republicans this year. Two seats in Connecticut appear to have fallen, along with another pair in New Hampshire, three in New York and four in Pennsylvania.

The New England and Mid-Atlantic landscape is littered with moderate Republicans, from Charles Bass and Jeb Bradley to Sue Kelly to Nancy Johnson and, possibly, Rob Simmons, and Republicans may find that it was easier to lose those seats than it will be to get them back. Add liberal Republican Rep. Jim Leach (Iowa) to the mix, and you have a national weeding out of moderates that impacted the northeast corner of the nation greatly.

True, moderates such as Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and Jim Walsh (R-N.Y.) survived, but even their wins were ugly, and they stand out as exceptions to the rule.

Second, partisan voting devastated Republicans in Democratic-leaning districts. When Leach loses to an underfunded, fourth-tier Democratic challenger, you know that districts carried by Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004 saw plenty of straight-ticket voting by Democrats.

But these elections weren't about partisans after all. Exit polls showed that few partisans defected on Tuesday, and the real story was independents. While independents constituted only about 26 percent of the electorate, those voters went Democratic 57 percent to 39 percent. That 18-point margin is gigantic when it comes to normal independent voting patterns.

Third, all of the talk about a Republican surge during the final days of the campaign was bunk, as I believed (and wrote in this space) at the time.

You aren't likely to have large moves in public opinion after a lengthy campaign without events that force people to change their assessments and intentions. And given the likelihood that late deciders would move toward Democrats (which is exactly what happened), it was hard to see a Republican surge.

Once again, people overreacted to a couple of polls, particularly the generic ballot in the first Washington Post/ABC News survey and then, even more importantly, the late Pew Research poll, ignoring contradictory polling that suggested Democrats still held a significant advantage in the generic ballot going into Election Day.

It was stunning how quickly people jumped on the "Chafee Resurgent in Rhode Island Senate" bandwagon after seeing just one poll.

That's not to say there wasn't any closing toward the end. Montana tightened up in the final week, and there was data showing some increased GOP interest in the elections and likelihood to vote as Nov. 7 neared.

Fourth, we seem to have discovered the base Republican vote in many districts, and we found out where and how the Republicans' structural advantages from redistricting sheltered some Republican candidates from the wave.

Allegedly vulnerable Republicans in what appeared to be bulletproof GOP districts, such as Reps. John Doolittle (Calif.), Cathy McMorris (Wash.) and Mark Souder (Ind.) and incoming Reps. Doug Lamborn (Colo.), Bill Sali (Idaho), Adrian Smith (Neb.) and Tim Walberg (Mich.) held on despite the wave. Their margins were down, of course, but they survived, some even comfortably.

Republicans now must figure out what they are going to do. They can expect a number of retirements of senior Members now that the party is in the minority, and many GOP House Members will have to deal with being in the minority for the first time in their Congressional tenures.

President Bush, of course, is the biggest loser in a number of ways. He loses at least one chamber, and he is the reason Republicans took a bath on Tuesday. He may console himself by believing that he has the right policy in Iraq and history will judge him kindly. But his performance in office has destroyed a number of noteworthy political careers, and he would be wise to never forget that.

The Middle Muscles In (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

For decades, moderates have been the cowardly lions of American politics. You'd see them quivering in the corner as the anti-establishment left exchanged culture war mortar fire with the anti-establishment right. You'd see them passed over and dissed as the parties mobilized their bases and played to their primary voters.

Well, somebody's been on steroids, because on Tuesday the muscular middle took control of America. Say goodbye to the era of Rovian base mobilization. Say goodbye to the era of conservative dominance that began in 1980. On Tuesday, 47 percent of the voters were self-described moderates, according to exit polls, and they asserted their power by voting for the Democrats in landslide proportions.

About a year ago, these angry moderates lost confidence in Republican rule. The tens of millions of dollars spent since then — the ads, the robocalls, the microtargeting — did nothing to change that basic decision.

Their disaffection with the G.O.P. was not philosophical. It was about competence and accountability. It was about the accumulation of Rumsfeld, Katrina, Abramoff, the bridge to nowhere and the failure to quarantine Mark Foley. Bill Clinton captured the electorate's central complaint about the G.O.P.: "They can't run anything right."

So voters kicked out Republicans but did not swing to the left. For the most part they exchanged moderate Republicans for conservative Democrats. It was a great day for the centrist Joe Lieberman, who defeated the scion of the Daily Kos net roots,

DOJ_NMG_0092337

Ned Lamont. It was a great day for anti-abortion Democrats like Bob Casey and probably for pro-gun Democrats like Jim Webb. It was a great day for conservative Democrats like Heath Shuler in North Carolina and Brad Ellsworth in Indiana.

It was even a good day for some moderate Republicans, like Chris Shays in Connecticut, Deborah Pryce in Ohio and Arnold Schwarzenegger in California, who held on because they are independent.

It was a terrible day for anti-immigration restrictionists on the right of the G.O.P., like J.D. Hayworth and Randy Graf in Arizona.

If you wanted to pick out a stereotypical swing voter in this election, it would be a white evangelical suburban office park mom in a blue state suburb. She's part of the one-third of white evangelicals who voted Democratic this year, as did 20 percent of self-described conservatives. She supported the Iraq war once but believes it has been conducted terribly. She doesn't have a lot of faith in government generally — 54 percent of voters believe government interferes too much, while only 37 percent want it to do more, according to a recent CNN survey — but she does think government should be able to accomplish its core missions.

She embodies the message of E. J. Dionne's 1991 book, "Why Americans Hate Politics," which argues that Americans are sick of symbolic politics, dying ideologies and false choices. Most of all, she's angry that politicians behave in ways that would be unacceptable in every realm of her life, and she thinks they're endangering her country.

In some ways, this election reminds me of the 1974 Democratic sweep. The Republicans have screwed up. Democrats have surged in. But the result leads not to a liberal tide but to Jimmy Carter, who in 1976 ran as a conservative anti-political reformer who won on fiscal discipline and with the support of Pat Robertson.

This election didn't define a new era, but it marks the end of an old one. If Democrats are going to take advantage of their victory, they will have to do two things. They will have to show they have not been taken over by their bloggers or their economic nationalists, who will alienate them from the suburban office park moms. Second, they'll have to come up with ideas as big as the problems we face. Their current platform consists of small-bore tax credits and foreign policy vagaries about, say, "redoubling" our efforts to get Osama bin Laden. (Why not retripling or requadrupling?)

Realignments are achieved by parties that define big new approaches to problems (see F.D.R.'s Commonwealth Club speech), and neither party has done that yet. In the meantime, if I were a Democrat I'd be like Lee Hamilton, the former Indiana congressman and serial commission member. The country is hungering for leaders like him: open-minded, unassuming centrists who are interested in government more than politics. If the Democrats are smart, this could be the beginning of a new Hamiltonian age.

The Thumpees Try Their Luck At The Blame Game (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

President Bush had many explanations for what he called the "thumping" his party took on Tuesday, but the most creative was the notion that his chief strategist, Karl Rove, had spent too much time reading books.

"I obviously was working harder on the campaign than he was," the president said at yesterday's East Room news conference. The reporters laughed. The Architect, who had challenged Bush to a reading contest, wore a sheepish grin and stared at his lap.

True, Rove will have to surrender his "genius" credentials after the GOP lost the House and apparently the Senate. But the recriminations weren't stopping at Rove's door. The president, who started his appearance with an admission that "I share a large part of the responsibility," went on to blame everybody else.

He blamed corruption: "People want their congressmen to be honest and ethical, so in some races that was the primary factor."

He blamed Mark Foley, whose name remained on the Florida ballot: "People couldn't vote directly for the Republican candidate."

He blamed ballot rules. "You could have the greatest positions in the world . . . but to try to get to win on a write-in is really hard to do."

He blamed Democratic organization: "I'm sure Iraq had something to do with the voters' mind, but so did a very strong turnout mechanism."

He blamed bad luck: "If you look at race by race, it was close."

Implicitly, of course, he blamed Donald Rumsfeld, by firing him as defense secretary in favor of the "fresh perspective" of Robert Gates.

And, not least, he blamed the uncomprehending voters: "I thought when it was all said and done, the American people would understand the importance of taxes and the importance of security. But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on."

DOJ_NMG_0092338

The president's performance fit neatly into yesterday's version of the post-election ritual in Washington: The winning side gloated, and the losing side pointed fingers every which way.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, the party's bantam rooster, barely waited until sunrise to start crowing. In a morning news conference at the National Press Club, he stood with hands in his pants pockets and used the word "extraordinary" nine times and "huge" 12 times to explain the triumph: "Huge night!" "Huge achievement!" "Huge step forward!" "Huge mark!" "Huge piece!" "Huge breakthrough!" Dean, who spent much of the election season squabbling over strategy with his fellow Democrats, boasted: "We all worked together, and it came out great."

Republicans were equally determined to show their disunity. While Dean spoke, conservative leaders held dueling news conferences in other rooms at the press club. Their theme: Blame the party, not us. "This was not a repudiation of conservatives," said Pat Toomey, a former GOP congressman. "It was a rejection of the Republican Party." At the rival conservative event across the hall, Richard Viguerie was condemning "the failed big-government policies of President Bush."

GOP officials pointed the finger elsewhere. On Fox News, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said the party's vaunted turnout operation works only "in the very close races." Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), who led House Republicans' campaign efforts, said more Republicans could have won -- if they had acted more like him. "Just take a look at my race," he suggested. He blamed his colleagues for "self-inflicted wounds" and being "caught unprepared," and he blamed the "stiff wind" blowing in Republicans' faces.

The creator of this stiff wind, however, was in no mood for contrition. "Say, why all the glum faces?" Bush asked when he entered the East Room. In fact, his aides had worn exaggerated grins as they took their seats.

Clearly, Bush was trying to tone down the rhetoric from the campaign, when he said the Democratic "approach comes down to this: The terrorists win, and America loses." Yesterday, he voiced soothing notions of "consultations" and "bipartisanship."

But he seemed unsure how much to concede. He began by saying "Iraq had a lot to do with the election." He amended that to "Iraq had something to do with it." And finally he cited cases where "I'm not sure Iraq had much to do with the outcome." While he said "many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure" with Iraq, he looked puzzled when a reporter suggested that voters wanted the troops withdrawn. He said he was "making a change" at the Pentagon to respond to the voters, but he also said he was going to sack Rumsfeld "win or lose."

Likewise, he wrestled with the message voters sent on Tuesday. "If you look at race by race, it was close," he reasoned. "The cumulative effect, however, was not too close. It was a thumping." But when the New York Times' Jim Rutenberg repeated the "thumping" description, Bush bristled. "Let's make sure we get the facts," he said. "I said that the elections were close. The cumulative effect: thumping."

Ken Herman of Cox News teased the wounded president. "That was 'thumpin',' without a 'g,' correct?" he queried. "I just want to make sure we have it right for the transcript."

For Bush's New Direction, Cooperation Is The Challenge (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

Tuesday's electoral earthquake triggered an equally seismic reaction in Washington yesterday, one that signaled more clearly than ever that a politically humbled President Bush now agrees with a resurgent Democratic Party on the need for a change of course in Iraq. What was not clear was whether the two sides are genuinely prepared to work together to produce one.

In the wake of an election that swept Republicans from power in the House and left them on the brink of surrendering their Senate majority as well, both parties have greater incentives to reach accommodation than at any time since Bush was elected in 2000. Iraq will provide the critical test of whether either can overcome the ingrained habits and bad blood of six years of partisan warfare that have often left the Capitol in gridlock.

The president took the most dramatic step yesterday in acknowledging how much the landscape has changed. At a midday news conference he announced that he had accepted the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has come to symbolize the administration's apparent unwillingness to change a policy that has failed to bring order to Iraq and that has lost popular support at home. Bush said it is time for "a fresh perspective" on the war.

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there," he said. "Yet I also believe that most Americans and leaders here in Washington from both political parties understand we cannot accept defeat."

If Bush was willing to dismiss Rumsfeld, which the president said only a week ago that he had no intention of doing, it was in part because he and his party have so much at risk. Tuesday's elections proved to be a reaction not only against the war and the corruption scandals that have scarred Congress but also against the kind of base-driven politics that Bush used in 2004 to win a second term.

That model has often elevated policies and tactics designed to energize conservative activists over an appeal to what many GOP strategists saw as a shrinking middle of the electorate. But on Tuesday, the center struck back, voting decisively for Democratic candidates in House races.

The president responded with a renewed call for bipartisan cooperation, saying leaders on both sides should resist the temptation to divide the country into red and blue. "By putting this election and partisanship behind us, we can launch a new era of cooperation and make these next two years productive ones for the American people," he said.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), in line to become the nation's first female speaker in January, also spoke to what is now widely seen among leaders in both parties as a rejection of partisan polarization.

"The American people spoke out for a return to civility to the Capitol in Washington and how Congress conducts its work," she said in her first news conference after the election. "And Democrats pledge civility and bipartisanship in the conduct of the work here, and we pledge partnerships with the Republicans in Congress and the president, not partisanship."

Bush and Pelosi will meet today to try to begin to forge a relationship that could be critical to both their parties' futures and that will color the atmosphere as the 2008 campaigns take shape.

There are any number of areas where the two sides might begin to try to work together. Immigration policy is one, an area where the president was more at odds with his own party than with some Democrats.

But Iraq will provide the acid test. On that issue, there are significant differences yet to be bridged. Many Democrats favor a shift that would begin to draw down U.S. troop levels. But Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who has been critical of Rumsfeld and the mistakes made by the administration in prosecuting the war, said again yesterday that he favors sending in more troops to try once and for all to suppress the sectarian violence.

William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard and an early advocate of the war, said Bush was wise to let Rumsfeld go, but he cautioned against reading into the decision any move by Bush to begin a withdrawal of U.S. forces. He said a hawkish shift in policy is just as likely as one that calls for the United States to begin to get out.

For there to be any chance at rebuilding public support, Kristol said, "Rumsfeld had to go. . . . For the sake of the war, he had to go. I don't interpret his going as a step toward withdrawal or redeployment," and he does not foresee Bush "looking for a way out."

Democrats said they expect to find many Republican allies on Capitol Hill in pushing Bush closer to their views.

"I know it sounds trite, but elections have profound consequence," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.). He said the president "would be absolutely not tone deaf but stone deaf" to ignore the meaning of Tuesday's elections, adding that Republicans "are not going to allow this president" to stick with the current policy.

Democrats have an agenda of issues other than the war that they will push at the beginning of the new Congress. The list includes raising the minimum wage, providing college-tuition assistance, letting the government negotiate with drug companies over prices for Medicare patients, and implementing the recommendations of the Sept. 11, 2001, commission.

But they recognize, as does the White House, that all those proposals pale in comparison to finding a solution to Iraq. Pelosi said yesterday that the election demonstrated the public's desire for a new direction, but she and other party leaders have been circumspect about exactly what that might entail, other than to begin withdrawing U.S. troops at some point.

Many of the party's newly elected House members campaigned on explicit platforms of withdrawing U.S. forces. Party leaders and prospective Democratic presidential candidates, including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), will be under growing pressure to clarify their and the party's position in coming months.

Many Democrats now look to the Iraq commission chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) to find a solution that will satisfy both president and Democrats. Robert M. Gates, named yesterday as the next defense secretary, sits on that commission.

William A. Galston, a Brookings Institution scholar who served in the Clinton administration, said the experience of the Vietnam War should give Democrats a powerful incentive to cooperate with Republicans to develop a new policy. "This is a matter of great consequence," he said.

In the early 1970s, he said, Democrats ended up blamed for "ending an unpopular war in the wrong way. We paid a price for decades, and to some extent we're struggling against that legacy. The very worst thing we could do is repeat that mistake."

Democrats Close In On Senate (LAT)

By Janet Hook

WASHINGTON — A day after discontent with the Iraq war prompted sweeping election defeats for the Republican Party, President Bush on Wednesday acknowledged voters had given him "a thumping" and said the chief architect of his military strategy, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, had resigned.

The announcement came hours after Democrats won a majority in the House for the first time in 12 years and seemed all but certain to take control of the Senate — barring unexpected changes in the vote totals in two states.

In the past, Bush repeatedly defended Rumsfeld, even as progress in the war stalled and as the Defense secretary, known for his confident and bristling manner, piled up critics in both parties. But on Wednesday, the president said he and Rumsfeld agreed that the Pentagon needed "fresh eyes."

"He himself understands that Iraq is not working well enough, fast enough," Bush said. He said he would nominate Robert M. Gates — who served as CIA director under Bush's father — as his new Defense secretary.

News that one of the most powerful figures in Washington was leaving office came as GOP hopes faded that they could win two close Senate races, in Virginia and Montana, that would decide control of the Senate.

Virginia officials had not confirmed final results, but the Associated Press declared that Democratic candidate Jim Webb had pulled off an upset victory based on new data from election officials in all 134 voting localities. But GOP Sen. George Allen refused to concede. His aides said they wanted to wait for election officials to complete a routine review of the vote totals, expected this week.

Earlier in the day, Montana officials declared Democrat Jon Tester the Senate race winner, but GOP Sen. Conrad Burns had not given in.

In Washington, Democratic leaders were expected to hold a news conference today to celebrate their apparent victories in the two races — which would give them 51 Senate seats to the Republicans' 49. The party has not held both chambers of Congress since 1994.

"I'm obviously disappointed with the outcome of the election," Bush said. "And as the head of the Republican Party, I share a large part of the responsibility."

As House Republicans began to grapple with their loss of at least 28 seats, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said he would quit the party's leadership. That set off a struggle to lead the new House minority party and sparked a round of recriminations over the cause of the defeat.

GOP losses in the House could climb, since about half a dozen races are not yet final.

Bush said he was surprised by how many seats his party lost, even if many defeats were narrow. He spoke at a White House news conference with a chastened tone. "If you look at race by race, it was close," he said. "The cumulative effect, however, was not too close. It was a thumping. But nevertheless, the people expect us to work together."

The ritual of postelection fence-mending began early Wednesday, when Bush began dialing congressional leaders, including Democratic chieftains he rarely consulted while they were in the minority.

"I welcomed the president's call as a sign of respect for the votes of the American people," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the likely next speaker, who was sleeping when Bush called at 7:15 a.m. She and other congressional leaders are to meet with Bush over lunch today.

At her inaugural news conference as presumptive speaker, Pelosi tried to set a conciliatory tone. But she said the election returns were a mandate for change in Iraq.

Bush insisted that the personnel change had been in the works even before he had learned of the election returns.

"After a series of thoughtful conversations, Secretary Rumsfeld and I agreed that the timing is right for a change of leadership at the Pentagon," he said.

That marked a 180-degree turn from Bush's comments to reporters a week ago, when he insisted that Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney would remain in the administration for the rest of his tenure.

Rumsfeld's resignation was welcomed by his critics — Democrats who opposed Bush's Iraq policy as well as Republican allies who faulted the secretary's handling of the Iraq mission.

"This important change offers the administration and Congress a fresh opportunity to examine all aspects of our strategy and tactics in Iraq, and make whatever changes are necessary to succeed there," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a war supporter who has clashed with Rumsfeld.

A key question is whether the shift in Pentagon leadership signals a willingness make policy changes as well. Bush said he was open to a "different approach," but only if the goal was victory in Iraq.

"If the goal is success, then we can work together," he said of the new Democratic majority. "If the goal is 'get out now, regardless,' then that's going to be hard to work together."

However, the election is likely to intensify the pressure for a shift in Bush's Iraq policy.

DOJ_NMG_0092341

Coming after months of military setbacks, the election demonstrated that both Democrats and independents were weary of making sacrifices while stability in Iraq remains elusive. More Republicans now are likely to join the effort to press Bush to find another approach, hoping they will not have to face the 2008 election with 140,000 troops still in Iraq, strategists in both parties say.

Meanwhile, in the next few months, a congressionally appointed study panel headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) is expected to report its suggestions for a new direction on Iraq policy.

In his comments, Bush left himself room to maneuver in the face of these pressures. While insisting he would accept nothing less than victory in Iraq, he said he was eager to talk to the new Democratic leadership, and the study group, about how to achieve that goal.

Some top Democrats have insisted they will not try to push through a cutoff of war funds, as lawmakers did in 1973 to end U.S. participation in Vietnam. But Democrats are likely to wrangle with the White House on how money will be spent on the war.

The first shot in that battle may be over an expected fiscal 2007 supplemental spending request for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars. The services are preparing to ask for a record $160 billion for that purpose, defense analysts say.

In other policy areas, Bush suggested that compromise might be possible with a Democratic-controlled Congress, despite the bitter rhetoric of the campaign.

"I believe we can find some common ground with the Democrats" on a broad rewrite of immigration laws, he said. Bush's vision of the overhaul is supported by more Democrats than Republicans, because many conservatives oppose his plan to offer a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the U.S.

In another olive branch, Bush suggested he might be willing to back an increase in the federal minimum wage, an idea that was a key plank in Democrats' 2006 campaign platform.

Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University, said Bush might be more willing to work with Democrats in the final two years of his presidency. "He might feel more compelled to build his legislative record fast so he is not remembered just for a failed war in Iraq and losing Congress to the Democrats," Zelizer said.

But amid the talk in Washington of renewed bipartisanship, there were already signs of the distrust and bickering that had plagued Congress throughout Bush's tenure.

"Contrary to public statements [by Pelosi] that we're entering a time of 'partnership, not partisanship,' let's be honest," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry (R-N.C.). "Pelosi's House will be marked by two years of partisan warfare, complete with infighting, intrigue, investigation, incompetence and inaction,"

Recriminations were flying as Republicans debated why and how they lost so badly. Many Republicans said the election returns did not represent a landslide mandate for Democrats or for a liberal agenda. They contended that many of the defeated Republicans had been injured by scandal, rather than rejected for their conservative views.

But many conservative activists said the GOP suffered at the polls because it had lost its commitment to controlling spending and limiting government.

"We did not just lose our majority, we lost our way," said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), leader of a large faction of House conservatives.

The finger-pointing is likely to intensify in the power struggle set off by Hastert's decision to step down as the longest-serving Republican speaker. Pence is challenging Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the current majority leader, for the post of minority leader, which will be the No. 1 post for House Republicans.

Another possible contender for minority leader is House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe L. Barton (R-Texas).

Democrats' post-victory unity will be tested by leadership struggles as well. Pelosi is expected to become speaker without contest, but the No. 2 leadership position will be sought by Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, a favorite of party moderates, and Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, who has thrilled liberals with his opposition to the Iraq war.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman James E. Clyburn of South Carolina launched a campaign for majority whip, the No. 3 slot. But Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chief engineer of Tuesday's Democratic victory, is said to be considering running for the post too.

That could put Pelosi in a difficult spot: She might want to reward Emanuel, but she is under pressure from black lawmakers to elevate Clyburn, a former head of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Bush, Pelosi Face Challenge How Much Compromising Can Each Stand To Do? Democrats Close In On Senate By NEIL KING JR., YOCHI J. DREAZEN And GREG JAFFE (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092342

WASHINGTON -- She has called him "oblivious, in denial, dangerous" and "not a leader." He has mocked her self-proclaimed "love" of tax cuts. "If this is... love, I don't want to see what hate looks like," he said recently, drawing roars of laughter from a crowd of supporters.

Now Nancy Pelosi and George W. Bush -- the Democrat representing San Francisco, a city often painted as the country's liberal extreme, and the Republican president from ultraconservative Midland, Texas -- will be forced to work together.

It now appears likely that Mr. Bush will face both a House and a Senate controlled by Democrats, as new projections indicated that the final Senate seat Democrats need for control of that chamber was falling their way. That would make Nevada Democrat Harry Reid the new Senate majority leader in January.

But of all the relationships between the president and Congress's new leaders, the most important will be with Mrs. Pelosi, who now will be the speaker of the House and stand third in line for the presidency. In separate news conferences yesterday, she and the president both said they took the same message from Tuesday's elections: The American people want them to set aside their differences and cooperate for the good of the country.

Years of personal and political animosity, however, will make cooperation between the two political leaders difficult -- as will pressures from their very different, and antagonistic, political bases. The president is going to face new demands from conservatives, who, with the election behind them, are giving free voice to their frustrations with high spending, scandals and social issues. They will be strengthened because a number of Republican moderates got wiped out in Tuesday's vote.

Mrs. Pelosi will get an earful from fellow liberals, emboldened by the party's first big political win in a decade. Many are eager to force the U.S. out of Iraq while boosting spending for a range of social programs. Many old-guard liberals in Congress will assume committee chairmanships, though Ms. Pelosi will be shepherding a majority made possible by the victories of more conservative Democrats from Republican-leaning districts.

Mr. Bush yesterday underscored the potential difficulties of his future relations with the House speaker-to-be: "There's a significant difference between common ground and abandoning principle. She's not going to abandon her principles, and I'm not going to abandon mine."

When the two meet for lunch at the White House today, Mr. Bush and his party will come to the table significantly weakened, and Mrs. Pelosi's Democrats considerably strengthened. Unhappy voters on Tuesday ended the president's six years of mostly unfettered rule with a Republican-led Congress and gave Democrats a majority of the seats in the House of Representatives for the first time in a dozen years. Already yesterday, Mr. Bush took a big first step toward appeasing Democrats by announcing the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a move repeatedly demanded by Mrs. Pelosi and other Democrats.

Bush Accepts Role In Losses (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 9, 2006

A contrite President Bush said yesterday that he shares "a large part" of the responsibility for the "thumping" suffered by Republicans on Election Day, but called on his party's lawmakers to work with the new Democratic leadership in Congress to advance his agenda.

In a press conference just hours after Democrats took control of the House for the first time in 12 years -- and appeared poised to seize the Senate as well -- the president seemed at times glum, at other times pugnacious, as he said the American people had spoken.

"Yesterday, the people went to the polls, and they cast their vote for a new direction in the House of Representatives. And while the ballots are still being counted in the Senate, it is clear the Democrat Party had a good night last night," he said in the White House's East Room.

"I'm obviously disappointed with the outcome of the election, and as the head of the Republican Party, I share a large part of the responsibility. I told my party's leaders that it is now our duty to put the elections behind us and work together with the Democrats and independents on the great issues facing this country," he said.

Although he spent the past few weeks traveling across the country to excoriate Democrats as weak on national security and bent on raising taxes, Mr. Bush said it is time to move past partisan politics and work hard for the American people.

"I believe that the leaders of both political parties must try to work through our differences, and I believe we will be able to work through differences. I've reassured the House and Senate leaders that I intend to work with the new Congress in a bipartisan way to address issues confronting this country. I invited them to come to the White House in the coming days to discuss the important work remaining this year and to begin conversations about the agenda for next year," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0092343

Asked about his ability to work with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat expected to become House speaker in the next Congress, Mr. Bush said, "If you hold grudges in this line of work, you're never going to get anything done." And he acknowledged that the victory by Mrs. Pelosi's party would have policy consequences.

"Look, this was a close election. If you look at it race by race, it was close. The cumulative effect, however, was not too close. It was a thumping," Mr. Bush said. "But, nevertheless, the people expect us to work together. That's what they expect."

The president immediately granted a key demand of Democrats by announcing the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Bush praised Democrats for a "disciplined campaign" and a "superb job of turning out their votes," but he lobbed a barb at his chief White House political strategist, Karl Rove, who failed for the first time in three elections to deliver a win for the president.

For months, Mr. Bush has publicly joked about an informal contest between himself and Mr. Rove as to who could read the most books. When asked yesterday about who was winning the contest, Mr. Bush said: "I'm losing. I obviously was working harder on the campaign than he was."

The remark drew a tight smile from Mr. Rove at the press conference -- and a collective "oooh" from the White House press corps.

Mr. Rove, who orchestrated a historic Republican gain of congressional seats during the 2002 midterm elections, had told The Washington Times late last month that he was "confident we're going to keep the Senate; I'm confident we're going to keep the House." Instead, Democrats gained at least 29 House seats and at least four Senate seats, pending delayed results, recounts and any court challenges.

Mr. Bush also had made optimistic predictions during the campaign's final weeks. He said yesterday that those mistaken forecasts did not show that he was "out of touch."

"I'm an optimistic person, is what I am. I knew we were going to lose seats, I just didn't know how many," he said. "But the people have spoken, and now it's time for us to move on."

Still, although Mr. Bush said he realized that the American people "voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made" in Iraq, he asserted that his strategy -- and his responsibility -- will not change.

"The election has changed many things in Washington, but it has not changed my fundamental responsibility, and that is to protect the American people from attack. As the commander in chief, I take these responsibilities seriously," he said.

Mr. Bush acknowledged that the Iraq policy was "not working well enough, fast enough," but he also sought to warn U.S. enemies, while making assurances to Iraqis and U.S. troops.

"To our enemies: Do not be joyful. Do not confuse the workings of our democracies with a lack of will," he said. "To the people of Iraq: Do not be fearful. As you take the difficult steps toward democracy and peace, America's going to stand with you. We know you want a better way of life, and now is the time to seize it."

And to U.S. troops, he said: "Don't be doubtful. America will always support you."

The president also said that Democrats, who he said on the campaign trail lacked a cohesive plan for Iraq, must now "make up their minds."

"I can understand Americans saying, 'Come home.' But I don't know if they said: 'Come home and leave behind an Iraq that could end up being a safe haven for al Qaeda,' " he said. "I don't believe they said that."

Bush Pledges To Work With Democrats (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann And Tom Raum, Associated Press Writers

AP, November 9, 2006

President Bush pledged Wednesday to work with Democrats after the "thumping" that Republicans took on Election Day. He named a new defense secretary to oversee the war in Iraq, a change the president said was going to happen regardless of which party won the election.

Bush said former CIA Director Robert Gates, if confirmed by the Senate, would replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon.

Gates is a "patriot" and "strategic thinker" with a transformational spirit, Bush said from the Oval Office.

"He's a man of integrity, candor and sound judgment," the president said. "He knows that the challenge of protecting our country is larger than any political party. He has a record of working with leaders on both sides of the aisle to strengthen our national security. He has my confidence and my trust."

Bush praised Rumsfeld, in the Cabinet from the start of the Bush presidency, saying, "America is safer and the world is more secure because of the leadership and the service of Don Rumsfeld."

DOJ_NMG_0092344

Bush said he had been talking with Rumsfeld about whether it was time for a fresh perspective at the department, and the two agreed Tuesday it was appropriate for Rumsfeld to resign.

"It's been quite a time," Rumsfeld said. Then, quoting Winston Churchill, he said: "I have benefited greatly from criticism, and at no time have I suffered a lack thereof."

The announcement came the day after Democrats captured control of the House after 12 years of GOP rule and erased the Republican majority in the Senate. One Senate race remained to be decided — in Virginia, where Democrat James Webb held a slight lead of Republican Sen. George Allen. If Democrats win that seat, they would hold a 51-49 edge in the Senate; an Allen victory would split the Senate 50-50, with Vice President Dick Cheney, as president of the Senate, in position with a tie-breaking vote.

Bush called Democratic leaders to congratulate them and he expressed both disappointment and surprise over the vote.

"I thought we were going to do fine yesterday, shows what I know," Bush said at a news conference hours before introducing Gates as his nominee. "But I thought we were going to be fine in the election. My point to you is that, win or lose, Bob Gates was going to become the nominee."

Bush seemed stoic about the election, proclaiming: "This isn't my first rodeo."

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made" in Iraq, the president said. "Yet I also believe most Americans — and leaders here in Washington from both political parties — understand we cannot accept defeat."

Gates led the CIA from November 1991 to January 1993 under former President George H.W. Bush. The president said he met with Gates over the weekend at Bush's ranch in Crawford, Texas.

"Bob Gates will bring a fresh perspective and great managerial experience," Bush said.

Bush was asked by reporters whether he retained full confidence in Cheney, a chief advocate of the war, and whether the vice president would serve out the rest of his term.

"Yes he does, yes he will," Bush replied.

Yet only a week ago, Bush told The Associated Press and other reporters in an interview that he expected Rumsfeld and Cheney to stay through the end of his last two years in the White House. Asked Wednesday about that comment, Bush acknowledged he intentionally misled reporters because he want to avoid a change at the Pentagon during a hotly contested election.

"I didn't want to inject a major decision about this war in the final days of a campaign," Bush said. "And so the only way to answer that question, and to get you onto another question was to give you that answer. ... The other reason why is I hadn't had a chance to visit with Bob Gates yet, and I hadn't had my final conversation with Don Rumsfeld yet, at that point."

The president joked that he had given House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, in line to become the first female speaker of the House, the name of a Republican interior decorator to help her pick out drapes for her new office. The comment was poke at the California Democrat's pre-election remark about having her pick of Capitol suites.

As to the role played in Tuesday's widespread GOP losses, Bush said, "I believe Iraq had a lot to do with the election, but I think there were other factors as well." He suggested that a variety of congressional scandals may also have played a role.

He said he would seek to find common ground with Pelosi, but without either of them compromising their principles.

Bush was asked at his East Room news conference about Pelosi's past derogatory comments describing him as a liar and dangerous.

"I know when campaigns end and governing begins," he said. "If you hold grudges in this line of work, you never get anything done."

Bush also got in a dig at his trusted top political adviser, Karl Rove. Rove is widely credited with Bush's presidential victories in 2000 and 2004 and GOP gains in the 2002 congressional elections. As recently as last week, Rove predicted Republican would retain both House and Senate.

"I obviously was working harder in the campaign than he was," said Bush, who stumped hard for GOP candidates, especially troubled ones in traditionally Republican states.

Bush said he wanted to hear other views on Iraq, and was looking forward to recommendations by a commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana. Bush said expected to meet with the group, which includes Gates, early next week.

Still, Bush added, "We're not going to leave before the job is done."

Power Shift Begins As New Congress Emerges (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman, Tribune National Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, November 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0092345

As the extent of the Democratic rout became apparent Wednesday with Republicans likely losing control of the Senate, President Bush promised to work with the new leaders of Congress and Democrats moved quickly to consolidate power and pushed for a new path in Iraq.

"I'm, obviously, disappointed with the outcome of the election, and as the head of the Republican Party, I share a large part of the responsibility," said Bush, who described the results as "a thumpin'." "I told my party's leaders that it is now our duty to put the elections behind us and work together with the Democrats and Independents on the great issues facing this country."

The Associated Press reported late Wednesday the Democrats had won the pivotal Virginia Senate race, claiming Democrat Jim Webb had unseated Republican George Allen and that had given the Democrats total control of Congress for the first time in 12 years. AP contacted election officials in all 134 localities where voting occurred, obtaining updated numbers Wednesday. The new AP count showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236.

But the official canvass was not complete, and a senior adviser to the Allen campaign, who spoke on the condition he not be named, said, "The senator is going to see the canvass through. It should wrap up by mid to late afternoon tomorrow. He has no intention of dragging this out. If the numbers hold true to what they were on election night and there is no dramatic movement, he is disinclined to pursue a recount."

At the top of the issues facing Bush and Congress is the war in Iraq, and Democratic leaders expressed a measure of conciliation toward Bush and the Republicans as they began to lay out their agenda.

"This is something that we must work together with the president," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who is expected to be the next Speaker of the House, replacing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.).

Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who would become the Senate majority leader assuming the Virginia race is finally called for Democrat Jim Webb, said the election confirmed Democrats' call for a change in direction, particularly on Iraq.

"Without getting into the details of what we want to do legislatively, the main point is that we want to do things on a bipartisan basis," Reid said.

Bush himself acknowledged the need for some sort of change regarding the war when he fired Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made," Bush said. "Yet I also believe most Americans - and leaders here in Washington from both political parties - understand we cannot accept defeat."

The historic midterm election provided a sharp rebuke to Bush and his policies, as well as to a congressional Republican leadership that allowed runaway federal spending and suffered ethical lapses in its ranks.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), for example, said it was time for Republicans to look in the mirror and reflect on where they went wrong.

"Over the last several years, Republicans have experimented with big government, and we have now seen the result," he said, pointing to the war in Iraq, scandals and unnecessary pork-barrel spending projects.

In the House, Republicans lost 29 seats, Democrats gained 30 and several races were still being counted or recounted the day after the election.

In the Senate, five Republican senators lost their seats-- in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Missouri, and Montana. In Virginia, Sen. George Allen sought a recount, but his opponent, Webb, appeared to have won by about 7,000 votes. If Virginia ultimately goes to the Democrats, the Senate would be divided 51-49 with Republicans in the minority.

The new balance of power in Washington immediately kicked off behind-the-scenes battles for power in the ranks of Democratic and Republican House members.

Hastert, for example, said he would not seek a Republican leadership post after he hands the gavel over to Pelosi. But House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) is expected to face challenges for the top GOP leadership spot from Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and possibly Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas).

"I am running for Republican leader, because I believe that we did not just lose our majority-we lost our way," Pence wrote in a letter to Republican colleagues Wednesday. "We are in the wilderness because we walked away from the limited government principles that minted the Republican Congress."

On the other side of the aisle, the Democratic whip, Steny Hoyer of Maryland, announced he would run for House majority leader, touting his skills as a vote counter, as well as his role bringing Democrats to the majority.

"We have a two-year period in which to demonstrate that we can govern and lead - and our success will be critical to our ability to retain the majority," Hoyer, who is expecting a challenge from Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.), said in a letter to colleagues.

Meanwhile, Democrats may find themselves embroiled in another battle to choose a successor to Hoyer as the majority whip. Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.), a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, has thrown his hat in the ring, but Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) is also mulling a bid.

At a press conference early Wednesday, Emanuel said he has not made a decision yet and is consulting with colleagues. He said he would have to evaluate both his professional responsibilities, as well as his family responsibilities. "I'll be making a decision in short order," he said.

A senior Democratic leadership aide acknowledged that the caucus owed Emanuel a debt for his work running the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, but said Emanuel would have to decide whether he wanted to alienate the black caucus by running against Clyburn, a popular and easygoing lawmaker.

Still, the official said, "We wouldn't be here today if it weren't for him."

According to exit polls, Democrats made gains with moderates, swing voters, independents, Catholics, Hispanics and people who live in the suburbs. Republicans hung onto conservative voters, but it was not enough to fend off the aggressive challenge waged by Democrats in every region of the country.

As Democrats celebrated their victory and vowed to work across party lines to accomplish results, Republicans engaged in a bout of self-flagellation and recriminations.

"We came to Washington to change government and government changed us," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who had spent the last year campaigning for Republicans throughout the country. "We departed rather tragically from our conservative principles."

In Delaware, Republican Rep. Mike Castle echoed what Democrats had been saying all along: "It is clear the American people are frustrated with the war in Iraq and with this administration and they voted for change."

But GOP Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois placed blame with the corruption and scandals that led to the resignation of former Rep. Mark Foley of Florida, former Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas, and former Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio.

"That's not policy, that's in essence a party that imploded because of personal problems," Shimkus said.

With votes still being counted, Democrats appeared to have picked up another seat in Pennsylvania. Patrick Murphy, an Iraq war veteran, ousted Rep. Mike Fitzpatrick, a freshman Republican, by just 1,500 votes.

In Ohio, the fate of two Republicans, Reps. Deborah Pryce and Jean Schmidt, remained in doubt as election officials worked to tally provisional and absentee ballots. Pryce is chairman of the House GOP Conference, the fourth-ranking Republican. Schmidt put her seat in jeopardy after suggesting on the floor that Murtha, a decorated Marine and Vietnam veteran, was a coward for suggesting that American troops should leave Iraq.

Other House race results were inconclusive in Arizona, Wyoming, Washington, North Carolina and Florida.

With Control Of The Senate In The Balance, All Eyes Turn To Virginia (NYT)

By John M. Broder And Ian Urbina

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

RICHMOND, Va., Nov. 8 — Never mind that Senator George Allen of Virginia had not conceded. Jim Webb, his Democratic opponent, claimed victory Wednesday on the strength of a roughly 7,000-vote margin.

And The Associated Press, a widely accepted authority for calling elections, agreed with Mr. Webb, declaring Mr. Allen, a Republican, the loser.

For the first full day after the balloting, Virginia remained the focal point of American politics, with a race whose outcome will determine which party controls the United States Senate. Mr. Allen's advisers said Wednesday night that he would do nothing until a canvass of ballots was completed. But Democrats — ecstatic at the prospect that they might have swept both houses of Congress — were not waiting.

"It is virtually 100 percent that Webb is going to win the race," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who is leading the Democratic effort to take back the Senate. "I think you can say without any hesitancy or doubt that Democrats are going to be the majority party in the Senate."

Mr. Webb began planning his transition, and aides to Mr. Allen suggested that he could acknowledge defeat as early as Thursday afternoon.

If they hold up, the victories of Mr. Webb and Jon Tester, the Democratic Senate challenger in Montana, would give the Democrats control of the Senate for the first time since 2002 and control of the entire Congress for the first time in a dozen years.

Mr. Webb, taking a page from the Republican playbook in the contested presidential vote count in Florida in 2000, tried to cast his victory as inevitable. But Mr. Allen's advisers on Wednesday still held out the possibility of a recount.

Aides to Mr. Webb began referring to him as Virginia's senator-elect, and this afternoon he issued a news release naming three members of his transition team.

DOJ_NMG_0092347

Democratic Party officials and some news organizations, including MSNBC and The A.P., declared Mr. Webb the winner of the election with a margin of less than one-half of 1 percent out of more than 2.3 million ballots cast. A candidate can request a recount in Virginia if the vote difference is less than one percentage point.

State officials were conducting a rapid canvass of the vote as part of a formal certification of the result. They could be done by Thursday afternoon, officials said.

Members of the Allen camp said earlier in the day that they expected the review would cut into Mr. Webb's lead, but stopped short of predicting that it would reverse the outcome.

Mr. Allen will speak as soon as the canvass is done, said a senior Allen adviser who spoke on the condition of anonymity. The adviser made it clear that if the margin did not narrow significantly, Mr. Allen would not challenge the result.

"He has no intention of dragging this out," the adviser said.

Democratic leaders expressed certainty that their margins in Virginia and Montana would hold, giving them unquestioned control of the Senate, to accompany the grasp of the House, which they won convincingly on Tuesday.

A concession by Mr. Allen would end a rough campaign marked by accusations of racism against him and sexism against Mr. Webb in a contest that alienated many voters, particularly women, and has apparently left the senator's once-promising political career in tatters.

Mr. Webb, a former Republican who was secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, ran a fairly listless campaign until the final weeks, when he adopted the persona of the warrior he was in the Marine Corps.

A spokeswoman for him, Kristian Denny Todd, said Wednesday that Virginia's vote-counting procedure was methodical and accurate, and expressed confidence that Mr. Webb's margin would hold .

"The bottom line," Ms. Denny Todd said, "is the votes have been counted and Jim Webb has won. It could have gone the other way, but it didn't. We're on top, and that's the way it's going to stay."

Virginia election results "rarely, rarely, rarely" change after certification, Ms. Denny Todd said, citing a recount in a race for attorney general last year in which the margin was fewer than 400 votes both before and after a recount.

At least one other race faced the possibility of a recount. In Florida, Vern Buchanan, a Republican, and Christine Jennings, the Democrat opposing him in the race for the Congressional seat being vacated by Representative Katherine Harris, appear headed for a recount with Mr. Buchanan ahead by 368 votes.

Last Chance By DAVID FRUM (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

The Bush administration woke up yesterday morning to a deeply ugly political situation. Those polls that show the president below 40% approval? They would look even worse if they surveyed only Republican members of Congress. As for the president's opponents: They are slavering for a nice two-year-long munch on the administration's haunches.

Worst of all, the administration seems to have exhausted its energy. Frustrated by Iraq, wounded by Katrina, thwarted in its two most recent major domestic initiatives (Social Security and immigration), the administration looks baffled, uncertain and often strangely passive.

But President Bush can yet regain the initiative. His opponents in Congress are badly divided amongst themselves: Witness Nancy Pelosi's attempt last spring to engineer the ouster of her own No. 2, Steny Hoyer, in favor of John Murtha.

Mr. Bush's Democratic opponents are also burdened with a very visible extremist wing. There is a real possibility that Alcee Hastings will be named chairman of the extremely important Intelligence Committee -- he of course being the Florida ex-judge impeached and removed in 1989 on corruption charges. The Democrats are also haunted by gnawing fears that crucial segments of the American electorate distrust them as cultural aliens and foreign-policy weaklings, as demonstrated by the panicked Democratic reaction to John Kerry's inadvertent slur against the troops in Iraq.

With a little ingenuity, the Bush administration could take advantage of these weaknesses -- and make yesterday's defeat work to its own advantage. President Bush should prepare to bombard Congress and the media with new ideas and proposals that rally his own party, divide his opponents and drive a wedge between left-wing Democrats and the voting public. So long as he is acting, he forces Congress to react.

The president's critics complain that the administration has lacked accomplishments over these past two years. The new Congress offers an opportunity to prove that Republicans remain the party of ideas -- and that their opponents still lack them. The nomination of Robert Gates to replace Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense offers a new start. The serene and knowledgeable Mr. Gates is in for a grilling, but by standing his ground and insisting on the importance of succeeding in Iraq, he can expose to the TV-watching public the real beliefs and purposes of left-leaning Democrats like Carl Levin.

At home, the administration should seek less to pass legislation -- although legislative success is always welcome -- than to clarify the differences between the parties for 2008. For instance: The president talked vaguely in 2005 of a grand new tax reform, but never gave enough detail to interest anybody in his ideas. What he had in mind, of course, was a shift away from taxing work, savings and investment toward taxing consumption. Good idea, but awfully abstract. The next Congress offers an opportunity to make it clear what this reform means.

President Bush has repeatedly asked Congress to make permanent his cuts in the income, dividend, estate and capital-gains taxes, as well as his doubling of the child tax credit. Congress has hesitated, citing fears of the impact of permanent tax cuts on the U.S. fiscal balance. These cuts constitute the most valuable element of Mr. Bush's domestic legacy. It's worth fighting to remind the country that Democrats would allow the president's tax relief to lapse -- and that if Democrats are allowed to return to power, taxes will shoot back up in 2010.

The president should send Congress a tax-reform proposal now, shaping it so that it appeals to enough Democrats to split the opposition. Here's one way to do that: Democrats have made a great theme of "energy independence." The president has likewise denounced America's "addiction to oil" and often presented nuclear power as a crucial element of an ideal energy policy. What if he baited the Democrats with some kind of energy tax (or, better, a carbon tax -- which exempts nuclear-generated energy) in exchange for permanent cuts in taxes on work, savings and investment. "Tax waste, not work" is not a bad slogan.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that a carbon tax that began at $12 per ton emitted and rose gradually to $17 would raise $208 billion over 10 years. That's enough to fully compensate for the cost to the Treasury of making permanent the president's cuts to taxes on capital gains and dividends -- and leave over almost $40 billion to balance the budget.

Education reform offers another opportunity for the administration to display energy and highlight opponents' divisions. The testing system instituted by the No Child Left Behind law will soon begin delivering its five-year report cards. Many American schools will be rated as failing -- and very likely the majority of these schools will be found in Democratic congressional districts. Over the past five years -- and over the 20 years before that -- hundreds of billions of dollars have been poured into America's worst schools, without discernible improvement.

George Bush entered politics as an educational reformer. Now, he can return to the good fight by scooping an idea from an opponent. Former Labor Secretary Robert Reich has proposed a voucher system that would grant progressively larger vouchers to children from poorer families. Given how much taxpayers already pay to support the nation's worst schools -- the District of Columbia spends more per child than any other jurisdiction -- Mr. Reich's idea might even save money. But it would certainly put the cat among the Democratic pigeons, especially if the president recruited Mr. Reich to lobby for it.

Democrats have effectively used ethics as a political lever against Republicans. With the election behind them, they will surely welcome the chance to transform their slogans into reality. The president might take the lead in calling for a voluntary ban on lobbyist-paid travel by members of Congress. And since we should want to encourage members of Congress to travel abroad, the president should propose a formal congressional travel fund. Make the fund big -- at least double what is being spent now -- and propose a special joint House-Senate subcommittee to oversee it based on the principle: oversight yes, golf no.

Over the next two years, executive energy must be more than a doctrine. It may prove the key to Republican survival -- and the coming conservative resurgence.

After The Thumpin' (NYT)

By William Safire

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

Washington

WHY all the glum faces?" President Bush asked at the opening of yesterday's news conference.

Though the assembled reporters were hardly glum, conservatives of every stripe can console themselves by considering the limited scope of the Democrats' midterm sweep.

Despite the pervasive weariness with the war and the high tide of irritation at Bush's steadfastness; despite the general disgust at the policy paralysis and ethical laxity in the wake of muscle-bound one-party control — the result was only the average loss of House and Senate seats of the party in power midway in the second term of a president.

A political shakeup every dozen years is a necessary cathartic for the two-party system. What's more, the rightward cast of many Democrats in the freshman class is hardly bad news for conservativism. And the heartening victory of Joe Lieberman over the angry far left in liberal Connecticut augurs a renewal of a brief period of bipartisanship at the water's edge.

Where does our renewed two-party nation go from here?

First, leadership is never weakened by a little humility. After what he called "the thumpin'," the president showed he got the voters' message on Iraq: "I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made there." But in acknowledging that "they cast their vote for a new direction," he didn't wring his hands: "The people have spoken and now it's time to move on."

Months ago, he had made provision for that "new direction" response — a phrase acceptable to hawks provided the direction is not out, quick — in the post-election report to be made by James Baker and Lee Hamilton's Iraq study group. The report should give cover to increased pressure on elected Iraqi leaders to confront the urgent needs of nationhood.

By placing Robert "Fresh Eyes" Gates, a former C.I.A. chief, on that panel, Bush paved the way for Donald Rumsfeld to absorb the need of opposition politicians for bureaucratic punishment. The loyal SecDef's resignation after the poll results was Bush's act of contrition.

Now the president should take the Democratic leaders up on their fine post-election expressions of bipartisanship. He's headed to Asia for an economic meeting in Hanoi. In its lame-duck session beginning next week, Congress should pass the $67 million earmark to Vietnam called for by Bush primarily for AIDS treatment. Then he should seize the initiative to get some cooperation on domestic progress during the final days of the outgoing, unlamented 109th Congress. In addition to the usual budgetary housekeeping between Thanksgiving and Christmas, both parties should make a concerted effort to deal with the most doable urgent domestic need: to resolve the fears of 12 million Hispanic "illegals" living in the United States.

Bush has already proposed a comprehensive compromise: a guest worker program with earnable citizenship for those here now, as well as a border fence to stop the influx of Mexicans. But Republicans — fearful of nativist voters shouting "no amnesty" — passed only the harsh half, and that unfunded fence is a joke. Now Bush, with many Democrats already supporting his approach, should get recalcitrant Republicans to pass his fair-minded immigration package. It would be a test of both new Republican discipline and Democrats' sincerity on bipartisanship.

The window of bipartisan compromise can also fit a minimum wage increase tied to inheritance tax reduction; energy drilling tied to mileage standards and alternative fuels subsidy. But the window won't be open long. That's because the committees of the 110th Congress will be headed by the liberal Old Bulls eager to pass "one-house bills" useful only to provide hearings and make headlines.

Committee chairmen like Charles Rangel of Ways and Means, John Dingell of Energy and Commerce, Barney Frank of Financial Services and others will crowd the airwaves with hearings grilling contractors and torturing accused torturers.

After a few months of this posturing, a newly emboldened Bush, emulating F.D.R.'s derision of the isolationists "Martin, Barton and Fish," will be moved to denounce "Rangel, Dingell and Frank." This will be the signal for new Republican leaders, like Mike Pence of Indiana, to take up the tactic of Harry Truman by denouncing "the do-nothing 110th Congress." At the same time, as the 2008 primaries loom, the Trumanesque Bush will measure his reduction of troops in Iraq by the ability of the Iraqis to take over their own defense.

That's when the new Democratic majority will suffer great stress. Senator Hillary Clinton evoked "the vital, dynamic center" in her victory speech, and Representative Rahm Emanuel was the model of non-hubristic responsibility during the delighted Democratic deluge. But it's hard to imagine Nancy Pelosi, Howard Dean, Kerry-Gore-Edwards campaigners and the whole loser left holding still into the snows of New Hampshire.

Into that incipient split of the new Congressional majority will march John McCain, Rudy Giuliani, Mitt Romney and the other conservative, internationalist hopes. So cheer up, my fellow right-wingers, especially those of you who have grown too accustomed to winning every election night. Sometimes we have to suffer a loud, corrective slap before readying the political counterpunch.

Speaker Pelosi (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 9, 2006

Tuesday's Democratic election victory was by any measure decisive, yet in the perspective of history also unsurprising. In the sixth year of a two-term Presidency, Americans rebuked Republicans on Capitol Hill who had forgotten their principles and a President who hasn't won the Iraq war he started. While a thumping defeat for the GOP, the vote was about competence, not ideological change.

This is not to minimize the Democrats' victory, which they deserve to savor after several frustrating election nights. Credit in particular goes to Rahm Emanuel and Chuck Schumer, who led the House and Senate efforts to pick candidates who could win in GOP-leaning states. Their leaders, notably Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi, also kept in check their ideological ambitions to make Tuesday a referendum on Republican governance. It was a shrewd strategy.

All the more so because the GOP gave them so much ammunition. By our count, at least eight GOP House seats fell largely due to scandal; campaign-finance ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff probably cost Conrad Burns his Senate seat in Montana. These columns have spent several years warning Republicans that their overspending, corrupt "earmarks" and policy drift would undermine their claim as the party of reform. On Tuesday they did.

The GOP "base" voted in respectable numbers, but enough of it voted for Democrats to make the difference. At 32%, the self-identified conservative share of the electorate was down only slightly from 2004 (34%), and the liberal share of 21% stayed the same. What changed is that the GOP won fewer conservative and independent votes. * * *

Democrats were able to exploit this frustration even without offering much of their own agenda. While this worked in the campaign, it leaves in doubt how Democrats will use their new power. In the minority, they could assail "George Bush's war" and threaten impeachment to mobilize their base without fear of being held responsible. Now they will have to govern. For Ms. Pelosi, this will mean deciding how much deference to give to the Great Society liberals who will soon run most House committees. Henry Waxman, David Obey, Pete Stark, Ed Markey, John Conyers, Barney Frank: These are sons of the Sixties who helped drive the Carter and Clinton Presidencies off a cliff.

They represent the soul of the Democratic House but not the desires of most voters in the 15 seats or so that provided their margin of victory on Tuesday. To sustain their majority in 2008 and beyond, Democrats will have to hold such seats as those won in eastern Pennsylvania by pro-military veterans Admiral Joe Sestak and Chris Carney, or in North Carolina by pro-life, anti-gun control Heath Shuler.

We doubt voters in those seats chose Democrats with a goal of "censuring" Mr. Bush, much less impeaching him, or because they want a tax increase or an unseemly retreat from Iraq. Flooding the Beltway with subpoenas and partisan hearings may be cathartic for the Bush-hating left, but it won't send a signal that Democrats are different from the DeLay Republicans. If Ms. Pelosi sides with the antiwar Jack Murtha against Maryland's moderate Steny Hoyer in the race for House Majority Leader, Republicans will be overjoyed at this signal that the old liberals are back in charge.

In the Senate, probable Majority Leader Harry Reid faces a comparable choice. His predecessor, Tom Daschle, lost the majority and later his own seat in large part because he played the role of obstructionist, especially on judges. Democrats might note that they gained Senate seats this year after having confirmed two Supreme Court Justices and taking judges off the table as a dominant election issue. At the very least, immigration and education are two areas where Democrats should be able to find common ground with Mr. Bush.

The biggest question mark, and responsibility, for Democrats is on Iraq and the war on terror. They could do themselves and the country much good by working with Mr. Bush on a strategy toward achieving victory in Iraq as well as against al Qaeda. This means more than bromides about a "phased withdrawal" of troops next year, which won't encourage Iraq's militias to disarm; and it means more than Mr. Murtha's "redeployment" to Okinawa or somewhere else where the world would see that the U.S. has given up on Iraq.

The Democrats could be most constructive by taking up the call of Senators Joe Lieberman and John McCain to do whatever it takes to win in Iraq. If this means more troops, Iraqi or American, they should call for them. And if it means spending more to build a larger American military in this era of the global terrorist threat, they should do that too. This would not sit well with many on the antiwar left, but then Ned Lamont lost to Mr. Lieberman once their contest moved to an electorate larger than the Democratic primaries.

In Tuesday's exit polls, for all of their other woes, Republicans still had an advantage over Democrats of seven percentage points as the party more likely to keep the country safer from terrorism. Since this threat isn't going away, Democrats won't help their image going into 2008 by opposing warrantless wiretaps against al Qaeda or the rest of the antiwar agenda. They would be smarter to make themselves partners in giving institutional permanence to Mr. Bush's best post-9/11 policies.

All told, the Republicans deserved the electoral drubbing they received. Democrats will now have to prove they deserved the majority that GOP failure has handed them.

The Democratic House (NYT)

The New York Times, November 9, 2006

There was only one explanation for the crazy-quilt combination of victories around the country that gave the Democrats control of the House of Representatives last night: an angry shout of repudiation of the Bush White House and the abysmal way the Republican majority has run Congress.

It was a satisfying expression of the basic democratic principle of accountability. A government that performs badly is supposed to be punished by the electorate. And this government has performed badly on so many counts.

The Republicans created their defeat by focusing obsessively on the right-wing “base,” ostracizing not only the Democrats but their own party’s more moderate legislators. The conflict between the extremist House and the conservative Senate created a phony center, far to the right of the general public’s idea of where the middle ought to be. Yesterday, moderate Republicans in heavily Democratic states were done in by their party’s excesses. In Rhode Island, more than 60 percent of the voters told pollsters that they liked their Republican senator, Lincoln Chafee. But he was soundly defeated anyway.

The Democrats won a negative victory, riding on the wave of public anger about Republicans. The new House majority will certainly call the administration to account on any number of issues, but it will have to do far more than run investigations if it is to build on its victory.

For years now, the Democrats have been not only the minority party, but a particularly powerless minority, elbowed out of virtually any role other than that of critic. The House Democrats will have to shift from the role of tactical opposition to shadow government. They will have to pass bills — bills that might not make it into law, but that would provide a clear idea of what their party would do if it were really in control.

And while they are trying to build a new majority, the Democrats need to remember what happens when a party in power loses its way.

Message Of 2006: Moderates Fed Up With Polarization (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

The 2006 election results were a rebuke not just to President Bush and Congressional Republicans but to radio talk-show hosts and other right-wing polarizers.

The right managed to win seven more anti-gay marriage referendums across the country, but it was repudiated on Iraq, immigration and excessive religiosity.

At the same time, while Democrats won control of the House and possibly the Senate, they did so by capturing the votes of moderates and independents, whom they could lose easily with demonstrations of wretched excess.

It's encouraging that Bush and incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and likely Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) are talking the language of bipartisan cooperation, but Democrats will be strongly tempted to exercise their passions against the president and his policies.

Exit polls showed that, once again, self-identified moderates made up a near-majority of the electorate — 47 percent — and this group split 62 percent to 36 percent Democratic — a 9-point Democratic gain from 2002 and 8 points above 2004.

Only 21 percent of voters identified themselves as liberals and 32 percent as conservatives. Liberals supported Democrats nearly 90 percent of the time, while conservatives voted Republican by less than 80 percent.

While Republican and Democratic candidates held their partisan base voters by margins above 90 percent, independents went Democratic by a margin of 58 percent to 38 percent, a 10-point gain over 2002 and 9 points over 2004.

Clearly, these elections were a classic "six-year itch" referendum on the incumbent president — and that Bush lost.

The scale of this loss was on par with the post-war average for such elections: close to 30 House seats versus the average of 32, and likely six Senate seats compared to the average of eight.

In elections when the president's popularity was low because of war, scandal or recession, however, the average is 47 House seats and eight Senate seats.

Democrats did not campaign on a distinct positive agenda, but rather against Bush and the Iraq War and for an ill-defined "new direction."

Bush, of course, failed to win a majority of the popular vote in 2000, yet began governing as though he had won a smashing mandate. Largely because of his response to terrorism, he managed to defy history by increasing his party's majorities in two subsequent elections.

But he has turned himself into one of the most polarizing presidents in American history. And history has at last caught up with him.

The loudest message from the elections is that the nation wants a change of policy in Iraq. By a margin of 57 percent to 41 percent, voters said they oppose the war.

By 59 percent to 34 percent, voters said the war has not improved American security, and by 56 percent to 37 percent, they called for withdrawal of some or all U.S. troops, as opposed to maintaining current levels or sending more.

Yet full withdrawal is a distinct minority position — 30 percent — and Democrats won't have the country's support if they force it. Encouragingly, they say they won't.

The clearest repudiation of the loud right came on the issue of immigration. By a margin of 57 percent to 38 percent, voters said they wanted illegal immigrants who work in the U.S. to be allowed a chance to apply for legal status and not be deported.

Voters in Arizona rejected two of the nation's most vociferous immigration restrictionists, Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R) and Minuteman founder Randy Graf (R).

House Republicans massively bought into the talk-show claque's agenda by rejecting Bush's Latino-friendly proposal for comprehensive immigration reform, and they've suffered important damage as a result.

DOJ_NMG_0092352

Bush managed to capture 44 percent of the Latino vote in 2004, according to disputed exit polls, but this year Hispanics went Democratic by a margin of 72 percent to 27 percent, 10 points higher than in 2002.

If Republicans and Democrats are looking for an issue around which to demonstrate they can unify and accomplish something, they could use the lame-duck session of Congress to pass the comprehensive Senate immigration bill.

The exit polls also suggest that a revolt took place this year against the right's infusion of religious dogma into politics — as in the effort to keep brain-damaged Terri Schiavo alive and Bush's veto of expanded federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research.

Some of the biggest gains scored by Democrats over 2002 election results were among people who attend church a few times a month (a 16 percent Democratic gain), a few times a year (10 percent) or never (13 percent).

At the same time, the rapid spread of anti-gay-marriage constitutional amendments in the states is the consequence of overreaching by liberal courts that have short-circuited the political process on a deeply felt social issue.

Democrats also gained 10 points among white males, possibly reflecting the fact that only 29 percent of voters said their personal finances were in better shape than they were two years ago and that 68 percent said they were barely maintaining their standard of living or were falling behind.

Democrats and Republicans have to work together to improve workers' ability to cope with the high-tech global economy. Democrats will be tempted to be as isolationist on trade as Republicans have been restrictionist on immigration, but that would be a losing proposition.

Democrats and Republicans have a lot of tasks they can unite around — reauthorizing the State Children's Health Insurance Program and No Child Left Behind, redirecting oil company subsidies to alternative energy research, trying to reach an accommodation on out-of-control entitlements and expanding opportunities to attend college.

Possibly the most arresting single statistic in the exit polls was the finding that a plurality of voters — 40 percent — believe that the next generation of Americans will experience a life "worse than today," while only 30 percent expect it to be better and 28 percent about the same.

This means that voters are discouraged not only about America's present but also its future. The message of the elections is that the country wants its politicians to stop squabbling for partisan advantage and restore the American dream.

Chastened Ike Provides Worthy Model For Bush (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, November 9, 2006

In the days leading up to the midterm elections, the president sounded a dire warning. The nation would face "innumerable obstacles to steady progress" if Democrats wrested control of Congress from Republicans, he said in a speech to supporters.

But when the votes were counted the American electorate didn't heed his words, and the president quickly tried to position himself as a healer, not a divider. "If there are any roadblocks thrown in the way of cooperation, I am not going to be responsible," he said at a post-election news conference.

If none of this sounds familiar to you, that's understandable. The president I'm talking about is Dwight D. Eisenhower, not George W. Bush. And the midterm elections were in 1954, not the ones held two days ago.

In that political sea change, Democrats picked up 19 seats in taking over the House and two seats in seizing the Senate. Like Eisenhower 52 years earlier, Bush tried to frighten voters in order to keep Republicans in power. Democrats "want to take more of your own money because they think they can spend it better than you can spend it," he said in Billings, Mont., five days before the elections.

That kind of talk might have rallied the base, but it didn't win the day for Republicans.

Maybe that's because a lot of voters thought Bush was being disingenuous with such criticism of Democrats. After all, it has been on his watch that a record federal surplus has turned into a huge deficit. Or it might be that while Bush was trotting out that old Republican scare tactic, voters worried more about the quagmire he's gotten us into in Iraq. He should not be tone deaf to this reality.

It's not enough for the president to try to appease voters with grudging talk of his willingness to work with a Democratic majority in the House, and possibly the Senate — as he did at his news conference Wednesday. Nor will having Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld walk the plank do it. He must accept the judgment of the voters that this nation must get out of Iraq — and their expectation that he reach a quick compromise with Congress on how to withdraw from this unpopular war.

"We shall have much to do together; I am sure that we shall get it done, and that we shall do it in harmony and goodwill," Eisenhower told the freshly minted Democratically controlled Congress during his 1955 State of the Union address.

And he apparently kept his word. Six months after that speech, Time magazine said of him: "No U.S. president has worked harder than Dwight Eisenhower to maintain friendly and constitutionally proper relationships with Congress."

When Congress challenged some of his proposals, the magazine reported that same July that "Eisenhower has resolutely resisted efforts to drag him into every political dogfight on and off Capitol Hill. He has always remained a step above the scuffle. This has dismayed some of his closest supporters, who thought that he would gain more by getting into the fight. There is every evidence, however, that this position above the brawl is a strong point in his popularity with U.S. voters."

Bush, who is far from popular with the electorate, would do well to be guided by Eisenhower's behavior rather than any urge he might have to go toe-to-toe with the Democrats. He needs to start acting more like the Texas governor he once was — a politician who was a lot better at bridging this nation's political divide — than the combative president he has been.

Many lessons can be learned from the drubbing that Republicans took at the polls this week. But none is more compelling than this: Americans don't want the fate of this nation to rest solely in the hands of George W. Bush and the Republican Party he leads.

Meeting At The Middle (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

American voters, in their wisdom, ended an era on Tuesday. They rejected a poorly conceived war policy in Iraq that has weakened the United States. They rejected a harshly ideological approach to politics that cast opponents as enemies of the country's survival. They rejected a president so determined to win an election that he was willing to slander his opponents by saying: "The Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses." The voters decided there was no decency in that.

No longer will the national tragedy of Sept. 11, 2001, be used to undermine the opposition party. It was only after he was forced to do so by an electoral defeat that President Bush called for genuine bipartisanship yesterday. Imagine what the world would look like if he had done that a year or two ago.

And no longer will we pay attention to political strategists who assert that swing voters aren't important and that independents and moderates don't matter. If Democrats are to make good use of the power they have been granted, they need to remember that last point. This election was the revenge of the center no less than it was the revenge of the left. The decisive votes cast on Tuesday came from moderates and independents, whom the exit polls showed favoring Democratic House candidates by about 3 to 2.

Nancy Pelosi and the other Democratic leaders face a genuinely complicated political calculus. On the one hand, Democrats would not have won without the intense dedication of their partisan and ideological base. Among self-identified Democrats, the party's House candidates won by about 13 to 1. Liberals went about 8 to 1 Democratic. This energy was critical to the outcome.

But many of the party's successful candidates ran as moderates, and Democrats hold power on the basis of a loan of votes from middle-of-the-road Americans who simply could not stomach Bush Republicanism anymore. The loan can be recalled at any moment.

The good news for Democrats is that their candidates, moderates and liberals alike, ran on two common themes: that the Bush Iraq policy had to change and that the Washington establishment simply does not understand the personal struggles and economic insecurities confronting so many Americans.

On Iraq, the president, not Congress, controls the essential levers of power, especially since Democrats have made clear that they will not use the one instrument they have, to cut off funding for the war, and they are right not to do so.

What they should do is use the coming report from the commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic House member, to force a genuinely bipartisan approach to extricate us from Iraq at the lowest cost possible.

Tuesday's vote can help by making clear to the Iraqi government that there is a limit to American patience. The Shiite majority in Iraq must take more steps to reconcile with the Sunni minority. Our allies in the Arab world need to step up and help, because the American people will not tolerate endless engagement in Iraq. And the Democrats should encourage the administration to engage with all the nations in the region that have reason to fear an Iraqi civil war. That includes Syria and Iran.

The other obligation of this new majority is to answer the economic discontent that helped build its victory. Republicans prayed that the economy would matter in this election. Their prayers were answered in an odd way: Two-fifths of the voters told the pollsters that the economy was "extremely important" in their voting decision -- and they voted 3 to 2 for Democratic House candidates. A lot of Americans are losing ground, and they spoke up.

As long as Republicans control the White House, Democrats will not be able to pass far-reaching measures to deal with worries about pension benefits, health insurance and job security. What needs to begin is a long struggle to create a new social contract that will protect and lift up the tens of millions of Americans for whom globalization is more threat than promise.

It's worth pushing hard-to-veto legislation increasing the minimum wage, expanding health-care coverage and fixing the Medicare drug benefit. These steps need to be combined with hearings on more ambitious measures that would force the Washington establishment to come to terms with grass-roots economic discontents.

This election creates an exceptional opportunity to move from blind ideology to problem-solving and from stupid divisiveness to a politics of remedy and reconciliation. The Democrats had better make it work.

Lobbying Firms Preparing For Major Hill Realignment (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, November 9, 2006

Democratic lobbyists, flush with the excitement of a victorious Election Day, already are looking to share in the spoils.

The Democratic rout of Republican rule in Congress also spelled a definitive end of years of GOP dominance of K Street. Jubilant Democratic lobbyists spent the day after the elections basking in their glow, but also beginning to ponder a new order that restores them to relevance.

"It's started," said veteran Democratic lobbyist Chuck Brain. "Within a couple days, it will be full-fledged, with companies asking, 'What are we doing?' and 'Can we still represent our interests?'"

Companies will have some adjusting to do, lobbyists from both parties agreed. Many have spent the better part of a decade responding to a Republican pressure campaign to hire more Republican lobbyists and to direct more of their campaign contributions back to the GOP. But the movers behind that effort were pushed off the stage during this Congress, when former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) was forced to resign and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) fell short in his re-election bid.

Several Democratic lobbyists agreed that the program, dubbed the K Street Project, created an inertia that now will benefit their ranks, as corporate offices seek to ramp up contacts with the new party in control. But even so, many Democratic K Streeters were careful to say their party — which made lobbying and ethics a major campaign issue this year — will not seek to impose its own similar effort to help that process along.

Marty Russo, a former Democratic Congressman who's now CEO of lobbying giant Cassidy & Associates, said the nature of lobbying itself will change under Democratic rule.

"We're going to go back to a system where you have to work your way through the legislative process," he said. "Lobbyists are going to have to be able to talk to more Members of Congress about more substance, and that's the way it should be. It's going to make us work harder."

Nevertheless, even in the past several weeks before the election outcomes were certain, Democratic lobbyists for hire reported a surge in interest among potential clients.

"Over the last 10 days, there's been a significant uptick in incoming calls and interest in finding out more about what we're doing," said Dan Tate, a veteran of former President Bill Clinton's administration who now lobbies at Capitol Solutions. "It's clear that people are assessing their needs and starting to put together what their prospective teams are going to look like."

Lobbyists said that interest is coming in part from the energy and pharmaceutical industries, both of which have invested heavily in Republican majorities. Over the course of this campaign cycle, both sectors were cast by Democrats as corporate bogeymen, and party leaders have promised a number of measures to roll back GOP-sponsored favors.

Scrambling to throw up some defenses, companies in those sectors have made a number of strategic hires in recent months. Among others, ExxonMobil added Louis Finkel, a former Democratic House aide, to its in-house staff. Shell Oil inked a deal with former Democratic House leadership aide Steve Elmendorf. And the all-Democratic firm Nueva Vista Group has signed on to represent the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

One Democratic lobbyist said it is unclear whether those hires will put off Democratic lawmakers who are determined to rein in the industries. "In the pharma and energy fields, you can help them prepare for the likely assault, but it's too early to tell whether or not you can actually demonstrably help them," he said.

Meanwhile, all-Republican lobbying firms that have enjoyed robust growth under the GOP Congress must decide whether to rewrite their business plans or stay the course. While lobbyists at these shops acknowledged the situation will remain fluid as the dust settles from the election, several added that they are considering upending their partisan models by adding Democrats.

"We're talking to our clients and trying to figure out what their needs are, and we'll meet their needs, whatever they are," said Matt Keelen, a partner at Valis & Keelen. The firm currently contracts out certain projects to Democrats. The American Continental Group, which already has a full-time Democrat on staff, likewise said it is examining its options.

"We're always looking at ways to evolve so that we can continue to help our clients achieve their government relations objectives in the 110th Congress," said partner Carl Thorsen.

Others pledged to stick with their all-Republican format. Barbour Griffith & Rogers, the largest firm of this type, was founded in the early 1990s, when Republicans were out of power on both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. Loren Monroe, a top lobbyist at the shop, said the firm can continue to grow by helping companies block Democratic-sponsored legislation they oppose.

Similarly, the all-GOP firm Fierce, Isakowitz & Blalock has no plans to alter its strategy. “We like to be part of the extended Republican family,” partner Mark Isakowitz said. “That’s who we are and that’s not going to change.”

And the Ashcroft Group, the firm founded by former Attorney General John Ashcroft, will stay busy helping companies and their top executives prepare for tough hearings and investigations they expect Democrats to conduct. “It will be a subpoena-rich environment,” said senior adviser Juleanna Glover Weiss.

But firms that are already bipartisan signaled that they will be looking to adjust the partisan balance in their ranks by adding new Democrats. At Clark & Weinstock, said Ed Kutler, a top lobbyist and a former House Republican leadership aide, the partners have been looking to add high-caliber Democrats.

“We have already been talking to senior level Democrats and plan to talk to more to augment our strong offering on the Democratic side of the aisle,” he said.

Word Of The Day: 'Bipartisan' (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, November 9, 2006

As former House member Gerry Sikorski (D-Minn.), now head of the government practice at Holland & Knight , put it, some of his fellow Democratic lobbyists have a nice "jump to their step" today after the Democratic takeover of the House.

But then, he said, everyone must get down to the fact that "it's a bipartisan process largely."

No one seems to be echoing the bipartisan-lobbying mantra more than the business community, which, while not monolithically Republican, tended to support more Republicans than Democrats, not leaving it with such great credentials with the new Democratic leadership in the House.

Indeed, today, Harold McGraw III , chairman of the Business Roundtable and chief executive of McGraw-Hill Cos., is talking to the Wharton School of Business on "The Real World Is Neither Red Nor Blue" and laying out the group's agenda for Congress.

BRT is also taking out newspaper ads today on the theme, one of which is a photo of former presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton with the line: "If they can put aside their differences after an election, so can you."

John Castellani , president of BRT, said the group of CEOs is not partisan and notes that officials recently met with members of the "Blue Dog" Democrats, a group of conservative party members, over breakfast.

Bill Miller , political director of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, acknowledged that "yesterday was a down day for the business community," but he added that the chamber has supported some Democrats, particularly Rep. Melissa L. Bean (Ill.), and Democrat-turned-independent Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.).

He also noted that many of the new Democrats have a "Blue Dog" profile, or are at least moderates, and said the chamber is eager to work with the Democratic leadership. "Our door is open, and we hope their door is open as well," Miller said.

Todd Stottlemyer , chief executive of the National Federation of Independent Business, said in a statement after the elections that such small-business issues as affordable health care, a complex tax code and burdensome regulation are not partisan issues.

"We're committed to doing our part to work with all lawmakers to find real solutions for America's job creators. NFIB supported pro-small-business candidates in both parties, and small-business owners will now look to the Congress to get the job done," he said.

NFIB, which was active in the campaigns, endorsed 268 candidates for the House and Senate, mostly incumbents -- overwhelmingly Republicans. NFIB spokesman Michael J. Donohue said the group endorsed 12 Democrats.

The new leadership and lawmakers will also provide "new opportunities," according to James Greenwood , head of the Biotechnology Industry Organization -- BIO -- and a former GOP House member from Pennsylvania. Greenwood said that BIO has emphasized a bipartisan lobbying operation. "If we can explain the science and the economics, reason will prevail," he said.Democrats Change Face of New York

Gordon has served as director of policy and planning for then-Indiana Gov. Evan Bayh and is a senior adviser to the All-American PAC, chaired by now-Sen. Bayh. Part of his New York connection: Gordon was executive director of Friends of Mario M. Cuomo, directing the former New York governor's political activities in the state. Most recently, Gordon ran his own law firm in New York.

Other members of the firm's government affairs group include: Marcia Hale and Keith Mason , former Clinton White House director and deputy director, respectively, of intergovernmental affairs; Eric Tanenblatt , former chief of staff to Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue (R); former House member Buddy Darden (D-Ga.); and former senator Zell Miller (D-Ga.).Here and There

Also moving around . . . Amy McKennis Mistri left the legislative affairs office at the Department of Homeland Security, where she was a deputy assistant secretary, to join Global USA Inc. She is chairing the government relations and consulting shop's homeland security group, naturally. Earlier, she worked for the Cellular Telecommunications and Internet Association and for Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.).

GOP Hill veterans R. Adam Shepherd and Christopher L. Minakowski have signed on with Alcalde & Fay . Shepherd was legislative director for Rep. Charles H. Taylor (R-N.C.); Minakowski was legislative counsel for Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.).

Catherine P. Bennett has left Pfizer Inc., after 27 years as a government affairs lawyer, and joined the Venable law firm. Before joining Pfizer, she worked on legislative issues for the National Security Council. (Odd fact: After the NSC, she did research for "The White House Years," a Henry Kissinger memoir.)

Josh Gottheimer , a former Clinton White House speechwriter and most recently director of strategic communications at Ford Motor Co., has been named worldwide executive vice president at Burson-Marsteller , where he will be global chair of the corporate and public affairs practices.

Dems Win VA, Senate (AP)

AP, November 9, 2006

Democrats wrested control of the Senate from Republicans Wednesday with an upset victory in Virginia, giving the party complete domination of Capitol Hill for the first time since 1994.

Jim Webb's squeaker win over incumbent Sen. George Allen gave Democrats their 51st seat in the Senate, an astonishing turnabout at the hands of voters unhappy with Republican scandal and unabated violence in Iraq. Allen was the sixth Republican incumbent senator defeated in Tuesday's elections.

The Senate had teetered at 50 Democrats, 49 Republicans for most of Wednesday, with Virginia hanging in the balance. Webb's victory ended Republican hopes of eking out a 50-50 split, with Vice President Dick Cheney wielding tie-breaking authority.

The Associated Press contacted election officials in all 134 localities where voting occurred, obtaining updated numbers Wednesday. About half the localities said they had completed their postelection canvassing and nearly all had counted outstanding absentees. Most were expected to be finished by Friday.

The new AP count showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236. Virginia has had two statewide vote recounts in modern history, but both resulted in vote changes of no more than a few hundred votes.
